My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) is right to suggest that the problem would return if a regional system of government were introduced. Such a regional government would then impose an extra tax—one of the so-called "advantages" of an extra tier of government—to do what it is difficult to imagine needs to be done. My hon. Friend is perfectly right—[Interruption.]

The laughter from Opposition Members shows their uneasiness about their devolution proposals. They know perfectly well that regional government is a cover-up, and that what they want is to give a degree of independence to Scotland and Wales, without losing the votes of Scottish and Welsh Members in this House. We know what the Opposition are about. They are as uneasy in general as the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford)—who sits with a permanent smile on his face—is uneasy in particular. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall certainly stand against regional government.

General stores have particular problems, and that is why we provided a mandatory reduction in rates. The non-domestic rates are a disproportionate burden of the costs on a small business, and the Bill will automatically halve the rates bills of the only general store and the only post office in a village. That will reduce the rates bills of some 6,000 shops by an average of £500 a year, and, as a result, will transfer from the rates bill to the profits of a small business a significant sum of money. Very often, that money will provide the difference between a company continuing and going out of business, and that is of great importance.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Can the measures be extended to include village pubs, many of which are extremely vulnerable—particularly in the rural areas that I represent—and can be isolated and under severe financial pressure?

Mr. Gummer: As I explained to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Sir J. Lester), there are two ways to help village pubs. One is to adopt the "use it or lose it" attitude, while the other is to accept that discretionary rate relief will be provided for village pubs in particular circumstance. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow will be pleased to know that a pub that is the only available community facility in a village will be eligible in some circumstances to receive the discretionary rate relief of up to 50 per cent.

The discretionary power will help local authorities to give assistance where it is necessary. At the moment, the only way in which a local authority can reduce the rates bills of such businesses is if the ratepayer is able to prove hardship, which inevitably means that help goes only to those in particularly serious financial difficulties. One of the things we discovered during our discussions on the rural White Paper—both in advance of its publication and afterwards—was that many businesses could not be saved if they reached the point of having to seek hardship relief. We need to give businesses help before they reach that point, and the change in the discretionary arrangements makes that possible.

In recognition of the importance to the community of such businesses, we are seeking to allow local authorities to provide help in time. Instead of being a safety net, the measure will be a means of helping businesses to flourish. In all, we anticipate that the measure will help up to 30,000 businesses in England and Wales by reducing their rates bills by some £20 million. The full cost of the mandatory scheme will be met by the Exchequer, with some £3 million going to the 6,000 or so general stores and post offices, and 75 per cent. of the cost of discretionary relief will be met by the Exchequer, giving more than £12 million for other rural shops and businesses.

Therefore, for both the mandatory scheme and the discretionary scheme, the Treasury will pick up most of the bill, so that people in the locality will be able to make decisions on the discretionary scheme without concerns about the weight that might be placed on other local businesses. But the local authorities will have to make sufficient contribution to ensure that they are sensible and choose appropriate businesses for the necessary support.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will the discretionary relief be available in cases in which the hardship has been caused by the councils themselves? For instance, both Lancashire borough council and Wyre borough council are imposing car parking charges and voucher schemes that are driving people out of towns such as Garstaing and Poulton-le-Fylde, which is causing hardship to local small business men and putting them out of business. People are driven to shop in out-of-town shopping centres and to support national chains rather than local shops.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to point out that, although our proposals will be important to shops of all kinds in villages, other factors contribute to their ability to survive. One is the provision of proper car parking to enable people to use village shops in the way in which they use out-of-town shopping centres.

I know that the Labour party has made it clear to the newspapers that it would, were it ever elected, reverse the policy on out-of-town shopping centres, so I hope that Opposition Members will listen to my next point, which is important. One reason why it is important to get local authorities to support our plans is that, without proper parking, people—especially women with children, who constitute a high proportion of shoppers—find it impossible to bring their cars close to the shops.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Gummer: In one second.

The discretionary relief will not depend on hardship, and the shopkeeper will not have to prove hardship. That is an important change, which I am sure will be welcomed on both sides of the House.

Mr. Rendel rose—

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle) rose—

Mr. Gummer: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), because I promised to do so earlier.

Mr. Rendel: Will the Secretary of State clarify a point about which businesses will come within the scope of the legislation? He has talked of businesses that are, in some senses, the centre of the local community. I fully understand that, and everyone appreciates their importance, but the Bill states that those businesses must be of benefit to the local community.

That provision could have a much wider scope, in that many local businesses may provide, for example, employment for the local community, and that could bring in many more businesses than the Secretary of State has so far identified. Will businesses be included if their benefit to the local community lies in providing employment?

Mr. Gummer: The proposition is to deal with those businesses that provide the kind of services that are of benefit to the community, especially those members of it who are older, younger or less well-off, and for whom the motor car is not available. The scheme is designed to help the village shop that acts as a post office or general store. The discretionary part of the scheme will enable it to be extended to such businesses as garages or pubs.

Of course, the businesses must be in communities of fewer than 3,000 people, and must also be the only such business. It would be unfair to provide mandatory rate relief for a shop that was competing with another shop but was not doing as well because it was not as good as the other one.

Mr. Day rose—

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): On that point—

Mr. Gummer: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Nicholson: I am most grateful—

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry, but I had better give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day).

Mr. Day: Although I welcome the provisions of the Bill, I am disappointed that they do not apply to metropolitan districts. My right hon. Friend will appreciate that there are villages within those, and within the former metropolitan counties. That applies to my area. He has been to Cheadle and knows that, in Cheadle Hulme and Bramhall, village centres are struggling because of out-of-town shopping developments. I hope that he will not forget that traders in such areas need help, too.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to point that out. My problem is that, when we propose measures such as those in the Bill, the immediate reaction of people who would stop one doing anything—I am afraid that there are still some of them around—is, "If you propose this, people will ask," as my hon. Friend has done, "why it does not extend to their area." The fact is that we must try to target the help as well as we can.

I hope that, if I am not interrupted too much more, I shall soon reach another part of the Bill that will please my hon. Friend. We hope both to be able to extend the powers to parish councils and to enable parish councils to be formed more easily than hitherto. There are many urban parish councils, and I should like to see more.

I enjoyed my visit to Cheadle, with its attractive village atmosphere. The traders seemed to be doing extremely well in building up their reputation and gaining adherents who had previously used out-of-town shopping centres beyond the area. I am sure that my hon. Friend's battles on their behalf are part of the reason for that success.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Gummer: If I am to get anywhere near the end of my speech, I must make some progress. Then I shall certainly give way both to my hon. Friends and to some Opposition Members.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde) rose—

Mr. Gummer: I shall not forget the hon. Gentleman. He is unforgettable, so I shall not miss him, and shall be happy to give way to him later.

The new discretionary powers mean that local authorities will be able to reduce or waive the rate bills of businesses before they get into financial difficulty. In case anyone is worried about the prospect, I stress that there will remain the right to do that on hardship grounds, as well as the ability to extend it. That is an important difference.

The Bill contains several other measures important for rural life. For example, it will end the anomaly whereby sporting rights—fowling, shooting, taking or killing game or rabbits, and fishing—are rated in England and Wales but not in Scotland. [Interruption.]

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) rose—

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York) rose—

Mr. Gummer: I am interested in the fact that the hon. Member for Camden—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman wants, I shall refer to him as the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), so that the whole world will know who I mean when I say that he giggles as soon as one mentions sporting rights.

For many of our constituents, those rights are the difference between having a business and not having a business. The fact that the hon. Gentleman laughs shows how little interest the Labour party has in rural England. He really should contain himself when we talk about that subject. He is now falling about with laughter, because he does not understand what it means in rural England when people manage—[Interruption.]

Of course the hon. Gentleman would like me not to make this point, because it is so embarrassing for Labour candidates throughout the country to realise how little interest the Labour party has in rural England. I hope that his Back Benchers understand that, from the perspective of Holborn and St. Pancras, it is difficult to know about the very limited means on which people operate in the country. For those people, the measure will make a significant difference.

As a result of the measures to be introduced in the Bill, sporting rights in England and Wales will become exempt from rates, and their value will be disregarded in assessing the rateable value of the land over which they are exercised. In our rural White Paper, we made clear our support for country sports. We believe that they contribute significantly to the landscape and the economy of the countryside.

We also believe that decisions on country sports should be made by country people, not imposed from outside. Conservatives remain committed to that principle.

Mr. Foulkes: As the Secretary of State knows, I represent a large rural constituency, so I take a particular interest in the subject. The Bill says:

"Such an exemption already exists in Scotland."

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, that exemption came about under the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994. In April 1994, while serving on the Standing Committee on that Bill, I raised the issue because it was of concern to my constituents.

The then Minister, the right hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who I see is with us today, said that the step was being taken to bring Scottish practice into line with that in England and Wales. That just does not make sense. Was I being misled by the right hon. Member for Dumfries? Should he apologise? What has gone wrong? This is very strange. Could the Minister explain?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman may rest assured that both England and Wales and Scotland will now be in the same position. The manner in which we have achieved this miraculous circumstance may lie in the mists of history—I think that we can manage to get by without being too precise about it. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who no doubt extended to the hon. Gentleman the full information that was available to him at the time, would now extend to him rather different information, that information being fuller.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The matter is not entirely humorous. If the Secretary of State is now telling the truth, it could not possibly have been told on 19 April 1994 in the First Scottish Standing Committee considering the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Bill, when virtually the sole justification for the change in law in Scotland was to bring it into line with the law in England. That turns out not be true, and, bizarrely, the Government are now saying that we have to bring the law in England into line with the law in Scotland. Either way, it is bunging money at their rich friends.

Mr. Gummer: All those who live in the country will now know what the hon. Gentleman thinks about helping the countryside. He knows so little about it that he can make that comment. Any of us who represent country constituencies know perfectly well that the rights are owned not only by rich people but by all sorts of different people.

The last time that the hon. Gentleman went into the countryside must have been on a Sunday school outing, and he must have had his eyes closed at the time. He has a Milly Molly Mandy view of the countryside; he got it from children's books. It is about time he visited the countryside. I would be happy to take him. If he would like to come for the weekend, I shall spend a weekend with him. Greater love hath no man in offering to give up one of my weekends for the hon. Gentleman in order that he may understand—

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Get on with the Bill.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Get on with it.

Mr. Gummer: Of course Opposition Members want me to get on with it, because they do not like what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has said. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), who is a great countryman and knows a great deal about the matter, wants me to get on with the Bill because he does not want the House to know that the official Labour party spokesman does not think that the measure is necessary.

Mr. Dobson indicated assent.

Mr. Gummer: He does not; that is very good. I shall ensure that that is made very clear in my constituency, and that my Labour party opponent will have to say whether he takes the same view.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Would you advise the Secretary of State?

Madam Speaker: That is a point of frustration rather than a point of order. I was rather enjoying the exchange.

Mr. Gummer: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

I ought to address the serious point made by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, for the following reason. If, in the course of previous discussions in this House, anyone has inadvertently said something that was other than exactly right, of course I and my right hon. Friend will look at the record and ensure that the House is made fully aware.

I am not introducing this measure merely because it brings England and Wales into line with Scotland: I am introducing it because I think that it is necessary for the health of the countryside. It is something that we have insisted would be valuable. It will not cost the taxpayer a great deal, but it will remove an enormous amount of frustration and some pretty difficult arrangements that have to be made in order to follow up matters. It will recognise—it seems—an important matter for the countryside.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I should like to clear up this minimal issue that the Opposition have raised. If they knew anything about sporting rating, they would know the difference between rating in Scotland, which was extremely high before we made the change, and the infinitesimal level in England. Naturally, we brought the Scottish level down to what it ought to be—which was nil. I am so glad that my right hon. Friend has made such a positive statement about country sports in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: I thank my right hon. Friend, but I will ensure that any scintilla of difference is ironed out. I hope that the House has noticed that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was more interested in trying to trip up my right hon. Friend for something that he may or may not have said some time ago than in welcoming an advantageous measure for the country community. We are faced with an Opposition who neither know about nor are interested in the environment, and we now know that they have the same attitude to the countryside.

Mr. Bayley rose—

Mr. Graham rose—

Mr. Gummer: I think that I ought to give way first to the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), but I shall not forget the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley).

Mr. Graham: I am most grateful to the Secretary of State.

I represent an area with many rural communities, but I also travel the length and breadth of Scotland—I even have a holiday home in Scotland—and see many rural communities suffering because petrol stations are closed most of the time in the winter and businesses cannot compete.

I welcome a measure that will help those communities, but it has taken far too long for the Government to respond to the needs of rural villages. I am delighted that something is being done for Scotland, but how much will it cost local authorities? Will they need to employ people to discuss the discretionary rates; will there be more bureaucracy to deal with; will the Government simply allow everything to rumble on and cost us all a fortune; or will there be genuine help for local communities?

Mr. Gummer: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support. However, he criticises the timing of a measure that his party has never even suggested; I have been under no pressure whatever from that quarter. One can see why, when the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras does not even know about the countryside. I sense anger from the Opposition Benches, perhaps because I am striking home.

On local authorities, even in the case of the discretionary grant, 75 per cent. will be paid for centrally from the Treasury, and the mandatory grant will be wholly centrally paid for. At this rate, I may never get to the part of my speech dealing with parish councils, but I hope that they will play a part in England and Wales in deciding on which occasions it would be sensible to have a discretionary grant; they will put their point of view to the district councils, which can then decide.

I shall now give way to the hon. Member for York, after which I must make some progress.

Mr. Bayley: I am most grateful to the Secretary of State.

I want to raise an issue concerning shooting rights in Hagg wood in Dunnington, a village just outside my constituency, which is a wood that my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) knows extremely well, because he was born and grew up in the village and lived there much of his life; it is quite wrong for the Secretary of State to suggest that he does not understand rural life.

Hagg wood is owned by the Church Commissioners, but the Forestry Commission has a 999-year lease on it. For many years past, my constituents and residents in Dunnington have been able to walk and ride in the wood and to use it for recreation. Now, because the Forestry Commission is selling the land, the Church Commissioners feel that they can no longer extend open access, as they want to exploit the shooting rights. Instead of being able to ride in safety in a wood, children will have to ride on the roads, and people will no longer have access.

Has the Secretary of State considered the effect that this provision in the Bill will have in closing access to countryside and woodland to the general public, and will he ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to ask the Forestry Commission to delay the sale, so that the matter of shooting rights and access can be sorted out, and access can continue should the wood be sold?

Mr. Gummer: Of course I shall be happy to talk to my right hon. Friend, but the provisions in the Bill make no difference to the circumstance to which the hon. Gentleman refers, because the shooting rights are there in any case; the question is whether rates are paid on them, and that is a matter that must be marginal to a decision of the Church Commissioners. However, the hon. Gentleman makes a fair point, and I shall investigate the matter and ensure that my right hon. Friend does so, too.

The Bill has an important provision on Crown exemption, which will bring Crown property, such as the buildings of Government Departments, within the rating system. That is a very important change. I do not think that the Government should be protected against the normal effects of the cost of running a business. Such buildings are technically exempt from rates, although, since the late 19th century, the occupiers of Crown property have paid a contribution in lieu of rates. That is a different sort of contribution. It does not mean that they have the same reaction to the rating system as normal businesses. It is necessary that they should. The Bill ends that exemption.

[Mr. Gummer]

The House recognises that parish councils come in all shapes and sizes. There are very small ones, such as Snape in my constituency, but the parish council of Felixstowe, which is called the town council, covers an area containing more than 20,000 people. It is a much different business from the village of Snape. Between them are towns of other sizes, such as Aldeburgh or Woodbridge, all of which have what are technically parish councils.

Many urban areas have parish councils. The question is how to provide for them to play a better part in the community. Many would like to do something more. I do not expect that to happen in Stone parish in the borough of Swale in Kent, because it has no population. That is one end of the scale. Parish councils with more than 20,000 people may want to do much more than they do now.

At present, such parish councils are significantly restricted. I am not seeking to give them duties that they must carry out but to offer them opportunities to choose to carry out things that they feel that they could do. For that reason, and because we found in the response to the rural White Paper that many parish councils want new powers, the idea is that the powers will be permissive. The powers will not be forced upon the parish councils; they will choose.

The powers will give additional opportunities in respect of five matters: first, to establish and support a car-sharing scheme; secondly, to pay revenue grants for a community or voluntary group running a bus for the benefit of elderly or disabled people; thirdly, to grant taxi fare concessions for people in the categories covered by local authority concessionary fare schemes; fourthly, to investigate transport needs and publicise public transport services; and fifthly, to fund traffic calming works to be carried out by the highways authorities.

Those five powers are necessary for many local parish councils to be able to things from which they are currently prohibited by law. I believe that the House will generally welcome that.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Can the Secretary of State explain why the Bill would allow parish councils, no matter how small, to raise a precept for extra public expenditure while his colleague the Secretary of State for Scotland is utterly opposed to a Scottish Parliament raising extra funds for its expenditure? Do not Cabinet members talk to each other?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Lady has totally different views. We are talking about local councils close to people, and about people who know the people who are running the council. They know perfectly well whether they are prepared to pay. The hon. Lady is putting forward a fictitious and fake proposition: that there should be a Parliament for Scotland that would raise money but would not contribute to the wealth or economic advancement of Scotland. It would drive people out of Scotland, because they would be much more likely to site their businesses where they did not have to pay the tartan tax.

The Opposition are attempting a sleight-of-hand by making sure that Scottish Members of Parliament are different from English Members of Parliament. Scottish Members, under the hon. Lady's proposals, would have votes on English matters in the House of Commons, whereas English Members would have no votes on Scottish matters. That is unacceptable to my constituents and to all English constituents.

What is more, the hon. Lady's ideas would take away from this country its enormous advantage in the world of being a United Kingdom, able to fight for its position collectively, not just in the European Union but in the councils of the world. The hon. Lady would not just damage Scotland; she would charge the Scots for the damage she does. Her policies are unpopular in the United Kingdom in any event. [Interruption.]

It is interesting to see how many Opposition Members feel uncomfortable about the devolution proposals, and to note how many Scottish Labour Members are beginning to worry about the extra taxation that would be involved. They know that taxes will be higher under a Labour Government anyway. The hon. Lady's constituents do not want her to be a half Member of Parliament, which is what she would be if her party came to power.

Some parish and community councils already do many of these things. However, parish spending on transport and crime prevention—matters of tremendous importance to many villages—is currently limited to £3.50 per elector—the sum that parishes can raise for general purpose spending. The new powers will give parishes the freedom to increase their precept beyond that limit to cover the costs of new community transport initiatives.

The same is true of crime prevention. Crime and the fear of crime are highly relevant to rural areas, just as they are to the inner cities. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) might like to listen to this, even though he does not represent a rural area. It would be nice to find him caring about rural issues, since the principal Opposition spokesman on these matters has clearly forgotten whatever youthful touch he may have had.

We have taken the opportunity here to give parish and community councils in England and Wales a new power to help the police and support local crime prevention efforts. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for North–West Durham (Ms Armstrong) has not been listening to what I am saying. We are increasing the £3.50 expenditure limit, so other parts of general spending are not excluded. The hon. Lady should listen and not talk so much. She continually tries to help out the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, because she, unlike him, has some rural interests.

The new provision will give parishes a new and separate statutory power to raise money so as to be able to help police authorities in their fight against crime. In so doing, parishes will be able to set conditions governing what their money is spent on, subject to the agreement of the chief police officer in the area concerned.

We have not been prescriptive. We want parishes to choose, but consultation will be important. I said at the beginning that one of the problems attending recent discussions of local government reorganisation was the number of promises made by larger councils to consult smaller ones. Some of those promises appear not to have been fulfilled. It is hard to see, for instance, how Lancashire county council has carried the promise through. But we have a list of the promises that have been made. I intend to insist that consultations continue.

That is why, in the Bill, we are taking powers to enforce consultation between tiers of government when people refuse it.

In this context, planning is significant. Parish councils have an important part to play in planning. They can make recommendations to the district council, but it is, of course, for the district council to decide. The problem is that the latter usually does not tell the parish council why it has chosen to disregard its advice. If the district council has to explain its reasons, it is more likely that a consensus on planning matters will emerge. I know that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) would agree with me here, and I also see the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours) nodding in agreement.

Mr. David Nicholson: All the measures that my right hon. Friend has spoken about so far give the lie to all those who rather sniffily said that there would be no flesh on or money devoted to the White Paper on rural areas.

On the specific powers of parish councils, could he be more positive about the ability of those parishes that raise extra money for a special parish constable to employ that person in their area, such as Exmoor in my constituency, instead of him being hived off to Bristol? Secondly, on planning powers, and going back to our discussion about garages and village shops, will parishes have the power to stop garages opening up as a shop as well, which would then compete with and possibly have a destructive effect on the village shop, as recently happened at Wheddon Cross in my constituency?

Mr. Gummer: The second part of my hon. Friend's question does not relate so much to the village garage, but to chains of garages which are increasingly seeking to offer retail provisions as well as to sell petrol. I am watching that pattern carefully. I do not think, however, that it is a matter for parish councils.

Mr. Vaz: Oh!

Mr. Gummer: It is about time the hon. Gentleman came clean with the House. He appears to be going round the country giving comfort to various large retailers by saying that, if there were a Labour Government, there would be no problems about restrictions on out-of-town shopping centres. That is widely reported, and it does not appear to be as widely denied. That is interesting.

Mr. Vaz: Wait and see.

Mr. Gummer: I do not have to wait, because those circumstances will not arise. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall not change my views after the election, when I shall continue to be in a position to make sure that such developments do not happen.

As for the other question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), the contract for the parish constable will be a local one. A parish constable is different from a special constable, who is at the beck and call of the chief constable. In my area, that special constable often finds himself policing the Ipswich Town football match at Portman road rather than patrolling the small village that he had hoped to look after.

That local contract will enable someone to opt for the real village policing that we are particularly keen to support. The envisaged arrangements make it possible for that to happen.

Dame Elaine Kellett–Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gummer: I must get on—

Dame Elaine Kellett–Bowman: Just for half a minute.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gummer: I rather think that you, Madam Speaker, would wish me to draw my remarks to a conclusion soon.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett Bowman) and I are as one on the issues. I want to make progress, because the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras has spent a lot of time asking me to get on because I have said some rather uncomfortable things about him, which I notice he has not so far denied.

There are some real problems about parish councils, because at the moment they cannot easily be formed.

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North–West Durham): Whose fault is that?

Mr. Gummer: Many people would like to have a parish, but the system is arcane and out of date. Although there are already 10,000 parishes in England, of which 8,000 have parish councils, there are areas without parishes where local feelings strongly favour the creation of a parish council to reflect the clear local identity and sense of community. That is natural where a community is well established and settled. The hon. Member for North-West Durham (Ms Armstrong) might listen to what I intend to do to help to make that possible.

Demographic changes over the decades mean that some existing parishes no longer properly reflect the shape of the local community or local identities. Such areas want not a new parish but a different, specific area to be included in that parish. We therefore want a flexible system to deal with parish reviews.

Under the current system, even the smallest amendment to a parish area requires the full weight of the Local Government Commission's consideration. Here I might find common cause with the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, because that commission is perhaps not always the organisation to which so small a matter should be referred. We have included provisions in the Bill to make it much easier to react to local demand for new parishes and alterations to existing ones.

The Bill enables district councils to review parish arrangements and to recommend new parishes or parish boundary changes directly to the Secretary of State. In addition, electors will be able to start a process leading to a new parish for an unparished area by means of a public petition. We must, of course, be sure that such a petition represents broad measure of support for a new parish. Under the terms of the Bill, as long as a petition is signed by 250 people, or 10 per cent. of the electors for the proposed parish, whichever is the greater, that will set the ball rolling.

[Mr. Gummer]

There is also provision in the Bill to enable me to direct the Local Government Commission to conduct a review of parishing arrangements only. At present, I cannot do that, and such a review has to be part of a much bigger exercise. We shall shortly issue draft guidance for consultation to explain what the basis for a new parish should be.

The measures in the Bill will mean that it will be far easier to respond to local opinion where there is demand for a new parish or changes to existing arrangements. The Bill enables us to direct help to the very parts of the rural world where help is most needed.

In the preparation of the rural White Paper, which has been widely welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, we consulted widely. Since its publication, an enormous number of meetings have taken place all over the United Kingdom to discuss those issues, with the result that we now know even more about people's concerns. I recently published the first anniversary report to set out what we had done to fulfil our promises in the rural White Paper. Part of that report refers to the Bill.

The Bill makes sure that we can help the rural post office, village shop, garage or local pub. It enables us to give parish councils greater powers, and makes sure that those who are dependent on the life and the livelihood of country sports will not find themselves rated. It ensures that parish councils can be set up because people want them, and not after an enormously complicated and arcane process. Above all, it is designed to ensure that the parish council plays a much more important role in British society than it has until now.

I believe in subsidiarity—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—but I notice that most people think that subsidiarity is all right when it means taking power from people on a superior rung of the system, but they are not terribly good at pushing the power down to people on lower rungs. I notice that district councils are keen to take county council or Government powers, but less eager to hand them on to school governors, hospital trusts or, indeed, parish councils. The Bill is designed to ensure that parish councils play a more important role in our lives. That is right, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The Bill covers mainly local government and rating in rural areas, as the Secretary of State has been at infinite pains to point out. It was introduced to put right things that are wrong in rural areas, and there are certainly many things that need to be put right. Over the past 17 years, little attention has been paid to the problems faced by people living in rural areas. Many of those problems have got much worse, some are getting worse and some are a direct result of Government policies.

Just look at the record. Crime has more than doubled in rural areas. Unemployment has risen more sharply in rural areas than elsewhere. Homelessness has doubled in rural England and rural Wales; in rural Scotland, it has trebled—yet still the Government stop councils building houses. Deregulation has deprived hundreds of villages of any bus service at all. Village schools have disappeared because the Government forced local education authorities to get rid of surplus places. Small local hospitals and cottage hospitals have been swept away and village shops have closed.

The Local Government and Rating Bill is a belated recognition that those things have gone wrong. It has been described by some as a confession of failure, because it highlights the Government's failures. If the Bill is a confession, it is a signed confession. It carries the names of the guilty on the back page: the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Home Secretary, the Secretary of State for the Environment, the Secretary of State for Transport, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Wales have all had to sign the confession. For some curious reason, however, this Bill dealing with rural areas does not carry the name of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It has been suggested by one of my less pleasant hon. Friends that another confession of failure on his part would probably be the final straw.

If the Secretary of State does not like my calling his Bill a confession of failure, it might be more pleasing to his ecclesiastical habit of mind if I were to call it a deathbed conversion. The Government have been in power for 910 weeks and now, with a maximum of 26 weeks to go before the election, they have seen the light, recognised the harm that they are doing to our green and pleasant land and, belatedly, started to put things right.

The Bill is both a confession of failure and a deathbed conversion, but I believe that it is intended to be something different—an attempted plea bargain by the Government. They hope that, if they plead guilty and promise to start making restitution, voters in rural areas will not punish them at the general election. Apparently, the Conservatives intend to fight the next election on the slogan "Better late than never".

This belated Bill will not save the Tory party from the consequences of action and inaction, which have left rural communities in their present state. The Bill provides much too little, far too late. It does not relate to many of the problems that afflict local communities. Its proposals will not be enough to solve the problems to which it relates, and it will force local people to pay for most of the improvements that it intends to make.

In the Bill, the Government are not making restitution for what has gone wrong. The Bill proposes to change the law so that the victims of the Government's rural policies will be permitted to spend their own money, to put right the things that the Government have got wrong. The Government are telling local communities, "If you have a problem, put it on the parish rate."

For 17 years, the Conservatives have said that market forces can solve everything and have claimed to be the low-taxation party, but in the Bill they acknowledge that market forces cannot meet all the needs of rural communities, and propose instead a new local tax that local people must pay for putting things right in their area. It is the Government's 23rd new tax since the previous general election.

The Bill provides that, through parish councils, local people can, at their own expense, promote crime prevention and local transport services. We favour the idea of local communities being able to take such initiatives, but we need to consider the scale of what is proposed against the scale of the problems.

A tidal wave of crime has engulfed many rural areas in the past few years. Places where local people were proud to be able to leave doors unlocked, or even open, are increasingly besieged by thieves. Villages are robbed and burgled. Organised gangs knock off huge truckloads of livestock, chicken's eggs, or—as will happen in a month or two—Christmas trees.

In rural areas, the increases in crime are enormous. In Gloucestershire, crime has more than trebled, with violent crime up by 260 per cent.

Mr. Gill: Has it not occurred to the hon. Gentleman that much of the crime that he alleges occurs in rural areas is displaced crime from the urban areas that he represents?

Mr. Dobson: It is a fair stride for a knock-off merchant in Kentish Town to get to Gloucestershire to do a robbery, but it may happen. I am saying—the hon. Gentleman makes my point entirely—that what the Government propose today will not stop the long-distance professional criminal. We need a national crackdown on such people. The problem cannot be solved locally.

In Shropshire and in Hereford and Worcester, crime has more than doubled. In Lincolnshire, it has increased by 170 per cent. In Leicestershire, crime has trebled and violent crime has quadrupled. In Cambridgeshire, represented by the Prime Minister and the chairman of the Tory party, violent crimes have doubled, but I do not blame them for all of them.

Those are the official figures. They do not give the full picture.

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House why the Labour party has voted consistently against every crime measure presented by the Government? Why has the Labour party always been soft on the criminal and hard on the victim? Why will it not change its views?

Mr. Dobson: I shall treat the Secretary of State's intervention with the contempt that it deserves. What he said is simply not true, and it is no good him burbling on about it.

The reality is: drug squads in every police force in rural areas, lager louts in many a country town and old people's lives dominated by crime and the fear of crime. Hon. Members who represent rural seats know that what I say is true.

Although rural communities should be given the power to protect themselves, that alone will not solve the problem. We need a nationwide drive against crime, a nationwide—indeed, international—drive against drugs and a commitment to tackle the causes of crime. Labour is committed to those policies.

The Bill will empower parish councils to promote local transport. That is to be welcomed. It follows the example set all over the county by Labour councils that have used their powers to improve bus and train services—for example, the initiative taken by Lancashire county council and district councils in the county, in conjunction with parish councils, to improve local railway services and stations, so encouraging more people to use the local railway service. That initiative was ritually denounced by the Secretary of State a few minutes ago.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): Is it not possible that a problem could arise if parish councils were allowed to raise more in their precepts? If district and county councils that already provided services such as those that my hon. Friend describes were capped and strapped for cash, they could say to the parish councils, "You can raise the brass; get on and do it," and the service might deteriorate, rather than improve.

Mr. Dobson: Nothing in this world is all gain: there are advantages and disadvantages. Unless great care is taken, the situation described by my hon. Friend might arise.

The Government now recognise that a local effort is necessary, but it is a struggle in the face of the Government's overall transport policies, and above all their policy of bus deregulation. Clauses 26 to 30 have had to be introduced to give the parishes powers to offset the harmful impact of bus deregulation. The Government are giving with one hand the power to deal with the lack of the service that they have taken away with the other.

As a result of bus deregulation, the number of passengers going by bus in shire counties has fallen by 20 per cent. Less than one third of rural parishes have any bus service at all, and many others have no bus service after dark. Yet people in villages have to travel much further for vital services than people who live in towns. Fewer than one in five villages have a permanent GP, half do not have a school, fewer than half have a shop and one third do not even have a pub.

The measures proposed by the Government will help, but much more is needed, starting with the reregulation of the buses, as Labour proposes. In exchange for the right to run services on the most popular routes at the most popular times of day, bus companies will be required to run buses on less popular routes at less popular times of day. That is how the system worked before, when there were many more bus services than there are now.

Housing is one rural problem that is not addressed at all in the Bill. The sale of council houses and the failure to build more to replace them has contributed to the record levels of homelessness in rural areas. Many young people have had to leave the village where they grew up, in order to find somewhere decent to live. It is often forgotten that, when the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), now the Deputy Prime Minister, introduced the sale of council houses, it was intended that the takings should be used to build more. Except for one short lucid spell, that has not happened. Recently Ministers have taken to denouncing the whole idea; I do not know whether they have cleared that with the Deputy Prime Minister.

Labour will encourage councils to invest the takings from the sale of council houses to build new houses and rehabilitate old ones. That will be phased to give councils and the building industry the benefit of steady expansion. Such a programme offers real hope to many people, especially young people in rural areas, that they will be able to afford somewhere decent to live in the village where they grew up. That is vital to local communities so that they do not become devoid of young people, and to ensure that there are people to provide vital services such as the post and the milk round.

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman give a guarantee that the same amount of money for spending on capital matters would be provided at the same time, or would the spending of capital receipts replace that?

[Mr. Gummer]

Furthermore, will he give a guarantee that only the capital receipts held by the authority concerned would be spent, and that no capital receipts would be transferred to other, less careful authorities?

Mr. Dobson: We intend that the capital receipts from the sale of council houses should be released in phases to enable councils to get on with building houses. We have no intention of compulsorily transferring any such assets from one council to another, which we must have said a dozen times. I think that the Secretary of State is losing his marbles.

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman be kind enough to answer the other question? Would the same amount be given to local authorities for spending on capital matters, and what is the difference between the phased release that the hon. Gentleman talks about and the fact that local authorities are already, in most cases, able to spend much of their capital receipts on enabling housing associations to build houses?

Mr. Dobson: Again, the Secretary of State is in danger of misleading the House. There are severe restrictions on what councils can do with the takings from the right to buy, whether in relation to housing associations or not. What I am saying—I have said it before and I shall say it again—is that we shall release the takings from the right to buy. That proposal is welcomed by every housing association and by everybody committed to providing housing. The only person who apparently cannot understand it is the Secretary of State. As he cannot understand it after I have explained it to him twice, I do not propose to give him a third opportunity.

Mr. Gummer: I asked the hon. Gentleman a direct question. Will he guarantee that, alongside his proposal, the money provided for councils by the Government for capital expenditure will not be reduced?

Mr. Dobson: The object is to increase the amount of housing being built. These questions are from a man who sits in a Cabinet that will not even guarantee money next year for any hospital in the country, yet he is asking me to dish out guarantees. What I am saying—I shall repeat it yet again, in case the Secretary of State still fails to understand—is that, as a result of our policies, there will be more money for the house-building programme. We have made that clear, and that is why even Tory building companies welcome the proposition.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): Following the hon. Gentleman's earlier remark, will there be more money for buses? He told us that there would be a new system of bus regulation, which would require bus operators to operate services other than those they operate at present. Presumably that means more financial support and a return to the old transport commissioners. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us more about that?

Mr. Dobson: That does not follow at all. With bus deregulation and, in some cases, privatisation, we have seen a massive increase of semi-private monopolies all over the country. They are rolling in money, and, under the regulatory system, they will be expected to provide services on the less popular routes at less popular times of day in exchange for the right to operate at popular times of day on the popular routes. They will not get subsidies to help them.

I give one example of a dire housing situation. In the Forest of Dean, the number of applications for housing by homeless families has almost doubled in three years, from 185 in the whole of 1993-94 to 164 in the first six months of this year. The council expects a further escalation in youth homelessness as a result of the lack of new house building and the changes in social security rules. The young single homeless project run by Gloucestershire county council and Shelter is also threatened by the change in housing benefit regulations. Last year, the project dealt with more than 200 young people in the Forest of Dean. Having nowhere to live leaves those young people especially vulnerable to drug pushers and other criminals, whose presence in the Forest of Dean has been growing.

Most disturbing of all are recent reports that some of the drug barons have been buying up houses which they then let to young homeless people, a move calculated to entrap the young people, to increase the evil profits of the drug pushers and to terrify local families and the local police. All that is happening in Gloucestershire, which has already seen the biggest rise in crime in any part of England—a rise that the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), who has now left the Chamber, attributed to outsiders. The provisions in the Bill that will allow parish councils to put some of their own money into crime prevention are welcome, but they will not counter developments such as those that I have described in the Forest of Dean.

The proposal in the Bill that has attracted the most attention is rate relief for village shops and other village businesses. It is certainly true that local shops have taken a pounding under the Government, who, until recently, actively promoted out-of-town shopping developments, which undermined village shops as well as high street shopping centres. When they changed their policy, we welcomed their belated recognition of the damage that the planning policy was inflicting on existing retailers, both rural and urban.

We welcome the Government's adoption of a policy based on a presumption against such developments. We continue to believe that town centres should be the preferred location for major retail developments, although we recognise that some out-of-town developments may be justified in particular local circumstances. If the Secretary of State wants to rely on rumours and lies in the papers instead of on what I have just said, that is entirely up to him.

Although help for rural shops is welcome, it should not be overestimated. By the Government's calculation, the saving from the mandatory rate reduction will average £500 a shop. When the shop is rented, it is not clear from the Bill whether that saving will go to the shopkeeper: it may go to the landlord, who is not required to pass it on. As drafted, the Bill leaves many questions about definitions unanswered. The concession is for rural settlements, but what is a rural settlement? Will the concession apply to rural settlements in a city, metropolitan or unitary district? There are many sensible definitions of a rural settlement.

Why have local pharmacies not been singled out to receive the concession, as recommended by the Select Committee on the Environment? I raise that point because of the new threat to local pharmacies: the proposed abolition of resale price maintenance on non-prescription medicines. That has raised fears all over the country that local chemists will be forced to close, reducing the service available to people living in small towns and villages. For example, in Colne valley hundreds of people signed petitions about the threat to pharmacies in Linthwaite, Slaithwaite, Milnesbridge and Golcar. The Bill does not address the new threat to local services.

The proposal to help local shops raises a matter of principle. Why does the concession apply only to villages? Why does it not apply to other areas where there are one or two shops that can hardly make ends meet? There are plenty of large estates, both council and private, on the edge of towns whose residents will feel that they equally deserve such financial support. Some such shops may be even more badly placed than village shops because of high insurance and security costs, on top of the fact that many of their customers are out of work or on low incomes.

Shops on the Matson estate on the edge of Gloucester have closed. The situation is so bad that a small shop selling basic groceries has had to be provided in the voluntary neighbourhood centre. That centre pays no rates except on the shop premises. People living on that and similar estates will want to know why the concession does not apply to their local shops.

Another example is the Lumbertubs estate on the edge of Northampton, where the general store is threatened with closure. If it closes, residents without their own transport will be isolated. On top of the usual problems, that shop has been repeatedly broken into. Local people want closed circuit television in such areas, because they have seen its benefits in the town centre. CCTV was pioneered by Northampton borough council without Government help, and still nothing is forthcoming.

The Bill proposes a number of sensible changes to help and expedite the setting up of parish councils: indeed, it returns the law to what it was before the Government made a mess of it by changing it. It increases the entitlement of parish councils to be involved in the decision-making processes of their district and county councils. The Secretary of State again referred scathingly to Lancashire county. When I last met representatives of parish councils in Lancashire, they had no word of criticism of the county council about consultation.

All those developments are a welcome acceptance by the Government of the merits of the policies that we have advocated for a long time. Unfortunately, the sensible aspects are marred by what appears at first sight to be the highly prescriptive nature of the Government's proposals, which look as if they will require the Secretary of State literally to lay down the law to individual parish councils. It seems that the Government cannot break the habits of a lifetime. Fortunately, however, that lifetime is rapidly drawing to a close.

Planning is a major responsibility of local government, and it should have been included in the Bill. Opencast mining is a major planning aspect, and it should have been dealt with in the Bill—but that has not happened. It is the rural blight that the Tories always forget. It has not been dealt with in the Bill; it was not mentioned in last month's White Paper on rural England; and it was not mentioned last year in the Government's rural White Paper. Opencast mining is the biggest, ugliest and most environmentally damaging activity in rural England, but the Tories dare not even speak its name.

Opencast mining is ugly, noisy, unhealthy, dangerous and dirty. It threatens rural communities in Gloucestershire, Lancashire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Yorkshire, Northumberland, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Warwickshire and Nottinghamshire. The Government do nothing and say nothing about it, because they have encouraged it and sold off the rights to private companies that are willing to destroy thousands of acres of countryside for short-term gain.

I shall give one or two examples of the problems faced by people in rural areas. In west Yorkshire, RJB Mining is the owner of most of the 660-acre Windsor site, which straddles the boundaries of Dewsbury, Batley and Spen, Normanton and Morley. It includes woods and watercourses, and it is criss-crossed by rights of way. It is a green lung for the surrounding communities, but it is now under threat.

In Derbyshire, RJB has just emerged as the buyer of an even larger site—the Shilo North site—which extends around Amber valley, Ashfield, Broxtowe and Erewash. In a joint effort with local people, the Labour-controlled Amber Valley and Broxtowe councils—supported by Tory Members of Parliament for the area, who are both Treasury Ministers—tried to buy the site, but they were outbid by RJB. It is another example of Tory profiteering getting the better of local people's interests.

Labour intends to change the rules so that opencast mining will be permitted only where it benefits the local community and environment. We also believe that the law should be changed to protect communities from repeated applications for the same or similar opencast developments. The Bill could have done that, but it does not.

I shall give an example of what is so upsetting for local people. In north-west Leicestershire, in 1993, an application to opencast a 500-acre site was rejected. At that time, the site was called Coalfield West. Now, the villages of Heather, Normanton-le-Heath and Ravenstone are beset by another application to opencast the same site—only this time, it is called Thorntree. As far as the local people are concerned, enough is enough. They want no to mean no. They want the law to be changed, and so do we.

What about the problems that people face when they are ill in rural areas? Their problems are mainly connected with transport, which parishes may wish to try to deal with under the new powers set out in the Bill. The national health service, whose anniversary was yesterday, was founded on the principle that the best health services should be available to all, wherever people live or whatever their circumstances. But that is not so in many rural areas. There, the groups most in need of health care—children, women of childbearing age and people who are poor, disabled or old—have the least access to the NHS. Instead, rural health care is most readily available to the best-off and healthiest people. That cannot be the right priority.

People living in rural areas need treatment even if they do not have enough sick relatives and neighbours nearby to attract a doctor to set up in their village. Similarly, they may need a hospital or an ambulance even if they, their family and their neighbours will not use either as intensively as the residents of a more densely populated suburb or town. They will still need a hospital and an ambulance service.

Unfortunately, most of the changes in the NHS have made matters worse. Countless local hospitals have been closed or have seen the number of beds reduced in the NHS's mad dash for centralisation. Leicestershire presents a good example, because it has experienced the closure or partial closure of Markfield hospital, Zachary Merton home, Ellen Towle home and Groby Road hospital, while services have been concentrated in the city of Leicester.

What about the problem of schools in rural areas? That, too, is very much a question of distance and transport. Hundreds of village primary schools have gone, as local education authorities have been forced to respond to Government and Audit Commission pressure to reduce the number of places. Village schools make a vital contribution to village life. The Government could have included some help in the Bill, but they have not. Instead, they are proposing to make matters worse.

As the Secretary of State for Education and Employment said, where there is only one school, there is no choice. That is true in many rural areas. In many sparsely populated areas, not only is there only one primary school, but only one or, at most, two secondary schools are within reach, usually in or near the local market town. They are usually genuinely comprehensive, taking in pupils of a full range of abilities. They are successful comprehensives, but what would happen if the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment got their way and tried to set up a grammar school in every town? That would foul up the whole system—and I am not the only one to say that.

To his credit, the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), who is in his place and knows that I am about to mention what he said, told the House about the two comprehensive schools in Kendal—

"one the old grammar school and the other the former secondary modern school, whose A-level examination results last year showed them to be the 14th best state school in the country and the best comprehensive school in the country."

He then advised the Secretary of State to

"remember the old adage: 'if it works, don't start trying to fix it'."—[Official Report, 25 June 1996; Vol. 280, c. 162.]

Sadly, many other schools will soon be at risk from the "Gill'll fix it" brigade.

It is not just a matter of Government policies having made country living more difficult in the past. They are still at it, and their most recent policies are likely to prove just as harmful.

Parish councils have powers to protect rights of way and to promote their use by signposting and other means. Unfortunately, neither they nor highway authorities have the power to do anything to counter what is happening to footpaths through woodlands, as a result of the Government forcing the Forestry Commission to sell off individual stretches of woodland.

Figures produced in response to parliamentary questions asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), the vice-president of the Ramblers Association, and my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) show that, until April this year, 92 per cent. of those woodlands had been sold without any agreement to retain public access. Of 81 woodlands up for sale in June, only 14 had agreements to safeguard public access.

The Government do not understand the depth of feeling on the subject. Privatisation is restricting ancient rights and customs, producing large gains for the privileged few and a loss of amenity for everyone else. New landlords are telling people that they can no longer go where they have wandered unhindered for generations. I know exactly how they feel.

As my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) said, the Forestry Commission is to sell off Hagg wood in Dunningham, the village where I was born and grew up, and which I still frequently visit. I have walked over every part of that 100-acre wood since I first went there on my father's shoulders with my grandfather. Later, I went there with my brother and my friends, and in due course I took my own children there, so four generations of my family—and others in the village—have roamed all over the wood. Now, as a result of Government policy, access is to be restricted, partly as a result of the actions of the Forestry Commission and partly by the Church Commissioners, who own the shooting rights. It gives a whole new meaning to the phrase "church militant".

That is happening all over the country. The rights of access to woodlands should be extended, not restricted, and the Bill could have made the necessary changes, but it does not. We shall be tabling amendments to that effect.

Mr. Bayley: Is my hon. Friend aware that, according to the Register of Members' Interests, the Secretary of State for the Environment used to be an adviser on legal and parliamentary affairs to the Country Landowners Association? Does my hon. Friend agree that the Secretary of State might have made a mistake about the role to take when the Bill was drafted, by proposing a significant tax exemption for landowners on their country estates?

Mr. Dobson: I have made it a general principle that, although the Secretary of State usually devotes about 10 minutes of every speech to personal attacks on me, I do not indulge in personal attacks on him.

Many people remain concerned about other treasured aspects of the rural landscape, including hedgerows. After 17 years of promising protection for hedgerows, the Government are at long last consulting on draft regulations. They spent 17 years drifting before they could start drafting. In the meantime, more than 200,000 km of hedgerows have been rooted out. At the present rate of loss, every existing hedgerow will be gone within 20 years.

Existing measures to protect other landscape features are all too frequently overridden. The privatisation and break-up of the power industry has resulted in an increase in power lines that otherwise would not have occurred. The much contested proposal to build a duplicate line of pylons down the vale of York is just one example.

Although they have done nothing about those matters, the Government have found time and space to include one extraordinary measure in the Bill: the proposal to do away with the business rate on shooting and fishing rights, which have been subject to rates for more than 100 years because they are a valuable asset. That rating is now to be abolished, at a cost of about £5 million. The Government have introduced 22 new taxes on everyone else, but they have now decided to bung £5 million to their friends at the top end of the shooting and fishing market.

I challenge the Government to say whether the concession will benefit ordinary anglers or shooters. Are they really claiming that a fishing licence will cost less? It is a racket. The £5 million concession will bring most benefit to the wealthiest and least benefit to the poorest, so it is a good example of Tory priorities.

The Government have tried to explain that away by saying that the Bill brings England and Wales into line with Scotland, but when they proposed abolishing the tax in Scotland, they said that it was to bring Scotland into line with England and Wales. It is a tax concession for the landed gentry, a backhander for the best-off.

The Government claim that the field sports industry is worth £2,700 million a year. A £2,700 million industry does not need £5 million a year. The measure is intended to help not the industry but a limited number of toffs.

The concession is designed to please the House of Lords. It could be a pay-off to the hereditary peers who turned up to support the Government changing the law to make it more likely that homeless people would have to live in cardboard boxes. They are the stately hypocrites of England.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): Does the hon. Gentleman realise that the business of sporting rights works both ways? For example, if the owner of Hagg wood let that wood to the Forestry Commission, but did not wish to exercise his shooting rights, he would still have to pay the rates on it. Those who have land that they let and who, for various reasons, do not wish to exercise their sporting rights—of whom there are many—will also be better off under the proposal.

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman raises two issues. First, it is not clear whether the Church Commissioners pay business rates, although the right hon. Member representing the Church Commissioners, who also represents Hagg wood, might be able to enlighten us.

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): I do not know whether to catch the hon. Gentleman's eye to respond to some of the points that he raised, or yours, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope that, in due course, I shall successfully catch someone's eye and nail many of the misrepresentations and false points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. If the right hon. Gentleman seeks to intervene, that must be a matter for the hon. Gentleman who has the Floor. If he seeks to catch my eye during the debate, I shall of course bear it in mind.

Mr. Dobson: I am perfectly willing to give way to the right hon. Gentleman, but perhaps it would be better if I dealt with the points raised by the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson).

The fact that somebody pays a tax does not make it a terrible burden. When the tax was abolished in Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) spoke against its abolition, pointing out that he was probably the only person in the Chamber who actually paid it, because as a big landowner he had shooting rights on which he paid £100 in tax. As he pointed out, someone with so much property will usually be sufficiently well off not to have to go cringing to the Secretary of State and ask to be let off at the expense of others.

Mr. Matthew Banks (Southport): It is marginal and hardly worth collecting.

Mr. Dobson: The Secretary of State told my hon. Friend the Member for York that it would be entirely marginal, but apparently it is so marginal that we can ignore it if we are making that argument, yet the Secretary of State is also trying to tell us that it is crucial to the future of the field sports industry. The Government will have to make up their mind.

I have a great deal of respect for the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), but I must tell him that, to the best of my knowledge, I have said nothing about Hagg wood but the truth. I take great care with what I say. Until now, people have been able to use the wood without let or hindrance, going where they like. Even a combination of the Church Commissioners and the Forestry Commission cannot do away with certain rights of way through the wood. However, we have been told that, if the wood is sold, as part of the transaction the Church Commissioners will refuse to allow people the access that they have had before. They will be confined to the rights of way. That greatly diminishes the amenity.

All the hereditary owners of grouse moors and fishing rights will get a tax cut, but there are other sports in this country. Sports clubs that serve hundreds of thousands of less well-connected communities will still have to pay their rates. If the Government are interested in sport, why not pass a measure for all sporting industries rather than just one? It is a measure for the privileged few, with no money for anybody else.

At the very least, the concession should have been made available only to owners who intended to permit genuine public access to the land. If the Government do not support amendments that we shall table to secure such access, they will confirm that they remain the party of the privileged. The Prime Minister may want to go back to the old grouse moor image, although I think that he will have his work cut out.

While the Government have been in power, there has been a big increase in unemployment in rural areas. Many of those working there are badly paid. But for the opposition of the agricultural workers section of the Transport and General Workers Union, ably assisted by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), even more people in rural areas might have been receiving low wages, because the Government wanted to get rid of the agricultural wages board. They eventually gave up when they finally had to concede that the farmers did not want rid of the board.

No current debate on rural areas can avoid a mention of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, which has been extremely damaging. It is probably the biggest catastrophe to hit rural Britain this century—there are only three years left in the century. The Government's handling of the issue has been inept from start to finish. They have lurched from complacency to panic, gone back to complacency and then panicked again. They are still nowhere near resolving the issue. Their crass ineptitude has made life well nigh impossible for farmers and others working in rural-based industries. The Government's handling of the beef crisis has made them the toast of the vegetarian movement.

Despite that, the Secretary of State attempts to portray the Tory party as the party of rural England. He gets upset when Labour Members refer to rural affairs. He is out of date and out of touch. These days, the Labour party represents communities in every part of England, from the centres of the largest cities to the smallest hamlets, through suburbs, market towns and villages. Rural England is not a no-go area for Labour. Throughout England, many predominantly rural areas have elected Labour representatives to parish, district and county councils, to the Westminster Parliament and to the European Parliament. That is one good reason why our policies include practical answers to the day-to-day problems faced by communities throughout rural Britain.

The leader of the Labour party represents Sedgefield—a mainly rural constituency in the north of England. His predecessor, John Smith, grew up in rural Scotland. His predecessor, Neil Kinnock, grew up in and represented a fairly rural part of Wales. There is nothing recent or strange about Labour's commitment to rural areas.

Labour covers the whole country, and our policies, including those on local government and rating, address the problems of the whole country. That must be right, because on planning policy, housing policy, environment policy or rating policy, we cannot separate what happens in towns from what happens in the country. They affect one another and they always will.

Consider the way in which the decline of market towns harms their residents and those from miles around. Leek, in Staffordshire—known as the Queen of the Moorlands—ought to be a prosperous market town, but it is a shadow of its former self. It had its own county court 20 years ago, but it has lost that, along with its Crown post office and its jobcentre. Its tax and benefits office is under threat for the second time. Magistrates courts in Biddulph and Kidsgrove have closed recently, and it is feared that Leek magistrates court will follow suit. Banks are withdrawing from the town, and more and more local people are forced to travel elsewhere for work. The cattle market has been badly hit by the BSE crisis. That is just one of the market towns in trouble under the Tories.

Town and country depend on one another. Their relationship is symbiotic—they live off one another to their mutual advantage. However, the countryside exists not just to serve the needs of towns and townspeople. It is also the place where local people live, die, work, play and have their being.

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about Leek, because I know the area well, representing a neighbouring constituency. Would he care to contrast the situation in Leek, which is under the Labour-controlled Staffordshire Moorlands council, with that of the neighbouring borough of Macclesfield—a booming market town with a Conservative council?

Mr. Dobson: There are some substantial differences between the two places, including a considerable difference in population. One of those towns has the advantage of being on the west coast main line. That would be a greater advantage if the Government had not allowed the line to run down.

In the first speech that I made as shadow Secretary of State for the Environment, I spelled out the importance to us all of having a sense of place, personal loyalty and concern. People have that sense of place in the Yorkshire village where I was born and lived for the first 19 years of my life. They have it equally in Holborn, Camden Town and Kentish Town—the areas that I represent in Parliament. In government, we want to draw on that sense of place and local loyalty, that personal commitment of individuals and communities, so that we can work in partnership to make the whole country, urban and rural, more prosperous, safe, clean and healthy and make each part of our country more desirable.

To the extent that most of the Bill is a limited move in the right direction, we give it a critical welcome. We shall seek to improve it in Committee. The most necessary changes must await Labour's victory in the coming general election.

5.17 pm

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): The Bill offers real, positive help to rural communities. It was a pity that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) spent so little time talking about its main purpose, which is to help village shops, and so much time airing his prejudices against those whom he described as "toffs"—a term which shows his lack of understanding of those who live in the countryside—and his prejudices against country sports. However, it is probably better to gloss over the barrage of inaccuracies from the hon. Gentleman and return to the Bill, which is a practical and helpful measure. It may well be possible to improve it in Committee, but it is a good Bill and I warmly welcome it.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to the parish of Stone, near Faversham, in my constituency. Alas, the boundary commission is removing that parish, for the extraordinary reason that nobody lives there. There is a fine Romano-British Christian church surrounded by a burial ground, but alas, we cannot consult those people. Nevertheless, some of us do not want the parish to be removed.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: With regard to parishes without populations, my hon. Friend may be aware that Dallinghoo in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State contained a parish called Dallinghoo Weald, which I represented as a county councillor many years ago, but I am sad to say that my right hon. Friend encouraged its amalgamation and so we lost another such parish.

Sir Roger Moate rose—

Mr. Gummer: For the record, I fought hard against the abolition of Dallinghoo Weald and of Havergate island, but I am afraid that the sensible policies that I intend to implement did not apply at that time. I will ensure that the necessary change in policy is carried through.

Sir Roger Moate: We should have liked to keep the parish of Stone, but it is hard to argue the case when there are no residents there.

Under the consultation requirements, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will seek to ensure that planning authorities advise parishes of the reasons why planning applications are rejected or accepted contrary to the wishes of the parish council. That is a matter of some significance, and the news will be warmly welcomed by parish councils which find the way in which the system operates at present to be irksome.

I wish to refer to the main thrust of the Bill—the help for village shops. Like other hon. Members, I have offered my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer my advice on what the Budget should contain, and my main suggestion was that we should try to reduce, and eventually eliminate, the unified business rate. I argued for that because I believe that the removal of that burden would do more than anything else to stimulate the small businesses of this country and to encourage enterprise. Alas, it is a £12 billion tax—a little beyond the probable scope of one Budget, and certainly beyond the scope of the Bill.

Nevertheless, I see the Bill as a £22 million start, as that is the estimated cost of the rural rate relief scheme proposed in it. One of the reasons why I welcome the Bill is that it is the first crack in the structure of the business property tax, which is still based on the totally artificial device of notional rental values. That flawed concept eventually destroyed the old domestic rating system, and I welcome this move as a small step in the right direction.

I also welcome the fact that the Bill is specifically aimed at helping those small shops which are an essential part of the fabric of rural life and of small communities. If we are going to start anywhere, this is probably the right place. A 50 per cent. mandatory reduction in rates will be immensely important to shops in my constituency, the county of Kent and the rest of the United Kingdom. A 100 per cent. discretionary reduction could also be crucial, as it could help shops to survive and also encourage new shops to open. We are all aware of enterprising individuals who are seeking to establish new businesses in rural areas. It is a difficult challenge, and this type of help is important.

The proposals beg more questions than they answer. That is why the Committee stage will be so important. We should not always complain about what we have been given and say that we should have been given more. Inevitably, however, the Bill's provisions lead to crucial questions. I am not clear from the Bill, or from the answers given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today, why we are applying the concessions only to village general stores and village post offices, as other retail activities in our villages are also important—equally so, in some cases.

The village butcher, for example, is a much treasured retail establishment in many villages and should be supported. Also, small souvenir shops in rural communities, picture framing shops, book shops, pubs—as have been mentioned—and garages should also receive support. One can understand the argument that the general store offers a crucial lifeline for many people, but all those other establishments play a crucial role in the rural economy, and we should try to help them. I hope that we can explore the possibility of a more flexible definition in Committee.

Mr. Rendel: That is an interesting point, which comes back to an intervention that I made on the Secretary of State, who unfortunately did not attempt to answer it. The hon. Member is perhaps mistaken in thinking that the definition needs greater flexibility, as the Bill simply refers to businesses which may "benefit the local community". It is possible to interpret that widely to include businesses which benefit the local community by employing a large part of the local work force. What is needed is a change of mind from the Government on how the Bill could be interpreted, rather than a change in the Bill itself.

Sir Roger Moate: The Bill refers specifically to general stores and post offices. The hon. Gentleman will find that the definition is drawn fairly narrowly.

That leads me on to the discretionary 100 per cent. grant. Again, I am not clear how this will operate. Will it operate at the discretion of local authorities for one shop as opposed to another, or will it apply to a broad category of premises or businesses across an area? If it is the latter, the measure may be much more expensive than the Government expect. It will be difficult to exercise a judgment in favour of one business against another, particularly if it is not being done on the basis of need or following means testing. It is a good principle to give local authorities the power to help small businesses, but we must get it right. This is a marvellous opportunity: we must build on it and explore how the system will work.

My next question has been touched upon already and concerns the rural area itself. What is a rural settlement? The definition, we are told, is a rural settlement with a population of 3,000. But is that a parish boundary? Is it a large village, or a small town? It is hard to define the terms. I fully understand the Government's saying that this is a difficult matter and that it is preferable to do something than to do nothing, but there are large villages in every area with populations of more than 3,000 whose village stores are just as much in need of support as those with populations under 3,000. It will be hard to give grants to a small village while another village further away gets no grant at all.

Mr. Wigley: During the consultation in Wales, the Secretary of State for Wales at one stage referred to the density of the population in relation to the definition. I do not know whether that was referred to during the consultation in England or whether it is irrelevant. Does the hon. Gentleman have any thoughts on that? Could such an approach deal with the question of where those 3,000 people can live?

Sir Roger Moate: I am not aware of any such consultation; nor do I want it to be thought that I am suggesting that this is a simple matter when it is not.

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend. The definitions of rurality are different in the Principality from those applied in England. In Wales, a concept of population density is used which draws on an Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development definition. In England, we use the concept of a settlement, a well known Rural Development Commission definition of rurality.

[Mr. David Curry]

When we introduced the housing legislation, questions were raised about the right to buy in rural settlements. Those settlements were drawn up on the RDC definition, and we published detailed maps and explanations of the areas concerned. We did not want to be stuck with the concept of a parish or a village as that was often a less generous definition of a settlement than the one that we had.

I shall be happy to try to expand on the matter when I wind up the debate. If my hon. Friend wishes to explore it further, I have no doubt that conversations will take place in Committee about definition problems.

Sir Roger Moate: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, because he has confirmed that the Government will seek to interpret the definition generously and flexibly, whether or not it meets people's requirements. That is the right spirit and I hope that the legislation will eventually reflect that sensible and helpful objective.

The definitions are important if we are to make the legislation work well for villages and create good will rather than animosity and jealousy. We desperately want to get them right because this is a splendid Bill which will be helpful and provide genuine assistance to the rural community.

That point leads me to the bigger issue which prompted me to write to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and urge that the burden of the business rate eventually be lifted altogether. The problems facing market towns and high streets have already been mentioned. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is an amiable chap, but some of his comments were nonsense. We all know that enormous changes have taken place in the retail world and that tremendous social pressures have created great problems in many of our communities. Supermarkets, whether in the heart of town or out of town—we all have many examples in our constituencies—have had a tremendous impact on our market towns and high streets. We have to face that fact rather than make the kind of nonsensical accusations in which the hon. Member indulged.

In my area—I am sure that others have the same problems—the small high streets are fighting the battle for survival, not because of politics and the performance of the economy, but because of the changing pattern of shopping. Many of those shops will struggle to survive and the greatest help that we could give them is relief from the unified business rate.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my hon. Friend suggesting that we should give business rate relief to the high street shop but not to the out-of-town superstore? If we do away with business rates for every shop, that will not advantage the high street stores.

Sir Roger Moate: I believe that we must, and will, eventually get rid of the system of business rating completely. It is an anomalous and outdated system. I welcome the Bill, because it creates exemptions from business rates, and we have not had many exemptions in the past. Once we pull out one brick, the whole edifice will start to crumble.

We must build on the propositions in the Bill. The business rate is not an efficient or sensible system of taxation although, alas, it raises a lot of revenue now and will not be easy to abolish. It is not a local tax, which was its original concept, and the fact that it is based on property values and notional rental values means that it is fundamentally nonsense. All the evidence shows that it is an unfair tax, and I have figures to show that it hurts smaller businesses much more than bigger ones. My figures suggest that less than 6 per cent. of total rateable value is accounted for by properties with a rateable value of less than £1,000, which suggests that we could lighten the burden on those business without losing too much revenue. I have other figures which show that, in terms of profit and turnover, a small business pays 10 times as much, on average, in business rate as the largest of firms.

If we consider the impact of rates as a percentage of overheads, we see that the unified business rate bill for small businesses is 13.7 per cent. of overheads, but for large businesses the figure is 3 per cent. of overheads. By reducing or eliminating the business rate, we would give disproportionate help to smaller companies. Clearly, it would help larger companies if we eliminated business rates, but in practice the price war between the big stores would probably mean that much of any saving that they made would be passed on in concessions to their customers. However, high street businesses would receive major help.

That is why I hope that the Government will consider any suggestions for reducing the burden of business rates on the retail sector and replacing it, ultimately, with much fairer systems of corporate tax, which are more acceptable to the general public and to business. The Bill is only the beginning, but I welcome it for that reason. If it is well handled, the proposal for rate relief will help my constituents and those of most other hon. Members.

Other proposals in the Bill will strengthen the role of parish councils. In some respects, the proposals amend the Local Government Act 1972. I served on the Committee stage of that legislation, which went on for many months. I have no nostalgia for that, but I look back with some pride on the battle that I and other hon. Members fought then to strengthen the roles of successor parishes and community councils. It was not generally accepted by the Government at the time, but I believe that parish councils are a crucial part of local government because they represent the local community in a way that other councils cannot.

Some of the proposals in the Bill, albeit relatively small, will be important to those who control our parish councils, especially the right to levy greater rates and more powers on transport, roads and crime prevention. Of course, it is one thing to give people powers and another to find the resources. That is a problem at any level of government. Nevertheless, the Bill will be a catalyst and will provide extra power for parish councils, so that, in co-operation with local authorities and other institutions, they will be able to tackle challenges that they cannot tackle now.

Because I believe in parish councils, I especially welcome the proposals in the Bill to facilitate the creation of new parishes, which is currently a cumbersome procedure. Most of us know areas in our constituencies which do not have parish councils, but the current procedures to create them are difficult. The Bill will make it easier to create parish councils, and I welcome that.

Those small measures are all important and, in years to come, all will be seen to have contributed significantly to the strength of rural communities and the rural economy.

I conclude with a more general point. The Bill, the White Paper and the speeches that we have heard have emphasised time and again our belief in the countryside and the rural economy, but those of us who live in or represent rural areas—my constituency is both heavily industrial and heavily rural, so I have a bit of everything—worry when we see the inexorable demands placed on the countryside by the housing growth figures endorsed by central Government.

Unless we get the planning guidance right, there is little point in defending the countryside. Despite all the fine words about building on brown land and reclaimed land, we see the inexorable threat of more developments around our villages, orchards and farmlands. The planners tell us that, in the next 20 years, some 4.4 million new households will be required; I forget the exact figure, but somehow those planners have become family planners and have gained powers of infallibility in the process. I do not understand why we accept those assertions as though they were written on tablets of stone.

We are also told by the planning guidelines, which have already been mentioned, that 45 to 50 per cent. of the new housing has to be built on reclaimed land, but there is no reclaimable land in many rural areas. If those high target figures for housing are accepted as gospel truth and the houses have to be built on reclaimed land when in fact we have no reclaimable land, in the end they will be built on agricultural land. The Ministry of Agriculture sometimes enters objections, but those objections seem to melt away like the snow and disappear. The result is continuous and unacceptable growth.

I want the Secretary of State and his Department to provide in the planning process more entrenched protections against encroachment into the countryside. If that is not done and encroachment is too easy, there will be no pressure to use derelict and reclaimable land and no initiatives for new planning policy in urban areas.

I welcome the whole package in the Bill as a real effort to improve our countryside. I want to strengthen the defences of the countryside, because we all want to see the rural economy prosper. We hope during the progress of the Bill to make it even better, but it is already a good start.

5.39 pm

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I hope that the Bill will be the last piece of local government legislation that the Government bring before the House. The Library tells me that there have been more than 200 pieces of legislation affecting local government since the Tories took office in 1979. Those have left a once proud system of local democracy in a shambles, so let us all hope that this will be the last of them.

The Bill is narrowly focused, closely directed at parliamentary seats in which Tories are defecting in droves and putting Tory majorities at risk. It is a fairly blatant last-ditch attempt to win votes in marginal seats. That is a shame, because much in the Bill is worthy of support. The drawback stems from the motive that has driven it on to the Government's last legislative agenda.

There are two principal problems. First, the Bill's effect will be marginalised, because it is out of line with the drift of mainstream Government policies. The thrust of those policies, whether on jobs, transport, housing, industry or even agriculture—the bovine spongiform encephalopathy crisis has significantly added to poverty among small farmers—has damaged rural and urban economies and communities alike.

The second principal problem is that, without any new resources, other than an apparently unlimited parish precept—all new tax—and with a lack of clarity about the cost-effectiveness and the arrangements for establishing an additional layer of bureaucracy, it is doubtful whether the Bill's worthy ambitions of greater community participation and public good will be realised.

We live on a crowded island, and urban decay and rural communities are close neighbours. I am not sure that the measures in the Bill will not serve to exacerbate existing tensions and help to set urban areas against rural areas in a negative way, rather than producing a positive result. For example, the decision to put crime prevention policies in place could be driven by the feeling, "Let's keep the townies out of our little area," rather than being a valuable attempt to build more satisfactory social cohesion. Could that measure be seen, as I read in the Local Government Chronicle this week, as little more than a "subsidy for the middle classes"?

When the Environment Select Committee read the White Paper, we were delighted that the Government had acknowledged—

Sir Roger Moate: I am genuinely puzzled by what the hon. Lady says. In a typical village, the people who use the store are not middle class; everybody uses it. Why does the hon. Lady think that helping a village shop to survive is help for the middle classes?

Mrs. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman should wait for me to continue my speech. I was citing the concerns expressed by a wide range of local authorities in the Local Government Chronicle. I believe that they could be right about one of the effects of the Bill, and I shall explain how and why.

Unemployment in rural communities has wide effects throughout the country. If more Conservative Members represented urban areas, they would realise that the problems of rural unemployment are mirrored and multiplied by unemployment in the urban areas that Labour Members tend to represent. Indeed, as a result of Government policies, the effects of unemployment and poverty are spreading like a disease to every part of the country.

For example, the town of Stocksbridge in my constituency is nearly 10 miles from Sheffield, yet, as part of the Government's programme of cuts and part of the so-called benefit change programme, it is proposed to close both the jobcentre and the Benefits Agency office from 1 January. That will affect people living in all the rural communities around Stocksbridge. They will have to pay £1.40 there and £1.40 back on the bus even to go and look for a job, and the same to go for an interview about their benefit. That will not promote the health and welfare of rural areas, yet there is nothing about it in the Bill.

There is nothing to help with housing, either. When the Select Committee considered housing need, we made strong, well-supported, cross-party recommendations about the need for more affordable housing in rural areas. It is a pity that there is nothing in the Bill to address that continuing problem.

The same applies to education, which my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) mentioned. My constituency was faced with a proposal to put three rural schools on the closure list because of Government pressure to close schools with surplus places. Only after an enormous effort and a campaign by people in the rural communities dependent on the schools were the Government persuaded to allow the local authority to keep two of the three schools open.

Those are the Government policies that people in the rural areas of my constituency will remember; although they will welcome what is in the Bill, they will be aware of the wider issues, and the fact that wider Government policy is doing them no good.

I shall now be a bit more positive, in that I welcome the proposal to help shops, post offices and other businesses in rural areas with their business rates to enable them to survive. I should like an assurance today from the Minister that such measures will be allowed where villages and rural communities are part of a metropolitan area. I was concerned to hear an exchange between the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) which implied that that might not happen.

The residents of Bolsterstone, Dungworth, Bradfield and Wharncliffe Side—all villages with fewer than 3,000 inhabitants and one general store—will be extremely angry if the proposal does not extend to them and to their shops and communities, simply because they are on the rural fringe of a large urban area. That would be extremely unsatisfactory. Many of the seats that the Government intend the proposals in the Bill to protect are part of rural areas on the edges of major urban areas. Unless the Government understand the essential link between urban and rural, which is now so close, the drive behind the Bill will not be fulfilled.

To be positive, I should like to believe that the proposals on transport are a long-overdue recognition that bus deregulation has been an unmitigated disaster in rural areas. Three quarters of all rural parishes now have no bus service. Where services run on a commercial basis, they can be restricted, changed or cut altogether at short notice. That happened recently in Colne valley, for example, where the Blue Bus company suddenly and without consultation withdrew its services from Slaithewaite Hill Top through Wellhouse and Milnesbridge to Huddersfield, affecting 1,000 people and their bus journeys.

Only because of a concerted campaign by the local community, backed by Labour, was another bus company persuaded to fill the gap—but for how long? When will the next company withdraw the service without consultation? Similar things have happened in my constituency in connection with the Bradfield school and its bus services. There is absolute chaos, because of the lack of certainty that bus deregulation has meant for rural areas.

I welcome the possibility that the drive, advice and guidelines aimed at extending community transport schemes and local bus-sharing initiatives, which may well be promoted by parish councils, will be beneficial to people in rural areas. I am sure that the Opposition would support that.

I turn to the other main drawback. I agree with the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) that there is a lack of clarity about the role and nature of the devolution of such services to parish councils and its effect. I agree with the thrust of the proposals that parish councils should provide a chance for local action. They provide an opportunity for voluntary work and a strengthening of the sort of community activity that is effective in preventing crime and promoting the rich variety of cultural life enjoyed by many villages.

I should like to place on record the excellent efforts of Bradfield, one of my parish councils, which looks after all 200 miles of footpaths in my constituency and has been partly responsible for South Yorkshire coming top of the footpath league in the recent Countryside Commission report on the state of rights of way. It is at such a local level that women in the community can play a very active role in developing community initiatives.

My worries about lack of clarity, however, are founded on the fact that other community and voluntary-based groups also undertake excellent work—possibly on a wider basis than the parishes—such as the Sheffield community transport scheme. The group operates services in rural areas and throughout the city. It has an excellent partnership arrangement, funded by the city council, to which parishes contribute, but it is an independent, voluntary group. I could mention other groups, and I am sure that other hon. Members could cite similar examples.

What concerns me is that, in Sheffield's experience, it has been easier to build sound partnerships between the local authority and such independent development trusts or groups, with some support from parish councils, than it has been to build them between authorities—higher tier with lower tier. It concerns me that putting too much emphasis on the parish council undertaking this work will mean that the drive towards partnership that allows two authorities to work together will be lost.

There is no question—we in the House know—but that much of the time of an elected authority at any level can be spent in moaning, groaning and criticising the higher tier rather than getting on with implementing the positive policies. Authorities may have their own political agendas, and may even find it more appropriate to that agenda to carry on their lobbying roles rather than getting on with implementing the very useful proposals in the Bill. That is relevant not just to developing a two-tier system within a relatively urban rural area; such activity in parish councils in more rural district local authority or county areas could be a recipe for conflict rather than positive progress.

It is important, therefore, that, where a parish council decides to take on new work and responsibility, it is prepared to carry the can for failure as well as for success. I assume that the district audit service will have to assume an additional role in monitoring the spending of parish councils where they take on extra work. There is still not enough clarity about where the functions will begin and end, how those functions will be financed and what limitations will be placed on them.

For example, if a parish decides to raise its precept—even double it—to take on road safety and traffic-calming measures, how will that affect the district allocation for road safety? Do the Government expect that allocation to remain more or less the same, or will it be reduced as the parish precept is increased? If the latter happens, there would be a serious danger of skewing the overall authority's priorities. If one area on the fringe of the authority wants to implement traffic-calming measures, therefore, will it take away the possibility of the wider authority introducing the same measures in a wider area?

An enormous number of complications will need to be addressed and sorted out in Committee to ensure that extra money is provided for these proposals. In his winding-up speech, will the Minister address the point made in an intervention by one of my hon. Friends about whether increased spending as a result of an increased precept by a parish council or a number of them in a larger area will affect the overall spending allocation that is taken on board where capping criteria are set? We need an absolute guarantee that, pound for pound, the proposals will not affect what the umbrella authority will be able to spend.

Such issues are extremely important, since a wider authority may end up failing the majority of its citizens because of the activity of one or two fringe areas. The Bill's lack of clarity on such financial issues will produce endless wrangles rather than productive projects, many of which are already under way.

I wish the Bill well in principle. I am sorry that it has been presented at a time and in a way that looks as if it is window dressing for targeted areas of the country. I do not believe that voters will be fooled, because the wider issues that affect the economy and people's standard of living are not restricted to either rural or urban areas. Such problems face both types of area and we badly need a Government who begin to legislate for the whole nation.

5.58 pm

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I give a general welcome to the Bill, which is timely. It is right that the House should have the opportunity to consider some of the problems that face rural communities. I agree with the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) when she says that there is much work to be done on the detail of the Bill, and some of my remarks will concern details that are as yet a little unclear. The rural White Paper set out the direction in which the Government intended to go, and the Bill contains the first set of measures that were adumbrated in that White Paper.

I represent two thirds of the borough of Thamesdown in Wiltshire, which is a mixture of urban and rural communities. It was formed in 1973 by bringing together the town of Swindon with several smaller towns and villages in what was then the Highworth rural district council. There was some unease at that time, some of which still remains.

However, whereas in those days the name Swindon was not acceptable to everyone in the new borough—which is why the name Thamesdown was concocted, from the River Thames to the north and the Marlborough downs to the south—as the authority moves towards unitary status next year, it appears to be satisfactory to the majority of the population for the name Swindon to be brought back into use. For those hon. Members who have had some difficulty with the concept of Thamesdown, and assumed that it was somewhere down the river from here, the confusion will be removed.

The combination of urban and rural creates a sense of uncertainty and fear in the villages, some of which are near enough to the urban mass of Swindon to feel threatened by creeping expansion, but distant enough to be extremely independent-minded.

The rate relief scheme, which is in my view the principal proposal in the Bill, is welcome in principle, but there are some questions that the Government must address. For example, the upper limit has been set at about 3,000 people, but should there be a lower limit? Could a settlement be so small that it would not be possible to justify expenditure as set out in the Bill to ensure the continuation of a small shop or post office? I hope that the answer is no, but I would appreciate a reassurance from the Government that such a consideration would not enter their mind.

I think, for example, of the village of Hinton Parva in Thamesdown, the mere name of which will tell Latin scholars in the House that it is a small settlement—it has about 200 inhabitants. The post office operates part time and is run from their garage by John and Margaret Cook of Hollytree house, which, ironically, is next door to a house called The Old Post Office. Hon. Members will be able to guess what happened to the old post office. It is an example of people trying to maintain postal services in a village.

Will a part-time post office in a garage qualify for the relief that is designed to help rural post offices? I seek reassurance from my right hon. Friend the Minister on that point, because that is what the village of Hinton Parva has been reduced to, and I am sure that all the inhabitants are anxious to ensure that their access to postal services is reduced no further.

What about villages that have already lost their local shop or post office? Will the relief be available immediately to any individual seeking to provide those services afresh? Can we look to the Government, or to the local authority as it will be, to offer that relief?

What about settlements that are too large to qualify? I am thinking of the smallish town of Wroughton, near Swindon, which is extremely anxious to find a bank willing to provide a branch in the town; none of the high street banks has been interested in offering banking services there. It is unreasonable to expect bank branches to be established in settlements with a population as low as 3,000, but would the Government consider setting a different size for different activities, so that a town such as Wroughton could get some help with its rates for payments to bank branches?

Such possibilities are raised by contemplation of what is in the Bill. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) ranged widely over many issues that are not in the Bill, so I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will forgive me for ranging on a much narrower scale and for enticing him to embrace the possibility that help could be given in other ways than the rather limited ones set out in the Bill.

What about village halls and schools? Could any help be given to promote the idea that village schools should be more widely used for community purposes, to extract the maximum value from buildings that might in future combine the two functions?

What about relief for a limited number of new dwellings in villages? More and more villages are finding it difficult to provide enough accommodation to enable young people to stay and keep the villages alive, while the growth of dormitory living—people living in villages and working in neighbouring towns—becomes ever more apparent. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras raised the matter in a rather gruff way, but it is reasonable that we should discuss it, perhaps at a later stage in the progress of the Bill.

Local rural transport is dealt with in part III of the Bill. We should pay tribute to the way in which post buses, provided by the Post Office, have over the years filled part of the gap in the needs of rural transport, but they do not operate in the evenings. Those who live in rural communities and do not have access to a car have a right to go into towns, and it would be good if the Bill encouraged parishes to promote rural transport more than they do at present.

The rate relief proposed is of two kinds: mandatory and discretionary. Experience teaches that discretionary relief is not always effective as a means of implementing Government policy. I am thinking of the discretion given to local authorities to reduce the level of community charge on second homes. The Government clearly thought that there was a case for doing that, and the local authorities clearly did not.

Mr. Wigley: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coombs: The hon. Gentleman's interjection does not entirely surprise me, but I am not talking about the rightness or wrongness of what the Government did; the point is that, if the Government want to do something, it is probably best for them to do it themselves and not leave it to others who might well decide not to do it. That could be the case with discretionary relief, because it is estimated that the cost to local authorities even of their 25 per cent. share will be £4 million. I am not altogether inclined to blame authorities that say that they would rather not part with any of the money to which they are entitled. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that.

Until recently, Thamesdown borough council did not allow the disregard on war pensions. The amount in question was only about £20,000, but for years several of my elderly constituents, with some help from me, fought a campaign to persuade the local authority to give a complete disregard on housing benefit for war pensions. I am glad to say that in the end the authority agreed, and that that is now being done. This is a good opportunity for me to congratulate Mr. Patrick Bourke, who led that campaign to its successful conclusion.

The campaign took a long time and cost many people a great deal of money. The Government were happy with the concept of discretion but were not inclined to do anything to promote it. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to think carefully about the concept of discretionary grants. If the Government want to achieve something in this direction, as they do, we need to consider whether local authorities are willing to support the policy.

I welcome the proposed new parish council powers on transport and crime prevention. I have already mentioned evening bus services to rural communities, which will clearly require co-operation with bus companies and with district and county councils if they are to be an effective additional measure. I also welcome the involvement of parishes in traffic calming, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Hillsborough. She is not now in her place, but I wanted to say again that I agree with her. I am sorry that she had to leave so precipitately.

Traffic calming gives local people much assurance. I was recently approached by residents of Kite hill and Rotten row in the village of Wanborough just outside the main urban area of Swindon with a request for traffic calming. Unfortunately, many cars had found a rat run and were making their way down a steep hill. Some negotiated the right-hand bend; others went straight into the field, once knocking down the gate. All of them cause the risk of death or injury to the many children who live there.

Mr. Lawrence Trout of Rotten row raised the matter with me. I automatically wrote to the local authority, Thamesdown borough council. Like the hon. Member for Hillsborough, I want to be clear about what the position will be. Should hon. Members write to the parish council or to the district council? What will be the balance of responsibility in a matter as important—and sometimes emotional—as traffic calming?

I do not want to delay the House. Much of what I was going to say has been covered by other hon. Members. I welcome this first tranche of measures to revitalise the countryside. They are designed to help country dwellers to help themselves. No matter what we may seek to do in the House to assist them, it is important that they understand their responsibilities.

One of those was eloquently expressed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State when he said that people who wanted to keep the village pub should be encouraged to drink there, although not to excess and not if they propose to drive. Happily, the rural areas of Thamesdown have so many pubs, so closely packed together, that the inhabitants will have no difficulty in walking a short distance to and from them to keep them alive. I look forward to supporting the further measures that were mentioned in the rural White Paper, which I am sure will be introduced by the Conservative Government elected some time next year.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): Like other hon. Members, I welcome the Bill in principle. It has many good things in it. There are some things that we do not like so much and, unfortunately, many things have been left out that should be in it. I shall not take up too much time, because much of the detail will be better dealt with in Committee.

The flavour of the Bill demonstrates the Government's rather colonial attitude to local authorities and their visible anxiety about the extent to which they are prepared to let go and devolve power downwards. The Secretary of State several times said that he believes in subsidiarity and wishes that district and county councils would demonstrate a greater fervour for it in devolving their power down to parish, town and community councils. I, too, want that to happen but I also wish that our national authority would devolve more power to lower levels.

I shall take the Bill part by part and start, logically, with part I, which concerns non-domestic rates and the changes to relief, which are, on the whole, welcome. Rural and village shops provide an essential service and are not simply businesses. It is welcome that more rate relief is being provided. The speech by the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) could easily have been made from our Bench. Perhaps that is a sign of things to come, given what has happened over the past few months. I welcomed the emphasis that he gave to the need to get rid of the uniform business rate altogether in the longer term. It has penalised small shops and businesses and favoured larger ones.

No doubt the Government have seen great benefits in favouring the larger businesses that provide a large part of their party's money. That is not a good reason for supporting that method of taxing businesses. I hope that we will ultimately abolish the UBR. I wish that the hon. Member for Faversham was here so that I could tell him that the fact that the Government are making small changes around the edges suggests that they have no real intention of abolishing the UBR in the near future, if at all.

Mr. Tim Smith: If the hon. Gentleman's party is committed to abolishing the UBR at a cost of £12 billion a year, what proposals has it to raise the revenue?

Mr. Rendel: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has paid so little attention to the alternatives that he does not know that we propose to introduce site value rating.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rendel: No, I have dealt with the point.

One of the ways in which the Government are failing to treat subsidiarity with the respect that it deserves—

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry to trouble the hon. Gentleman, but is he really proposing that a small business performing an essential service on a site that happens to be expensive will be driven out of business, whereas a large one on a small site will be privileged? Surely he realises that site value rating would be a disaster for the countryside. He ought to know that.

It is the oldest trick in the book. The hon. Gentleman talks about site value rating, thinks that no one understands and hopes that he can get away with it. The only party in the known world that thinks that site value rating is a good idea, particularly in the countryside, is the Liberal party. I thought that it had given that up when it changed its name.

Mr. Rendel: It is clear from his comments that the Secretary of State himself does not understand site value rating. If he examined it in more detail, he would understand its benefits.

Mr. Luff: Explain them to us.

Mr. Rendel: We are here to discuss the Bill, not site value rating. If hon. Members do not know about it, they should examine it. Perhaps that is why they have not accepted it as their policy.

We should consider whether the scheme should be mandatory or discretionary, because there is some illogicality there. The Government propose that part of the scheme should be mandatory and part discretionary. If they really wanted subsidiarity and to devolve power, they could afford to say that the whole scheme should be discretionary, which would be better. For example, under a mandatory scheme, it would be difficult to decide which businesses should get the mandatory benefit.

What about a village with two shops where one is part general store, part post office, and the other only a general store? As I understand it, in such a village, the shop that was part post office would get the mandatory benefit because it was the only post office in the area, while the other shop would not. That creates unfairness. Of course, if it has any sense, the local authority may use its discretionary powers to help the second shop, but there does not seem to be any logic behind making one part mandatory and the other discretionary.

Perhaps it is simply that the Government are looking for a way of bribing some small business men in some of their more marginal rural constituencies, but it may also be that they are worried about whether local authorities would use the discretionary power as they think appropriate. As the Liberal Democrats are now the leading party in the local authorities of rural areas—across the south of England and elsewhere—I can assure the Government that we do see the value of using rating relief, and would certainly use it in the sort of cases that they are examining. We understand the value of helping village centres to thrive.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Despite what the hon. Gentleman says, does he accept that, in the nine years that I have been in the House, the Liberal Democrats have always controlled local government on the Isle of Wight, yet despite my many urgings to use the existing relief, they have never done so once?

Mr. Rendel: I cannot speak for the Isle of Wight, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that many Liberal Democrat authorities use the relief. My authority in Newbury was one of the first to do so successfully.

There is also some difficulty in determining which communities will qualify for the rate relief. The difficulty is in deciding on the boundaries. Given the phrasing in the Bill, there will be a temptation for some local authorities to exclude certain surrounding areas so as to bring the population below the 3,000 threshold and ensure that the mandatory part of the relief is given. In that way they would hope to get more money out of the Government for their areas.

One can imagine considerable difficulties in calculating whether the threshold is met. While I am all in favour of the Government's plan to create a list of communities that meet the requirements—chopping and changing from year to year poses all sorts of difficulties for businesses trying to plan ahead—the Bill will still create certain definitional problems in this respect.

It is also important to specify in the Bill whether we are talking about communities that have only one shop and have only ever had one or communities that may have two shops, of which only one is currently functioning. The difficulties may arise if a second shop comes into being during a given year.

Another difficulty concerns how widely discretion is given to local authorities. I hope that the Minister will make the Government's real intentions somewhat clearer on that. The Bill allows a great deal of discretion to local authorities to give relief to local businesses of all sorts which are of benefit to the local community. If the Government intend to restrict the discretionary relief to shops, pubs, garages and post offices, the Bill will have to make that clear—because as it stands, it goes a lot wider. I want it to go wider, but I do not think that the Government really have that in mind.

I want to make two important points about the financing of the new relief. The discretionary power envisaged by the Government will be useless unless the additional financial burden on local authorities is taken into account in determining standard spending assessments and capping limits. If the Government do not give way on this point, they will in practice be asking local authorities to cut other vital services—schoolteachers, home helps or other social services—in order to pay for the discretionary rate relief being offered.

On 30 November last year, the Secretary of State made it clear that it was his intention to remove discretionary relief given on hardship grounds from the scope of capping. That was encouraging, but we need a clear commitment from the Secretary of State that this new relief will be exempted from capping in exactly the same way.

Mr. Gummer: Seventy-five per cent. of the discretionary relief will be paid by the central Exchequer—that is quite clear.

I have taken some trouble to check that I was right about site value rating. It means that the village shop would be taxed on the basis of what its site might be worth if it were not a village shop. So if it had a high value as something else, the village shop would be crushed by the rating burden. That is why the last known person to be enthusiastic about the system was the founder of the Social Credit Union.

Mr. Rendel: I do not know where the Secretary of State gets his information. The whole point about our system is that the site would be valued for the purpose for which it was intended, so a village shop would be valued as such. The right hon. Gentleman's point is therefore irrelevant.

Mr. Dobson: If it is of any help to the hon. Gentleman, I might point out in fairness that, at the time Henry George was advocating the system, Winston Churchill supported it.

Mr. Rendel: In practice I believe that we have now finished the point about site valuation; we are not debating it today, and it is a pity to waste the House's time any further on it. We need to discuss the Bill.

I should welcome an intervention from the Minister of State or the Secretary of State to answer my last important point—that, last year, the Secretary of State said that the amount of discretionary relief that local authorities would have to pay would not be included in the current capping limits. Is that true of this new relief as well?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman will be happy to know that it is true. I might add that the Liberal Democrat policy on site valuation rating is whatever a particular Liberal Democrat's constituent wants to hear. That is how all Liberal Democrat policies are put across to the public.

Mr. Rendel: That was not worth responding to.

I am glad to have the Secretary of State's commitment on my point about capping; he did not give it in his initial remarks, and it has been worrying some local authorities.

How will the changes be paid for? The Government estimate that the changes under the Bill will cost about £22 million across the three countries. Where will that money come from? It presumably means that the amount collected in the form of the UBR will fall; hence the amount passed to local authorities from the UBR will fall to the same extent. Will the Government therefore increase the revenue support grant by £22 million to make up the difference? That will be critical to local authorities. I should like a ministerial assurance on that point, because it is important to know where the money is to come from.

The Government have said that they want to offer relief to rural communities without penalising local authorities in general, but until we have an assurance that the money will not come from local authorities' own resources, we cannot make a serious judgment whether the Government's commitment not to penalise them holds true.

As for parish reviews, dealt with in part II, I want to make a quick point about clause 20, which deals with unitary counties and which I assume was introduced chiefly for the sake of the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Barry Field: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rendel: I am glad to see the hon. Gentleman in his place; I expect he will have more to say later.

Mr. Field: Sit down and shut up, then.

Mr. Rendel: Perhaps, if the hon. Gentleman stops intervening, he will get a chance to speak.

Although the provision seems to answer the problem with differing timings of parish and other elections in the English counties, it does not meet the point about unitary districts, which face a similar problem. I hope that the Secretary of State will use the powers given him in the Local Government Finance Act 1992 to end the problem of parish and unitary district elections that are not synchronised, thereby saving possible expense.

The trouble with the way parishing is carried out is that it takes far too long, and that the system itself includes a presumption against parishing.

The Government now seem to recognise the important role of community councils, which is good news, but the Bill does not go far enough. There should be a presumption in the Bill in favour of parishing. District councils should be under a duty to review parish council arrangements cyclically, perhaps every four years. There has been a resistance to parishing by some councillors and officers.

Perhaps they are concerned to retain their own power. The Secretary of State referred to subsidiarity, so I hope that he agrees that it is important to try to ensure that parishing takes place wherever possible, and that we should devolve power downwards to the parishes that are then created. The Liberal Democrats have frequently made proposals to that effect, only to find ourselves firmly opposed, often by Labour and Conservative councillors.

There is a question about whether the Secretary of State should be the final authority, and he will know that the Lords have recently recommended that there should be some type of Standing Committee of the House to deal with such issues of local affairs. The Secretary of State should certainly review that recommendation as a serious possibility.

Perhaps the most important criticism of this part of the Bill is what it leaves out—all those living in metropolitan areas and London boroughs, who do not currently benefit from the decentralisation of power. Those living in the cities have just as much need of community leadership as those living in rural areas. It seems that the Government have left them out and are unconcerned about local democracy in urban Britain. Although I welcome the increase in consultation between the layers of local government that the Secretary of State has promised us, it would also be welcome to see some increase in consultation between central Government and local authorities.

In part III, the Government refer to what powers local authorities should exercise—always a difficult subject. To allow parishes simply to set the time on the public clocks is obviously not sufficient, and does not amount to democratic responsiveness. The Bill is a classic example of legislation from a party that has a centralising tendency and is desperately struggling with the need to find out how it can devolve some powers under the principles of subsidiarity. I welcome, however, the signs of positive thinking. The proposed role of parish councils in relation to transport, traffic calming and particularly crime prevention is welcome.

The real question about part III is why the Government need to give parishes such powers now. It is, of course, because of the legal position of local authorities. Councils have to seek out the right to carry out duties of that sort each time that they come up with a good idea as to what they should be able to handle. My party believes that local councils should be accountable simply to their local population, not to the Secretary of State and not at all, except in the most exceptional circumstances, to Parliament.

In order to overcome the problem about what powers should be devolved downwards we need a proper Bill that gives back to local government the power of general competence, which it badly needs and deserves. If we were to replace this half-hearted effort at subsidiarity with a Bill that went full-heartedly for subsidiarity and gave local authorities the power of general competence, it would be a great improvement. I am happy to note that the Government are now thinking about a possible power of general competence and are willing to consult about it. They should, however, be moving much faster, and it is a great pity that they have missed their opportunity today.

6.32 pm

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): It is one of the unexpected charms of our debates that occasionally they offer an opportunity to stray from the often rather boring highways of principle and generality, and suddenly focus on a good old solid object, something readily identifiable, something even photogenic. Such is the case in our debate for there has swum into our ken a magical piece of woodland in my constituency known as Hagg Wood, near the village of Dunnington, which is close to York.

Hagg Wood has acquired even greater significance, even notoriety, from the revelation by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that not only was he born and bred in the village of Dunnington, which is close to Hagg Wood, but that, since an early age, he has often wandered freely up and down its charming highways and byways, its footpaths and bridleways.

It is greatly to the credit of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras that he was born and bred in that delightful village of Dunnington. In the spirit of bipartisan good will, it is very much to the credit of the village of Dunnington, which is very small, that it should have borne and bred a well-known national public figure. I hope that honours are even, in that context at any rate.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras and the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) are deeply concerned that the rights of access enjoyed by them, myself and many others in the locality are about to be disallowed or overridden. Let me try to reassure them and my hon. Friends about that.

I should make it clear that the Church Commission should never be thought of as an object of suspicion or derision in the House, because it is a creature of Parliament. It is the repository of the charitable funds of the Church of England. It was set up by Parliament, and Madam Speaker is a prominent Church Commissioner. The Church Commission, with its distinguished basis and pedigree, is the owner of the freehold of the woodland, which is let on a 999-year lease to the Forestry Commission.

I hasten to reassure the hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras and for York, although that reassurance may be only temporary, that the woodland is not on the market, although the Forestry Commission had earlier considered the sale of its lease, and may do so again in the future. Even if the lease was sold—the Church Commissioners would derive no profit or advantage from that, because it would merely mean a transfer of the leaseholder—the public footpaths and bridleways that go through Hagg Wood would be fully protected. I can identify at least three of them on the map of it that I have before me. The hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras and for York would be able, whatever the sale and to whomever it was made, to exercise their right to walk on that land.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras asked a specific question about the benefit that the Church Commissioners might derive from the remission of rent and rate liabilities, which is a feature of the Bill. The Church Commissioners invariably require the licensee or leaseholder to meet the usual outgoings, including rates, rents and so on, as part of the licence or lease they offer. We therefore do not stand to be in prospect of any particular advantage. It would accrue to a licence holder, who would have to pay those rents and rates normally.

Having sketched in the background, and attempted to reassure the hon. Members for York and for Holborn and St. Pancras, I must point out that Hagg Wood is not and never has been subject to a so-called open access agreement under the terms of the leasehold held by the Forestry Commission. In principle, such an agreement means the complete and unregulated freedom to roam and ramble over field and forest, anywhere and everywhere, whenever and wherever any individual might choose so to ramble or roam.

Open access is not an appropriate form of freedom where productive enterprises—whether agriculture and farming or cultivating and growing timber—are carried on. Many of the Church Commissioners' woodlands are located in the middle of agricultural holdings, and access to those woods has to be gained across tenanted productive farm land. The reasonable interests, both agricultural and sporting, of our tenants must be protected and we have some weighty allies in our approach to that issue.

For example, the Council for the Protection of Rural England writes:

"We do not support the principle of unqualified right to roam ...We recognise the value of securing provision for access and recreation through voluntary agreements where appropriate."

The Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors goes even further, saying:

"Many areas of the countryside are too sensitive to allow 'right to roam' to operate unconstrained. Reasons why public access is inappropriate include: crop damage, livestock disturbance, sporting activities, health and safety, protection of wildlife and landscape features."

I believe that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, thinking back on his experiences in Hagg wood, would understand the reasonableness of the provisos and caveats that people familiar with the countryside would want to make so as to protect many countryside features.

Mr. Dobson: Generally speaking, I understand what the right hon. Gentleman is saying about the need to protect crops, livestock, areas of particular interest and sporting interests, and that there have to be constraints. However, in more than 50 years of going to the wood, I have never heard of any constraint on anyone going anywhere. I remember someone posing as a gamekeeper once, but I think that that was just to cover up poaching activities.

No restriction has ever been placed on anyone going anywhere in Hagg wood, except when planting has taken place. In that case, the area would have fencing around it, and, anyway, no one in their right mind would try to walk between trees that were planted only two or three years previously, because the area is all grown over. However, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that, apart from such areas, there has always been free, untrammelled access throughout the wood.

Mr. Alison: I am well aware of that, and I do not want to dodge the implications of the hon. Gentleman's experience of this charming wood, but I feel bound not to surrender the fact that Hagg wood is not strictly subject to an open access agreement. The hon. Gentleman has described a practice that has grown up by custom. That is a grey area—what the legal rights might be of those who have established a customary use has yet to be tested.

I have a further point—one that the hon. Gentleman might understand and appreciate. I shall quote a member of the Country Landowners Association:

"Wildlife in woods is not disturbed by regular and consistent use of a particular route as animals get used to people and even machinery. Disturbance results from occasional straying off regularly used routes, thus the need for management."

The sort of wandering and rambling in Hagg wood that the hon. Gentleman describes probably does not harm wildlife—its very regularity is part of the protection required by animals. However, if we are talking about throwing open places like Hagg wood and the surrounding countryside to a much more specifically authorised freedom to roam, real harm is in prospect.

The customary use of the highways and byways of Hagg wood is not damaging the wildlife there, and it certainly does not interrupt the enjoyment of proper sporting rights. I see no likelihood that anything that now obtains will change, but I do not know who the purchaser—if any—might be. If it is someone who proposes to seed and plant a lot of new woodland, the hon. Gentleman's point will come into force—the area would have be fenced and protected. Similarly, if the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds decided to buy a piece of Hagg wood in order to breed rare species of birds, access would have to be limited.

I cannot absolutely guarantee that there will be no changes in future, but I can assure the hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras and for York that the Church Commissioners have no intention, and, indeed, no power, to vary the existing rights of access via established footpaths and bridleways, so the customary use is likely to persist, even though it might not be strictly within the terms of the lease.

Mr. Bayley: I pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman's close interest in this issue, both in his role as the constituency Member of Parliament and as the spokesman in the House for the Church Commissioners.

He mentioned that, when the Church Commissioners own some land surrounded by farmland that is also held under their freehold, the commissioners are often unable to provide formal open access or allow public use through a voluntary agreement, because of the damage that access might cause to the farmland. However, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, access to Hagg wood is obtained via a road to the wood, so that impediment is not relevant in that case.

I was extremely pleased to hear that the Forestry Commission has, for the time being, suspended its negotiations for the sale of the land. In his role as the spokesman for the Church Commissioners, can the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that, during this period, the commissioners will discuss with the local authority and the Forestry Commission the circumstances in which it might be possible to agree a voluntary access agreement with a specified new owner, were the sale to go ahead?

Mr. Alison: I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's request, but I have a feeling—I suspect that I might be able to carry the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras with me on this—that something that is well known and familiarly used is, in some ways, best left alone, without too much probing to establish precise legal, statutory or other agreed rights. It might be better to leave customary and statutory rights operating and not to consider how those might be changed, until a specific purchaser emerges and the nature and trade of the purchaser is established. Meanwhile, I do not reject the hon. Gentleman's proposal, and I shall think constructively about it.

I hope that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras does not feel that we have ridden roughshod over his heritage and the experiences and pleasures of his youth, which others will continue to enjoy long after both he and I are treading happier and brighter shores.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I agree with the hon. Members who have cautiously welcomed the proposals in the Bill. In that context, it was a pity that the Secretary of State, introducing those proposals, continually implied that, if an hon. Member did not represent a rural area, he or she had no interest, or, by some formula, was debarred from saying anything.

That implication was patronising, and reflected dual standards. I wonder how far we would get if we were to apply the Secretary of State's continual implication in that regard to the present Secretary of State for Wales, who I understand represents a seat in Yorkshire. What would happen if we took that logic to its conclusion? I well remember the day when Conservative Members went into the Lobby to vote to close the last pit in my constituency; many of them had not been near a pit in their lives. By that patronising and duplicitous implication, the Secretary of State demeaned the arguments that he advanced on very serious issues.

I have cautiously welcomed the proposals. I shall place them in context, and raise one or two important issues that emanate from them.

I would describe the proposals, albeit welcome, as a reaction, not a strategy. I believe that they are a reaction to the very serious situation affecting rural areas, but I do not detect an embryonic strategy behind those proposals, let alone a comprehensive one, which is what is needed. The cynics may say that we are following a well-worn Government track. One creates the problems, presides over them, makes proposals such as those we are considering, and claims that one is tackling the issues, when in fact the proposals, albeit welcome, are a limited response to fundamental problems.

I shall put the proposals in context by describing the scale of the problems as they affect a county that I know extremely well—my home county of Staffordshire. The proposals are designed to improve the position in rural areas, and I repeat that, to that extent, they are welcome. The cost is about £20 million, according to the Bill. About £15 million of that is attributed to mandatory and discretionary business rate relief; that is welcome.

However, as I understand it, that £15 million will come from the national non-domestic rate pool. As that is the very pool of money that is redistributed back to local authorities, is there not a danger that the £15 million that comes out of that pool will reduce the pool and so reduce the amount to be distributed, so that local authorities will indirectly find themselves funding that welcome business rate relief—not the Exchequer, as we have been led to believe? That must be qualified.

I wish to illustrate the seriousness of the problems in two rural areas in Staffordshire. One is north-east Staffordshire, Staffordshire Moorlands, an area of wonderful beauty. My family, including myself and my grandchildren, visit it often. It has the Peak park within its boundaries, and we are extremely lucky in Stoke-on-Trent to have such a wonderful facility nearby.

That area is suffering badly. Extremely important facilities in that rural area have been closed. British Gas closed its facility. The former Midlands Electricity Board, now Midlands Electricity plc, closed its facility after privatisation. There have been closures of the driving test centre, the Benefits Agency office, the ambulance station, rural post offices in Calton and Rushton and the Biddulph and Cheadle court—as my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said.

There are further closures in the pipeline—the tax office at Leek, the Staffordshire Moorlands office of Crossroads Care and Cheadle health centre, all very near where I live.

If the Government were serious about stopping the haemorrhage taking place in our rural communities, they would not only take the action proposed in the Bill but multiply the beneficial effects of those measures by intervening to prevent such proposed closures. I suspect that the closures that I have mentioned are being multiplied the length and breadth of the rural areas of England and Wales. Further facilities, such as the fire station, are under threat.

The Secretary of State rightly spoke about the seriousness of crime and the failure of the Government's law and order policies. Cheadle police station is under threat. He might want to do something to remove that threat. If the Government are serious about rural crime, and about helping parish and rural councils and councils in rural areas to tackle it, it beggars belief that they would sit back and allow an extremely important police presence in a rural area to be threatened with closure. That threat is mirrored throughout the country.

The BSE crisis was mentioned. In north-east Staffordshire, a large area heavily dependent on agriculture, in which there are 75,000 animals, there are serious problems because of the Government's inability to come to grips effectively with the BSE problem. Not only primary producers but many in ancillary industries are hit. There is justified fear about the future of those businesses and people who work in them.

I have seen at first hand the reduction in general stores and post offices in those rural areas. I need not travel too far to be in those areas. I am very fortunate in where I live. I am a few hundred yards from the boundary of Staffordshire, Moorlands, and my family, my friends and I are grateful for the opportunity to enjoy the countryside. We have a deep interest in these rural areas.

I have noticed that, in some villages that I visit, post offices and village shops have disappeared—a very important factor in the general decline of rural areas, as of urban areas. I shall have an interesting time explaining to proprietors of small businesses in my urban constituency why they cannot obtain any mandatory relief, whereas it will be made available to businesses elsewhere.

I am not saying that such relief is bad or should be stopped, but it will be interesting to discuss the issue with proprietors of small businesses that are clinging on to their lifeline by their fingertips and cannot obtain relief because they happen to be based in a specific area.

I welcome the Government's business rate proposals, but I have serious doubts whether they will have more than a marginal effect on the viability of rural areas and villages.

I said that I would refer to two areas of Staffordshire that I know especially well, and discuss the proposals in that context. Rural east Staffordshire is heavily dependent on various industries, one of which is gypsum mining. Gypsum is used particularly in the production of plaster and cement. Need I tell hon. Members what has happened to the construction industry over the past 10 years or so? It has been decimated, and industries situated in rural areas have suffered from the continuing slump in the industry. If the Government are serious about revitalising rural areas, I suggest that they address those issues, too.

Between 1991 and 1995, the number of VAT-registered businesses in rural east Staffordshire fell by almost 500. Before any hon. Member rises to intervene, I accept that some of those would be accounted for by the increase in the threshold, but my researchers suggest that the vast majority of those businesses went under before the threshold was increased. The area experienced an employment loss of 6 per cent. between 1991 and 1993, largely in villages such as Tutbury, Hanbury, Branston and Churnet. I know those villages well, and have seen the effects.

It is true that the registered claimant unemployment count has improved slightly since, but any improvement is relative. The employment guts were ripped out of those village areas over those years. Such figures put into context the serious problems that rural areas are facing and the effect that the Government's proposals are likely to have. Welcome though they are, they will have a marginal effect at best.

The transport proposals are also welcome. If parish councils can raise more money to stimulate transport provision, all well and good. The danger, however, is that, although parish councils may have the power to do that in whatever way they consider appropriate, the grant to county councils such as Staffordshire is being cut year on year, and its ability to maintain vital passenger services in rural areas is being reduced significantly year on year.

Unless the Government are prepared to grasp the nettle, we face the prospect that, when parish councils have the power, they may decide to spend more money on providing transport facilities for their area, but, because of Government cuts, county councils may be forced to remove their support for public transport. Although there may be a transfer of responsibility, the net effect could be no improvement whatever. We shall have spent another £15 million on trying to achieve that. That is not just carping criticism. Local authorities and parish councils will face difficulties, which the Government must address with greater clarity.

People in rural areas will no doubt greet the proposals with one and a bit cheers. If the Government are expecting three cheers, they have a long way to go yet. There will be a cautious welcome, but people in rural areas who have suffered over the past 15 years from Government complacency and ruinous policies will see the proposals, as I do, not as a strategy but as a reaction—a welcome reaction, but one that is likely to be short-lived.

7.5 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on bringing the Bill before the House. The Government outlined their commitment to rural communities in the White Paper, and the Bill is the first tangible measure resulting from it.

I shall deal first with the rural ride on which we were taken by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). He presented a view of rural England that I do not recognise. Many people in the village of Dunnington, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, would be rather puzzled by it as well. He took us on a tour of England, stopping off at several Labour target seats—the Forest of Dean and other places—and spoke of rural England as being drug-ridden and suffering from despair, homelessness, joblessness and all the evils of society. That is not a picture of rural England that I know or that most of my hon. Friends who represent rural seats would know.

The problem of rural England—I accept that it is not all rosy—is largely a question of prosperity, not poverty. One of the reasons why rural shops and businesses suffer is the changing nature of rural communities. People are not put off from going to rural communities. They want to live there—the quality of life is high, not as the hon. Gentleman suggests—they want to retire there and they want to work from home there.

The problems of rural communities stem from increased demand as a result of rising house prices and the fact that car ownership has increased enormously in villages. As a consequence, people often prefer to do their shopping in supermarkets, which are cheaper, and not in the rural shops. That is what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State seeks to address.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras spoke about the closure of rural schools. The only body in my constituency in Northumberland that wanted to close down rural schools was the Labour county council. It targeted 15 schools on the ground that there were too many surplus places. The surplus places were not in rural schools, but in schools in urban areas. Instead of dealing with that, the county council forced rural children to move into towns for their education.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned closed surgeries. Most of us who represent rural constituencies see new surgeries and medical facilities being developed all the time. I have some splendid facilities in my constituency. We do not have problems with ambulances: we have a new air ambulance, and four-wheel-drive ambulances are being introduced by the Northumbria ambulance service.

We do not have a closed countryside, with closed footpaths and no access. We have increasing access to the countryside through various Government schemes, such as the countryside stewardship scheme.

The hon. Gentleman painted an entirely false picture of rural life. In many respects, rural life is prospering. Energy prices are falling and the availability of the Internet and cheaper telephones makes it possible for people to set up businesses and run them in the country.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health intends to introduce measures to boost rural medicine and to reintroduce a service similar to that provided by the old cottage hospitals. I believe that the false picture of rural England and Wales painted by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was totally misleading. Of course there are problems in former coal mining villages, but the Government are seeking to address those problems.

The real importance of the Bill lies behind its clauses and schedules; it is the return of power to small towns and villages by strengthening the role of parishes and by giving district councils a bigger say in shaping the economy of their areas through the rate relief scheme.

In my Northumbrian constituency, which is one of the largest in England, rural shops are vital. In Northumberland, one cannot simply jump into a car and drive to a local supermarket to shop. For many of my constituents, that would mean a journey of more than 50 miles, and many more than that in some cases. Such journeys would require not only time, but two or three gallons of petrol. We need our local shops; fortunately, in most of the larger rural villages covered by the scheme, our shops remain. However, some of them are in a parlous state, and the Bill will be of great benefit to them.

Bellingham, for example, in the north Tyne valley, with a population of more than 800 people, still has two banks and a number of shops, including two butchers. It is a valuable local facility for shopping. Allendale Town in Allendale also supports a good shopping centre, which includes the Allendale Co-operative Society. It is the only one-branch co-operative society in the country. It is very well regarded by the local people. Allendale has a population of 740.

However, an air of uncertainty hangs over the shops because of the problems to which I referred. Rural newsagents, who often double up as the general store and post office, have particular problems. They have seen diminishing sales of newspapers, and they face increased charges from wholesalers while trying to keep in touch with the prices charged in supermarkets. They have a struggle.

If some of the sterling people who work in rural shops worked out what they earned per hour for all the hours they worked, they would find that it was very little. The people who run the shops deserve our congratulations because they do, thank goodness, provide a valued service. Reducing the burden of business rates will be a small but useful contribution to cutting the shopkeepers' overheads, and I believe that the community as a whole will appreciate that.

We have heard about pubs. It is important that local authorities like the two in my constituency, Tynedale and Castle Morpeth, use the discretionary scheme to the maximum. Naturally, they will have to draw up criteria about who should benefit, but they should not concentrate purely on the rural post office and the rural general store. They should look further afield. The village in which I live, with a population of 64, still boasts a pub and a post office. I am glad to say that the pub is extremely well used. It would be a tragic loss to the village and the community if that pub had to close.

Mr. Rendel: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm my assumption that, if the standard spending assessment is not increased in line with the amount of discretionary relief granted by the local authorities, his proposal that the local authorities should all use their discretionary relief to the greatest extent is guaranteed to lead to considerable increases in council tax next year?

Mr. Atkinson: I cannot confirm that point, because it is a detail of which I am not aware at this stage. Clearly, those are issues that we shall examine in Committee. As I understand the Bill, the larger portion of the discretionary relief will still be met out of Exchequer funds. The value that district councils put on local facilities, such as pubs and post offices, will help them to decide whether they enter the scheme. I am encouraging my local authority to do so, and I am also encouraging it to include pubs. No doubt someone will accuse me of supporting boozing on the rates.

Local garages are also important. In many respects, they serve petrol almost as a favour for their customers these days. The price that they have to charge is the price at which they have to buy their petrol, which makes them extremely uncompetitive. However, in the rural areas of Northumberland, it is impossible for many people to go to a supermarket to fill up their car. They have to have petrol on the doorstep, and the garages provide an extremely valuable service. Most of them also make money by running a garage with car mechanics, or with a general store attached to it. They should also be very much considered by the local authorities when they are deciding whom they should use their discretionary powers to help.

Part II, which proposes the revival of the parish council, is extremely welcome. The parish council has been a vital part of rural life for many years. It is sad that since the war, its powers have been slowly transferred upwards, leaving it with little to look after bar the odd war memorial and one or two other things. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's proposals are extremely good and will help to reinvigorate parish councils. That will then solve the other problem of persuading people to serve on parish councils. If we give parish councils a better and more important role, people will wish to serve on them.

At the moment, parish councils sit at the bottom of a heap. In my constituency, where we have a national park, the parish council sits below a national park authority, which has many planning powers, the district council and the county council. If the Opposition get their way, those councils will no doubt sit under a Labour assembly for the north of England, which would be yet another administrative burden. I hope that that will not come about.

Parish councils, as we have heard, are regularly consulted by district councils. They make their views known, but too often they feel that those views are totally ignored. It is important that district councils are sensitive about parish councils' views on matters, especially planning matters. Local people are, for example, more likely to be sympathetic to somebody who wants to build a property for somebody in the locality to live in than they are to be to a developer who comes in to build a number of houses. That difference should be reflected by district councils when they decide whether to grant planning permission.

The extra powers will be welcome, and I have no doubt that parish councils will make use of them, especially for transport. The post bus service, which was mentioned by one of my hon. Friends, has been extremely successful. However, the problem of buses in rural areas is the one that I mentioned earlier. There is a problem because more and more rural people have motor cars, so fewer and fewer people use buses. We cannot turn the clock back; that is the situation with which we have to live.

I am glad that parish councils are to have powers over traffic and traffic-calming measures. Undoubtedly, one of the greatest concerns of people living in villages is the speed of the traffic going through their village. If, as I believe, they have an opportunity of making a contribution towards slowing that traffic down, that is another good reason why somebody would want to serve on a parish council for the benefit of his or her community.

[Mr. Atkinson]

Northumberland is well served by its parishes, but, as I said earlier, it is increasingly difficult to find people to serve on the parish councils. Now that the district council has so many powers, one of the dangers that some parishes face is that they might be amalgamated. One parish in my constituency, Hartleyburn, does not have a single parish councillor because no one has volunteered to serve on the council in recent times. I fear that under the Government's proposals, unless the parishioners of Hartleyburn take a greater interest in their parish council, they will be at risk of a shotgun marriage to their neighbours.

I very much welcome my right hon. Friend's decision to abolish sporting rates. In my constituency, field sports and shooting are enormously important. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said that abolishing sporting rates would mean giving money to the rich. I point out to him that grouse shooting and pheasant shooting provide an enormous amount of work in my constituency and I suspect that that is true for the constituents of the hon. Member for North–West Durham (Ms Armstrong). I am sure that many of her constituents earn money on the grouse moors from the shooting parties and that the additional help for that important rural activity will be much welcomed.

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the point that we sought to make. That rural activity provides work for those involved in beating, raising the pheasants and related activities. However, it is the landowner and not those people who will benefit from the rate relief. We want to encourage the creation of more jobs in those areas, and ensure that everyone who is able to makes a contribution to that.

Mr. Atkinson: I appreciate the hon. Lady's knowledge of grouse shooting, because many of her hon. Friends are utterly ignorant of that activity. But sadly her knowledge does not extend to the basic laws of economics. If money is put into a community—whether it is given to a landowner or anyone else—that money trickles down. [Interruption.] Of course it does. If the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, who laughs into his beard, were to listen to the shadow spokesman on agriculture, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), he would realise that I was right.

His hon. Friend and I agree that, if farmers had higher incomes, they would spend more money in their local economy—they would buy things and employ more people. The same applies to the shooting business. If it is more profitable, it spends more money improving the shoot, upgrading its facilities and employing more people. That is one of the basic laws of economics.

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman gives the impression that field sports are on their beam ends. According to the Government, they are worth £2,700 million a year. If my maths is correct, the £5 million contribution is 0.2 per cent. of that. The hon. Gentleman said earlier that that figure was extremely marginal. If it is so marginal, why do the Government choose to give that tax reduction to a small group of, generally speaking, wealthy people, whereas they bunged 22 tax increases on everyone else?

Mr. Atkinson: I do not think that I said that it was marginal. For many people, it will be a significant amount. I reiterate the point that I made earlier. The anomaly of that form of rating—it always was an anomaly—works both ways. An institution—or an individual—may own land and let it to a tenant farmer, but reserve the shooting rights to itself because it does not want them to be used. It may not want its tenant farmers to shoot over the land for particular purposes. It is nevertheless vulnerable and liable to pay rates on the sporting rights that it does not use. The proposal helps people involved in one form of land management, and it helps those involved in running a shooting business.

I welcome the Bill. It has been criticised by hon. Members on both sides of the House for possibly not going far enough, but it has to be limited, and it is right that the Bill is targeted at those providing rural services—rural shops, pubs and post offices—and other important parts of the rural infrastructure. I look forward to the Bill being enacted in time for rebates to be given as from next April.

Mr. Jamie Cann (Ipswich): I thank the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) for his typical Welsh generosity in allowing me to speak ahead of him.

I do not come from a rural constituency. There is one farmer in my constituency, and for that I endure—that is not the right word; for that I am given—a National Farmers Union briefing once every six months. I know all about his farm, that is for sure. I am a small town boy: I lived in Ipswich for 30 years, but I come from a small town. I love the villages and small towns of Suffolk, as does my neighbour, the Secretary of State. My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) was a county councillor in Suffolk before he got his present job.

I know the importance to villagers of their shop, their post office, their church, their school and their pub. However, I represent an urban constituency. I welcome the proposals in part I, clause 1 and schedule 1 to reduce the rates of general stores and post offices in rural communities. I have nothing but praise for the proposals. I do not propose to go into any other part of the Bill.

There are two reasons for the reductions in the rates of general stores and post offices in rural areas. First, superstores have opened across the country, usually centred on trunk routes and junctions of trunk routes. In Ipswich, we have been particularly unlucky. We have four on the western periphery of the town, and two on the east. Permission for almost all those superstores was granted on appeal by the late Lord Ridley against the wishes of the local authorities. They have had a pernicious effect on the town centre of Ipswich, especially on the food trade, and on the small towns and villages that the Secretary of State represents.

Secondly, in 1992 many small shops were uprated for the new business rate. That increased their costs. At the time, the Government rightly introduced transitional arrangements to delay the blow to small businesses, but those arrangements have now worked their way through and out of the system. The pernicious effect of the superstores and of the increase in business rates on historically low-costed properties has resulted in problems for small business men in rural areas, and in areas such as the one that I represent. Butchers, newsagents, bakers and grocers are increasingly going out of business as more and more trade is concentrated in larger and larger shop units. They may not necessarily be superstore size: Mace shops are putting newsagents out of business. And so it goes on.

We should concentrate on not only helping rural shopkeepers to compete against superstores, but helping small post offices and small shopkeepers in general. It is not the location of the small business that is the problem; it is its size compared with the Sainsburys and Tescos of this world. It is proving increasingly difficult for small shops to cope.

If it is right—I think it is—mandatorily to reduce the rates of small shops in Woodbridge, Framlingham and in other small towns and villages across the county of Suffolk and across the country, it should be right to do the same for small businesses and small shops in my constituency. They are suffering from the same pressures.

In Committee, I should like the categories referred to in clause 1 to be altered to enable all shops of a given size to be viable. Incidentally, I have been unable to find in the Bill a description of a given size of small shop.

I have a few queries. If those shops are charged less in rates, there will be less income. The Bill refers to a figure of approximately £20 million. That does not sound too much, but I should like to know where it will come from. If it will come from a reduction in the pooled national business rates, my people in Ipswich will be paying more so that rural shops of an equivalent size can pay less. That cannot possibly be right. I invite hon. Members to think about that effect on businesses in their own constituencies.

If rates are not the same for shops inside my constituency as they are for businesses just outside it, people will be incensed. I shall use the example of my road. I live within a hundred yards of the Ipswich boundary. Just outside the boundary is a village called Kesgrave, which clearly would come within the limitations set out by the Bill. The Government are seriously mistaken if they think that they would receive popular approval by halving the rates of a little general store that is a hundred yards outside my constituency while leaving unaltered the rates paid by the little general store that is a hundred yards within my constituency. That would be utterly unfair.

Small shops compete against superstores, but they also compete against each other. What is sauce for one should be sauce for the other, but the Bill does not recognise that.

My town has a population of 145,000, whereas there are 120,000 people within the boundary of the billing authority, as described in the Bill. On the east side of the authority, for example, there are 2,500 people who live in Ipswich. They are not in the Ipswich billing authority, however, but in the Suffolk Coastal billing authority—in the area represented by the Secretary of State for the Environment. Do those 2,500 people—who form a group that is below the 3,000-person limit set by the Secretary of State—who live on the edge of town form a rural community or settlement? I argue that they do.

I appreciate what the Secretary of State has proposed, but I urge him to ensure that he is aware of all the anomalies that will arise from that provision. That is a classic example of what will happen. People will come to him and to me to ask, "Why am I not in a rural settlement? I live on the edge of town. There are fewer than 3,000 of us in the billing authority, but we aren't included." Many unresolved issues must be dealt with in the Bill. I hope that it can be amended in Committee, so that it is acceptable to hon. Members who represent constituencies such as mine.

Yesterday, I asked the main spokesman for post office owners in my area about that issue, because post offices are—quite rightly—specifically mentioned in the Bill. He made the point, with which I agree, that the important factor is not so much a post office's location—whether it is in Framlingham, Yoxford or Ipswich—as its size. I am not sure that the Bill states what hon. Members know to be right: that we seek to protect small businesses, not their location.

The Bill is flawed in its drafting, but it could be amended in Committee. If the Bill is to pass through the House without causing antipathy between town and country—I hope that it will not—it is essential not only that my arguments are accepted but that the financial impact is fully considered. If townspeople discover that rural shops are being subsidised at the expense of town shops, there will—quite rightly—be all sorts of trouble.

The hon. Member for Hexham will remember the Ipswich Evening Star. It carried a front-page story about 28 headmasters who were complaining about expected education cuts. They will be extremely upset if £20 million leaves local government and is not replaced by the Government.

> "from Ipswich to Felixstowe ... Stowmarket to Woodbridge"

7.34 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): It is extraordinary that the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) should be happy enough to tell us that his party wants to abolish the uniform business rate at a cost of £12,000 million, and also, in response to my intervention, that he wants to introduce site value taxation, but then to decide that he did not wish to discuss the matter. I am not surprised that he did not want to discuss it, as I have obtained a copy of a document published by the Liberal party in 1990 entitled the "Small Business Charter".

It may amuse the House to hear that the third paragraph of the document states:

> "We plan to become Members of the Exchange Rate Mechanism of the European Monetary System."

I do not suppose that that is still their policy, but introducing land value taxation apparently is. The document continues:

> "We propose Land Value Taxation with exemptions for agriculture and domestic properties. With these exemptions Land Value Taxation will be a fairer, more equitable tax, simpler to administrate and decentralist. It will specifically help small businesses because it removes the fear that improving land and property will increase rates."

That means that tax will be based initially on the land's full potential value, which is why no account will be taken of any improvements.

Mr. Rendel: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I have your ruling on the relevance to the Bill of the views of the Liberal Democrats on site valuation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): So far, the speech of the Hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) is quite in order.

Mr. Smith: I am most grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

[Mr. Smith]

I was about to say that the Liberal party's proposals will hit hardest the very properties mentioned in the Bill, which the Government are seeking to help. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said in an intervention on the speech of the hon. Member for Newbury, the Liberal Democrat proposals would have precisely that effect. I find it incredible that the hon. Gentleman mentioned those proposals but was then not prepared to defend them.

I believe that the uniform business rate has worked rather well in practice. Of course we would prefer not to have a £12,000 million tax on property, but if we must have a business property tax, it is far better to have one which allows businesses to be sure precisely what they will have to pay in the next year, as any increases are linked to increases in the retail price index. That situation is far better for businesses than the previous situation, in which there were arbitrary increases. I recall that about 10 or 11 years ago the business rate in Buckinghamshire increased by 31 per cent. in one year. Such a situation cannot happen again.

I was very surprised to learn that the Labour party proposes to abolish the uniform business rate and to return to the previous practice, whereby local councils set business rates.

Ms Armstrong: I will explain the position when I reply to the debate.

Mr. Smith: I hope so, because I have documents which suggest that the Labour party wants to do precisely that.

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman is getting rather excited. Perhaps he needs to examine some of the work done by the Minister, and some of the work done by the deregulation group which was headed by a former Minister, Francis Maude, who recommended that the uniform business rate had had its day and that it should go. Our policy is that the uniform business rate has had its day and that it should go, although we shall not return to exactly the same earlier methodology. We shall have a new methodology, but we believe that the uniform business rate should go.

Mr. Smith: That is not good enough. Businesses should be told. It is not good enough simply to say, "We shall abolish the uniform business rate." Businesses need certainty. The advantage of the present system is that they can budget with certainty for the following year.

A Labour party document entitled "Renewing Democracy, Rebuilding Communities" says that the party is "committed to returning the business rate to local control".

Local control means a return to the position whereby it was possible for high-spending Labour councils to drive businesses that employ many people away from the most deprived areas. That is precisely what happened before, and I cannot believe that the hon. Lady wishes to return to that state of affairs. I hope that she will spell out Labour's proposals with rather more certainty, as I believe that the current system has worked quite well in practice. Of course there is no perfect system of business rates, but the current system has the advantage of certainty for businesses.

I found the speech by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) rather reassuring. It was old Labour with an element of déjà vu, based on the politics of envy, with attacks on wealthy people who happen to own sporting rights in the countryside.

The hon. Gentleman proposed an entire new set of spending commitments. On housing, for example, he complained about the present position and said that more money should be spent on housing. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State suggested that, if we were to allow more of the surpluses from the sale of council houses to be spent, there might be a quid pro quo in terms of reducing the capital allocation, the hon. Gentleman disagreed, and insisted that more money should be spent on housing.

One can hardly think of a less attractive way of going about the matter. The surpluses are not necessarily located in areas with the highest housing need, yet the hon. Gentleman would not redirect those resources. It is self-evident that the surpluses are in precisely the wrong areas. They are probably in places, such as my constituency, which have the most attractive council property and the largest number of council house sales, but the need is elsewhere. What a crazy proposal it was. If we want to allocate more money to housing, we should do so through the Housing Corporation, which can determine the areas of greatest need.

The hon. Gentleman's attack on deregulation was as surprising as his proposals on housing. Bus services have been in decline for the past 50 years under both systems of support for bus services. The only advantage of bus deregulation is that at least we now have a clear idea where the subsidies are going. The subsidies are focused, and the taxpayer is getting better value for money. The hon. Gentleman's scheme certainly would not succeed. He would not be able to persuade bus operators to take on loss-making routes without provided bigger subsidies. The only way to increase rural bus services is by providing larger subsidies to operators. We need to find a more flexible solution. The post buses have been mentioned. I also welcome the provisions in the Bill to allow parish councils to get involved in rural transport, as they are best equipped and qualified to judge immediate local needs.

I particularly welcome two other elements in the Bill. The first relates to the power of parish councils. When I first became familiar with parish councils, I was a little doubtful of their value: I thought that they were just talking shops and did not perform any useful function. As I have got to know them better, however—because my entire constituency is parished—I have reached the conclusion that they are well placed to identify genuinely local concerns.

Parish councils are the local authorities nearest to the people they serve. They serve a useful purpose as a sounding board, and I welcome the fact that they will be allowed to carry out more functions if they choose to do so and wish to provide the finance. That will be most welcome in respect of transport and crime prevention. For example, they may want to provide closed-circuit television in a small shopping centre.

I was pleased to hear what my right hon. Friend said about planning, which is one of the biggest issues in my constituency. There is widespread misunderstanding of how the planning process works. Many people think that parish councils make planning decisions, as they often have planning committees which decide whether to support any particular proposal and pass on that view to the district council which makes the final decision. District councils should pay more attention to the views of parish councils on planning matters. Local views on planning decisions are extremely important. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House that district councils would be required not only to give their reasons for a planning decision, but to respond specifically to the arguments advanced by the parish council for or against a particular proposal. That is extremely important, as it means that they will engage in constructive debate and there will be more communication between the two tiers of local government. That is an extremely welcome provision.

I also welcome the help to be given to shops in villages. That highly targeted assistance represents £15 million out of a total unified business rate bill of £12,000 million, but it is focused on particular circumstances with which we are all familiar whereby village shops are close to non-viability and many have been lost.

There is a tendency to exaggerate both the extent to which the Government of the day are responsible for the problems that have been caused and the extent to which they can provide a solution. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) said, by and large the problems have been created by success and increased prosperity in rural areas. I can identify two factors: the pattern of employment, which has changed hugely over the years, and the huge increase in car ownership. The fact that so many families now have a car is a welcome development. Cars bring people enormous individual freedom, but the car has changed the patterns of retailing and employment.

For example, until recently the school in Little Marlow, a village that will become part of my constituency after the next election, was threatened with closure. That school is now flourishing, not because it is attended by children from Little Marlow but because parents from High Wycombe drive to the village so that their children can take advantage of village education. That is marvellous. The fact that they have that choice has made the school viable. We are discussing the problems of success, not failure, brought about by the increase in car ownership.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North–East): Hon. Members welcome the assistance given to rural shops, and the hon. Gentleman has made a splendid case, but does he accept that urban shopping centres also have considerable problems? The closure of one shop often leads to other closures due to the continual failure of urban renewal policies. Although we welcome the assistance provided to rural shops, does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is also a strong case for reducing the liabilities of small shops and shopping parades in urban areas, as so many of those shops are under great pressure?

Mr. Smith: Of course I accept that there are problems in urban areas. That is undeniable. However, they are the problems of success. We have had huge success in retailing. British retailing is among the best in the world. In food retailing, for example, the consumer has benefited hugely from the quality now available from our superstores. Many retailers, such as Marks and Spencer, which published its results yesterday, are developing outstanding retailing all over the world. The difficulty is that people drive to those shops because they get good value for money. Small shops in urban and rural areas suffer the consequences of that huge change in the pattern of retailing and we must consider the extent to which it is right to ask the taxpayer to support such shops.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) said that, according to the Local Government Chronicle, trying to keep the village shop open would somehow be supporting the middle classes. That is clearly not the case. The people who cannot get to other shops are those who do not have cars—the old, the young and the unemployed. They will clearly benefit from the measure. I welcome that, because it is sensible to intervene to help those who have not been able to benefit from the changes that I have described. However, we must limit such help or we shall start to interfere with the operation of the market. We are limiting that help to £15 million of highly targeted relief, which will help people who are greatly in need. That is why I welcome the Bill.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I, too, welcome the Bill as far as it goes and to the extent that it is comprehensible. It is supposed to be the fruit of the rural White Papers for England, for Scotland and for Wales. The Bill was trailed in that context in the Queen's Speech. There has been no debate in Parliament on the White Paper for Wales, and we are moving forward to some parts of the legislation without identifying the priorities. Many important provisions in the rural White Papers are not covered by the Bill and need to be addressed.

The White Paper "A Working Countryside for Wales" referred to rural housing, rural schools, rural youth services, the health service in rural areas, employment problems in rural areas, tourism in rural areas and the range of environmental action that is needed. Considerable attention has rightly been paid in response to the White Paper to the need to help small farmers by providing considerable assistance for agriculture in these difficult times. Agriculture is the backbone of rural life. Most of our farmers work on small farms in Wales and are often on the breadline. If they collapse under the strains they currently face, the whole rural fabric will go down with them.

We need a new all-Wales agri-environmental scheme, but there is no provision for that in the Bill. I hope that other Bills will be introduced to deal with the other aspects of the White Papers that are not covered by this Bill.

The Bill's scope is restricted. It deals with village shops and post offices, which are certainly important. There are 93 villages in my constituency and, goodness only knows, I understand the importance of sustaining the village shop and post office.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can settle a point which is worrying me. I have read the Bill carefully, particularly schedule 1, which refers to "settlements". What is a settlement? Is it a village? Is it a street of houses? Is it a groupage?

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Gentleman is right to ask that. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have been probing for an answer. Clearly a settlement does not refer just to a community council or parish area. In my community of Llanwnda, there are the discrete villages of Rhosgadfan, Rhostryfan, Dinas and Llanwnda. There are shops in those different areas. One would not expect villagers from Rhosgadfan, up the hillside, to have to come down to Llanwnda every time that they want a stamp or their pension. One imagines that the community will have to be split into discrete areas; otherwise, the rule that only one post office or general store will be sustained in any community will cause immense difficulties. We shall undoubtedly return to that problem in Committee.

The Bill also deals with the strengthening of community councils, which we definitely support. It provides for car-sharing schemes, bus services for elderly and disabled people, concessionary transport schemes and traffic-calming schemes—an issue on which my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) has been pressing hard for a long time.

All those provisions are worth while, as are the much-needed provisions on crime prevention, but they are only a small part of the rural agenda. I regret that the long title of the Bill is restrictive. We shall not be able to move amendments in Committee to address the many matters that have been left out.

I welcome the Bill as a small step in the right direction and I am grateful to the Secretary of State for responding positively to my representations on the application of the Bill to my constituency, but I am a little disturbed that there are no Welsh Office Ministers present today. We have not seen one, apart from for a brief period during the opening speech. When I raise technical questions about Wales, I hope that the Ministers present can respond in detail, because the House has a right to such answers.

The problem with the Bill is that the devil is in the detail. Numerous difficulties arise in implementation. The first problem, which I raised with the Secretary of State earlier, concerns the applicability of the Bill, particularly part II—clauses 9 to 25. Clause 35(2) says:

"Sections 1 to 4, 9 to 31 and Schedule 1 extend to England and Wales."

That must be a misprint. I should be glad of some clarification. Clause 25 says that part II applies to England only. Presumably something has gone wrong.

I imagine that some of part II must be already applicable in Wales through the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994. Clause 21 seems to reflect a considerable amount of section 14 of the 1994 Act, but the words are different, so it is questionable whether some of the provisions in part II will apply to Wales.

I suspect that the provisions in clauses 9 to 25 not covered by the 1994 Act will not apply to Wales. What is the Government's rationale in establishing those measures for England but not necessarily for Wales? We have a right to an answer. I do not know whether the Minister wants to intervene now. I suspect that he would rather a colleague came back to it in the closing speech—I understand that, in the circumstances. I hope that they can dig out a Welsh Office Minister in the meantime to give them a lead. The issues of applicability are vital. We need to know which provisions in the Bill apply to Wales. We should be glad of an answer.

I welcome the measures on the relief of business rates for rural shops and post offices in Wales. There is immense pressure on rural shops in Wales, as in other parts of these islands. We have seen closure after closure over the past few years as patterns change and the viability of businesses is hit by falling demand. Obviously, that has a bad effect on those members of the community who cannot drive to supermarkets. The elderly, those who do not drive and disabled people will be harmed, as will the tourism industry. The base population of a village may not be able to sustain a shop in winter, although it may be necessary in summer to provide for tourists.

The burden of the uniform business rate falls not just on general stores and post offices, but on other rural businesses, such as village butcher's shops, hairdressing salons, cafes, chip shops, pharmacies and garages. It is not good enough to give discretionary powers to local government when we know full well that the squeeze on the financial resources of local government in the coming year means that local authorities will not have a brass farthing to spend in this way. As a result, many businesses that should receive assistance will not get it.

Secondly, in recent years, shops and small businesses have gone under not only in rural areas but in small towns and, as has been said, in urban areas. In the three towns in my constituency—Caernarfon, Pwllheli and Porthmadog—there are numerous empty shops and, to a significant extent, that is a direct result of the impact of the uniform business rate.

My hon. Friends the Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North and for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) have pointed out in the Chamber that our policy as a party is that we want to do away with the UBR. Conservative Members have challenged the Liberal Democrats on this matter, but we have gone into it in some detail and we want to see a local income tax. That was the evidence that we gave to the Layfield commission in 1976 and, incidentally, was recommended by the commission. Even then, it was thought possible and practical to have a local income tax system.

I believe that, if businesses had to pay a local income tax—or, if they were incorporated, an added element to their corporation tax—as the means of funding local government, it would not become a burden or an overhead that might pull them down when their turnover was falling. It is variable—if a business is doing well, it pays more; but if it is doing poorly, it pays less. That makes it easier for businesses to survive when there are factors undermining their viability.

The existing provisions in law for relief for businesses going through difficult periods are applied so unevenly that it is difficult to see the basis on which they are applied. A couple of years ago, some £2 million of relief was given in England but only £900 in Wales. I have no doubt that there are many deserving businesses in Wales, and I know that some Welsh councils, such as Taff Ely—which no longer exists—applied the relief, while others will not contemplate it, and that causes a problem. There must be a rethink on local government finance, particularly on the uniform business rate.

There are real problems of definition which must be addressed in Committee, and I wish to flag up some so that we start to think about them. First, what is a rural area? We are told that it is a settlement with fewer than 3,000 people, but that is an inadequate definition, as it does not relate to density. The Minister of State told us that he recognised that a different formula applied in Wales, but nothing in the Bill refers to that formula. Apparently there are two ways of defining a rural area, neither of which is mentioned in detail in the Bill. We will have to deal with that in Committee, or the Bill will be open to challenges in the courts and elsewhere. There is also the question of one community covering more than one settlement, which I have raised.

Secondly, what is a business? The Bill allows the Secretary of State to include any shop or business by order, but how will the order be used? We must discuss whether there should be a limiting factor with regard to the size of a business. During the consultation in Wales, such a limiting figure was given—£5,000 of rateable value—but that seems to have dropped out of the Bill. Or has it? Perhaps we do not know it yet, and it will be covered by orders which have not yet been clarified.

What is the definition of a general store? For example, does a cafe that sells soap qualify as a general store, as it sells food as well as household items? I do not believe that the definition we have is watertight, and it will be inoperable. What is the qualification for a post office? Would a post office counter in an out-of-town supermarket—more and more supermarkets are trying to get such counters—qualify automatically for relief from the rates for the entire business? These matters have not been thought through, and more thought is needed.

I wish to refer to the powers of community councils, which are vital. I have 28 community councils in my constituency, and I try to visit them all on a rota basis. I have never been to a single community council meeting where I have not learnt something. These councils are valuable, but they have precious few powers and it is right to give them more. I am not satisfied that the powers to strengthen community councils in the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 are adequate. My hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy tabled amendments to that legislation in Committee, but we did not get the result we wanted. Commitments were given that guidelines would be issued by the Welsh Office, but they have not been adequate. The Government may be relying on the effectiveness of the words in the 1994 Act as a basis for the application of the scheme in England, but that has not happened in Wales as yet. I want more powers to go down to community councils than do currently.

Several aspects of the Bill need to be clarified. For example, does any legal liability fall on community councils for car-sharing schemes or traffic-calming works? Frankly, community councils do not have the expertise to be handling questions if there is legal liability. Are community councils to be allowed to build bus shelters, given that the Bill restricts them from doing anything of a capital nature with regard to bus services?

The Bill states that community councils

"may, for the detection or prevention of crime in their area—

(a) install . . . any equipment."

What does that mean? Will community councils be allowed to put the stocks on the village greens? [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I hear "Hear, hear" from Conservative Members. That may well be what the Government have in mind, and I would be interested to hear that spelled out. My local authority has considered installing closed circuit television. Although it can face the capital costs, there will be immense revenue implications if it is to monitor everything on the CCTV systems.

On taxi fares, clause 28 allows community councils to enter arrangements for fare concessions for in the council's area. That sounds discriminatory—councils can choose who to help, and may not do so on an objective basis. There are specific provisions in legislation on water rates to prevent discrimination, but it appears that we are deliberately providing for it in the Bill. That needs clarification.

"some or all of the persons"

I should like to touch on omissions relating to the working of town and country planning law, particularly in rural areas. I have plenty of examples of nonsense in town and county planning law and how they impact on communities. My area has an old planning permission that dates back to 1965. It has been kept alive by way of a few yards of tarmac that were put down for betterment levy purposes in the late 1960s, but that has meant that the planning permission is alive in perpetuity for 800 holiday homes in the village of Morfa Bychan. It is a site of special scientific interest and needs protection. Planning law should be changed to deal with such nonsense. We have heard of opencast schemes that would desecrate rural areas, but existing provisions to cope with such problems are inadequate.

I should be glad if the Government would clarify whether a new rural business class use will be added to the planning process, as was mentioned on page 35 of the English White Paper. Consultation is proceeding on this matter and we need to know whether it will move forward, because it is important for the operation of our community councils and for planning to protect our rural areas. Small developments can proliferate, because the size threshold enables them to avoid the development control procedures.

As other hon. Members have said, we give two cheers for the Bill. We need to strengthen and clarify it in Committee and we need other Bills to cover the rural matters that have not been covered. More than anything, we need a coherent strategy towards rural Wales and that has not, as yet, been developed. The White Paper tried to move in that direction, but it was not adequate. Financing and the way in which grant formulae for local government deal with the sparsity of population and the additional costs that it causes have not yet been addressed. I hope that the Government are aware that rural areas have many needs and that they will be willing to accept amendments tabled in Committee. I also hope that we will hear more in the winding-up speeches. It is vital to get such legislation right and to make it applicable to, and effective for, our rural areas.

8.12 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) who made a characteristically constructive speech. Some of the matters that he raised are already addressed satisfactorily in the Bill. For example, schedule 1 will provide billing authorities with much flexibility to interpret what is meant by "a rural settlement". I understood what the hon. Member was talking about, because I spent my summer holiday this year in his constituency and that of his hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd). I thought that he talked down Porthmadog a little, because it is a vibrant shopping centre and my wife and daughter greatly enjoyed our shopping trips there, although I could see the damage that has been done to areas of his constituency by the attractions of Safeway in Caernarfon and the new Tesco store further along the coast at Bangor. They have had an impact on village shops.

[Mr. Peter Luff]

The two cheers from the Welsh nationalists must be encouraging for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister who will reply to the debate tonight. The Opposition parties seem to agree that the Bill is at least a small step forward, so we are entitled to believe that it is a big one indeed.

As we have heard in the debate, the Bill is about rural communities, and it is good to have an opportunity to debate that subject. I think back to the fuss that arose when the Church of England published its report, "Faith in the City", and the huge row that erupted. Someone even used the word "Marxist" to describe the report. A few years later, the Church of England produced a parallel report called "Faith in the Countryside" which, I am sad to say, sank without trace. It was a fine report and an example of the Church making a useful contribution to the debate about rural communities.

We are debating today the very institutions that bind together those rural communities. Many of them are important—the church, the shop, the pub, the parish council, the school and so on. Those are the "little platoons" of village life. That phrase was used by Edmund Burke in 1790, when he said:

> "To be attached to the subdivision, to love the little platoon we belong to in society, is the first principle (the germ as it were) of public affections. It is the first link in the series by which we proceed towards a love of our country and to mankind."

So our debate tonight has a long and honourable tradition.

Those institutions, those little platoons, empower people—they help people make a difference to the community in which they live—and they do not just include the formal institutions, because the family is a little platoon, as are sports clubs, hunts and voluntary groups. All those little platoons bind together the fabric of rural life. Some, such as the Church, do so by providing spiritual help; the shop provides practical help, as a centre of information for the village; the pub provides a social opportunity; the parish council provides a democratic one; and the school provides an educational one. They are the foundations on which our rural communities are built, and I congratulate the Government on the Bill, which will deal with many aspects of rural institutional life—those little platoons.

There is little for schools in the Bill, but it is not an education Bill and is not the place for that. There is little for the Church, but it has something to tell us about the importance of little platoons and subsidiarity. I mean, in this case, the Church of which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is a member, rather than my Church. Subsidiarity lies at the heart of what we are debating tonight because giving power to parish councils, as the Bill will, is what subsidiarity is all about. It was defined by Pope Pius XI in his encyclical "Quadrigesimo Anno" in the following terms:

> "Just as it is gravely wrong to take from individuals what they can accomplish by their own initiative and industry and give it to the community, so also it is an injustice and at the same time a grave evil and disturbance of right order to assign to a greater or higher association what lesser and subordinate organisations can do."

"those in power"—

he must have been thinking of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—

> "should be sure that the more perfectly a graduated order is kept among the various associations, in observance of the principle of subsidiary function, the stronger social authority and effectiveness will be, the happier and more prosperous the condition of the State".

That definition was quoted in the document "The Common Good", which was produced by the Catholic bishops recently and widely, and I think wrongly, interpreted as an incentive to vote Labour. That interpretation was sadly misguided on the part of mischievous media.

In the document, the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church stated:

> "It will be seen that the principle of subsidiarity is no ally of those who favour the maximisation of State power, or centralisation of the State at the expense of more local institutions. It supports a dispersal of authority as close to the grass roots as good government allows, and it prefers local over central decision-making."

That is what the Bill sets out to do and that is why we should give it three not two cheers.

The principle of empowering parish councils must be right and we will give them powers that they may choose to exercise or not, depending on local circumstances. Conservatives are frequently criticised for seeking to centralise power, but I cannot understand that criticism. Our proposals for grant-maintained schools involve a decentralisation of power. They give power back to local communities and I am delighted that, in Flyford Flavell first school, I have the first grant-maintained primary school in a rural area in my constituency. That is empowering for the local community. We see decentralisation in health authorities, because we are giving power to general practitioners to take decisions.

We oppose Labour plans to create regional assemblies which would undermine the role of all local authorities, especially parish councils. We want to take power out to the people and that is what the Bill sets out to do.

Parish councils are, as everybody in the House agrees, crucial local institutions. I seek invitations to go to them as regularly as I can and a summons to one is a three-line whip to me. On the Bill's proposals for parish councils, I have two questions, two welcomes and two caveats to enter. I am delighted that the Bill will make it easier to establish parish councils, and that it will give local communities the power to petition for their creation. I am also delighted by the new powers the Bill will provide on community transport and crime prevention, but I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary a question about clause 16. As I read it, the clause seems to create a presumption in favour of parishing. It seems to oblige district councils to parish where appropriate.

I think that I know the answer to the question, but does the clause also apply to parishes in urban areas, for example in Worcester city? I ask because my city council fought the creation of parish councils. The Labour party, which controls Worcester city, did not welcome rival centres of power in the city. They were wrong to fight them and it was undemocratic and unduly centralising of them. I am glad to say that the parish councils now exist and are making a valid contribution to the life of my city. In other cities, where Labour administrations might take a similarly unenlightened attitude, will they find it more difficult to resist the creation of parish councils?

I have a second question, about clause 21 and consultation with parish councils, which may already have been answered when I was temporarily out of the Chamber. I understand that it is primarily intended to deal with planning matters, about which several hon. Members have already spoken in detail.

Many parish councils in Worcestershire feel that they are not taken sufficiently seriously on planning matters. Only yesterday a parish council chairman told me that they feel that they are regularly presented with a series of faits accomplis. For exactly the reasons that many hon. Members have explained, I would like parish councils to be fundamentally involved in the planning process. They are in touch with grass-roots local opinion, and they know, often better than district or county councils, what is good for their communities.

Parish councils could also be given a role in the enforcement process. Often, when planning permissions have been granted, they are not properly followed, and sometimes the parish is better placed to judge whether a planning permission has been properly adhered to.

Frequently parish councils are not adequately informed during the local plan process. That has been an issue in the village of Tibberton, Worcestershire, which is currently suffering the imposition of an unwelcome housing development because the parish council was not properly informed about it. No one broke the rules, but there are no rules obliging anyone to inform the parish about a change in the application of the plan to its village. As a result, Tibberton is finding it difficult to resist the imposition of that unwelcome housing.

In the early stages of the local plan, the parish council thought that it had made its representations effectively, but then found that it was not required to be informed of a change. I do not think that at this stage the village can avoid the building of the unwelcome houses.

Parish councils have a crucial role to play in the planning process, and we should seek to reinforce that role wherever we can. The 1972 legislation simply required all planning applications to be notified to parish councils. I believe that that those councils' views should carry much more weight, and I hope that that is what the relevant clause seeks to achieve.

I extend two specific welcomes, one of which is for the wide range of powers on community transport and on traffic measures such as traffic calming. I especially welcome the emphasis on imaginative, innovative, creative use of existing facilities, such as sharing cars and taxi arrangements. Sadly, the days of the village bus cannot come back for most rural communities. Too many people own cars, which traps the poorest and most underprivileged members of our society in the villages, unable to leave them to work, to shop or for recreational purposes. The new proposals are welcome, as they seek to correct a trend that cannot otherwise be addressed.

I welcome the powers on crime prevention. Several parishes in my area are already adopting certain measures, such as giving remuneration to neighbourhood watch co-ordinators, which may or may not be legal at present. I am sure that they will welcome the provisions in the Bill. The installation of closed circuit television cameras may be a bit much to ask in small village communities, considering not only the capital costs but the running costs. But larger town councils will welcome the powers that the Bill will enable them to take.

I have two caveats. First, not all parish councils will take up the new powers. It is not the Government's intention that they should. The powers are discretionary, and councils can decide whether to use them. However, if a significant number of parishes decided to use the powers, parish council expenditure would increase sharply.

Wychavon district council area, which covers the rural parts of my constituency, is fully parished. We have three significant town councils, and the total budget of the parish councils there is about £750,000. I therefore repeat what some Opposition Members have said about not bringing parish precepts within district and county capping arrangements. That would be a harmful development, and I hope that the Minister will assure me that the Government do not intend it to happen.

My second caveat concerns the new responsibilities of parish councils. They will require a great deal more skill and expertise than some councils now have. Many parishes may be reluctant to take up the powers because they feel that they lack the necessary expertise.

Let us consider some of the issues that my local parish councils are confronting now. Whittington is fighting a battle with the Highways Agency about noise, and a great deal of expertise has been built up there. People in Bishampton and Throckmorton have fought an entirely inappropriate planning permission for a chicken farm, and have had to deal with complex laws on environmental impact assessments, as well as European Union involvement in such matters.

I have already talked about Tibberton, and the detailed work that has been done there on the planning process covering housing. Inkberrow fought the Boundary Commission in an attempt to prevent its transfer to the new Redditch parliamentary constituency. In Wyre Piddle, people need to know the details of transport policy, as they fight for their bypass.

Those matters are all time-consuming for parish councils, and if they are to take advantage of the new powers in the Bill the clerks, especially, would benefit from further training. Perhaps the Rural Development Commission could consider the idea; indeed, I believe that it is already doing so. Overall, I welcome what the Bill will do for parish councils. It recognises subsidiarity, decentralisation and the strength of the little platoons.

That thought leads me to that other little platoon dealt with by the Bill—the village shop. Many such shops in and near my constituency are struggling against all the odds. In my eyes, the proprietors of village shops are the real heroes of rural life, providing a crucial service and a social facility that we cannot afford to lose.

Several Opposition Members have said that the relief that we propose for village shops should go to urban shops too. I understand that wish, because there are struggling urban shops in my constituency, too. However, the point is that the rate relief will be a subsidy not to the village shop proprietor but to the community, to keep that crucial community facility alive. That is the distinction.

[Mr. Peter Luff]

Ultimately, the Government have to draw the line somewhere. There are all kinds of things that we would like to do if resources were unlimited, but as they are not, I believe that the Government are striking the right balance. The rate relief proposal will often make a real difference to village shops.

Some people have underplayed the significance of rate relief to those shops. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities, for example, seems to think that it does not matter. I disagree. Some shops in my constituency are still awaiting the phasing out of transitional UBR relief, and at present the prospect for them is one of increasing business rates. The Bill will wipe out that prospect, which will be greatly welcomed by the shops.

Figures are missing from the Bill, but I understand that the Government intend to set the rateable value limit below £5,000 and to provide for mandatory 50 per cent. relief for such businesses. The discretionary scheme for a 50 per cent. top-up for local authorities must be welcome. I also notice that, whichever way we put it, only 25 per cent. of the 50 per cent.—that is, 12.5 per cent. of the total—will fall to local authorities, the rest being borne by the rate fund or by the Exchequer, depending on which interpretation one prefers.

I welcome all that, and I sincerely hope that the village shops in my constituency will benefit from both halves of the equation, the mandatory and the discretionary. The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats on such matters, praised the record of councils run by his party in that regard. The Lib-Lab pact that runs Wychavon council does not have an especially good record on hardship relief. Only a tiny handful of shops get help.

Wychavon is a cash-rich district, because of the wise policies of the Government, especially the policy for the transfer of council housing to local housing associations, which were pursued by the previous Conservative Administration. The council has enough money to give the relief, so I sincerely hope that, when the Bill becomes an Act, it will make a rapid commitment to use its resources to provide the tiny additional sum to increase the limit to 100 per cent.

Despite my welcome for the Bill, I accept what many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Caernarfon, have said: it is not a panacea, and does not solve all the problems of village shops.

I am a great admirer of Tesco, Sainsbury and Safeway. As one of my hon. Friends said, those companies have transformed British retailing; they are among the finest retailers in the world. But at the end of the day they are the enemies of the village shop. We cannot duck that fact.

For example, I wrote to Tesco when the company started running a bus service from a village in my constituency to its new store at Evesham. That stuck a dagger in the heart of the village shop in Peopleton. Tesco found it incomprehensible that I could be worried about the village shop, but I was, because the bus service was limited and inadequate, yet it would take away that extra bit of turnover from the village shop, thus endangering its future.

I opposed Sunday opening for similar reasons. I am sure that that, too, has damaged village shops and small urban shops. I am also concerned about the policy of some of the big supermarkets on "known value items". For a village shop it is difficult to buy many branded goods even as cheaply as the price at which they are sold off the supermarket shelves. The supermarkets stop the manufacturers and wholesalers selling goods at a price that would enable the village shop to compete with them.

That is a scandal, and I hope that the Minister can have a word with the Office of Fair Trading to see whether that body could have a little look at the problem.

Another matter that hon. Members could have mentioned is the new business improvement grant scheme for village shops. Taken together with the relief on business rates, it is a very important development. In fact, the chairman of the Rural Development Commission said in a press release last week:

> "The village shop provides an essential service, particularly for those without ready access to transport, but is under threat . . . This new scheme will complement both our existing advisory service for village shops and the proposed rate relief scheme for which the Government has just introduced a Bill. We believe that the combined effect of these measures will provide the best chance of halting the decline in the number of village shops which we have had for many years."

Combined with the measures in the Bill, the new business improvement grant scheme, which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 28 October, offers more than a ray of hope for many struggling village shops.

Of course, village shops face other threats, too. If, Heaven forfend, there were to be a Labour Administration sometime in the future which proposed the introduction of a minimum wage, what effect it would have on many marginal shops that can at present afford to employ one assistant at a relatively low rate of pay I shudder to think. The implications of a minimum wage for village shops could be very serious.

The National Farmers Union wants clarification on some issues. It has asked how my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State proposes to designate areas as rural for the purposes of the scheme. I am sure that we shall explore that in Committee, although I think that schedule 1 provides the flexibility that those rural communities need. It also asked what might be the position of some farm shops, which act as general stores but are not necessarily located within the boundaries of a designated rural settlement. That is an interesting point.

There is another point on which I would be interested in hearing my hon. Friend the Minister comment. Some of the shops have to pay not only business rates but large sums to have rubbish taken away by district councils. The cost of collecting cardboard cartons has an additional charge over and above the business rate. Perhaps that is another matter to be considered.

Finally, and briefly, I turn to pubs. It is right that we should emphasise them as a crucial component of village life. I attended a reception yesterday that was organised by CAMRA at which that point was made to me very forcibly. It is looking for a mandatory 100 per cent. relief scheme for village pubs, which is a trifle ambitious, to say the least. Pubs play a crucial social and economic role in villages. They provide a cheap and self-financing meeting place for many local groups where, for example, a village hall does not exist, and they are vital to social cohesion. I am told that, at present, business rates account for 6p per pint sold in the average village pub, and that the total tax per pint is around 54p when one takes account of excise duty, VAT and business rates. Perhaps that is another little platoon that demands a little more support in the Bill.

Nevertheless, the Bill is a good one, it has been introduced by a good Secretary of State and it deserves to make good progress. I certainly have no hesitation in recommending it to the House.

8.32 pm

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I shall address clauses 5 to 8 and schedule 2, which deal with the rate relief scheme for village shops, and are the only parts that affect Scotland. Like most hon. Members, I give the scheme a cautious welcome. It is, of course, but a drop in the ocean in terms of the community, economic and development needs of rural Scotland, but it is very welcome. I know that it will be welcomed by many of the small shops and post offices that will benefit from it.

The local authority in my constituency estimates that about 75 shops and post offices and another 50 sub-post offices in the Western Isles will be eligible for rate relief under this scheme. That gives the House some impression of the nature of the constituency and the importance of the scheme to helping those shops. They are essential to maintaining community life in what are very remote villages and districts by any standard—even European standards. Any moves that help to prop up the existence of such shops is to be welcomed.

I hope that the scheme will also be of assistance to mobile shops. They are not referred to in the Bill, and I am not quite sure how the scheme would apply to them, since by their very nature they travel from village to village and district to district, but they are just as essential to the lifeblood of remote and rural communities as resident shops. They not only supply produce of various kinds to the different villages they visit, but act as bearers of news, gossip and information from village to village, and help to tie many villages and districts together.

I know that, to people who find it difficult to move out of their villages, because they are elderly, on particularly low incomes or disabled, or face some other difficulty, mobile shops are a welcome sight when they come over the hill. If the Bill can help mobile shops as well, it would be very worth while. I hope that that is a point that we can explore in Committee.

I should like to make a couple of suggestions about how the rate relief scheme might be further improved. Like many others, I believe that the scheme ought to be extended beyond simply ordinary shops or general stores. Pubs have been mentioned. Petrol retail outlets in rural areas also need to be assisted by the scheme.

There is no doubt whatever that local petrol outlets are hugely important in rural areas because, by their nature, such areas do not have a developed public transport network. People rely more heavily on their cars to get around for essential day-to-day living than they do in urban areas, where there is access to tubes, buses, trains and other kinds of public transport. In rural areas, the car is essential to get about, which is why it is important that there is access to petrol—and nearby, so that they do not have to drive large distances to fill their tanks with petrol.

Rural petrol retail outlets are under increasing pressure. The Minister will know that the Trade and Industry Committee studied petrol retailing in its sixth report in the previous Session. One of the issues on which it focused was that great pressure, which is due to rural outlets having to bear increasing costs as a result of new environmental standards and the need to introduce new equipment. That is particularly onerous for people who have a very low turnover.

There is also the problem that the outlets usually have to pay a higher price for wholesale petrol. Those two things together mean that the consumer has to pay a much greater price than that paid in urban areas. I know that that is true throughout the country and not only in Scotland, but it is perhaps particularly true in the highlands and islands.

The gap between rural and urban prices in the highlands and islands is staggering. Last year, for example, the average gap between the price of petrol in the Western Isles and the price on the mainland of Scotland was about 8p per litre—about 36p per gallon. People in rural areas have to pay a great deal more for their petrol. In the Western isles, for example, people have to pay £1 million more a year than they would have to pay for the equivalent amount of petrol in urban areas.

Great pressures and problems bear down on retail petrol outlets in rural areas, especially in the highlands and islands, but to a greater or lesser degree throughout the country. We need to offer those outlets some support, and I hope that that can be done through the Bill.

Recommendation No. 9 in the Trade and Industry Select Committee report suggests that the Government should consider ways in which the taxation levied on petrol could be adjusted to ensure that petrol retailers in rural areas were not disadvantaged. That could be done in different ways: a rebate on the value added tax or duty that the retailers pay would be one method, and giving them access to the rate relief scheme would be another. I hope that we can consider that carefully in Committee, and extend the scope of the scheme in what I believe would be a sensible way.

The balance of the way in which local authorities and central Government pay for the scheme could be adjusted. If the scheme is taken up and both the mandatory and the discretionary elements are employed to the full, the balance would be about 75 per cent. from central Government and 25 per cent. from local authorities. For charities, the balance is slightly better—80 per cent. and 20 per cent. It would make sense to have a similar split in the scheme for rural businesses.

Clause 2 is not a Scottish clause, but I must make some comment on it. It concerns the abolition of sporting rates in England and Wales, and I was baffled by the Government's explanation that it was needed to bring England into line with Scotland. I well remember the Government arguing that the equivalent measure in the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994, which abolished sporting rates in Scotland, was needed to bring the Scottish position in line with the English, so their justification for the current measure seems bizarre.

It is a gross waste of money to provide a blanket exemption for sporting estates, and I warn English and Welsh hon. Members against going down that route. The exemption would account for a quarter of the total cost of the scheme—£5 million out of £20 million—and there is no justification for it on economic, social or community grounds.

[Mr. Calum Macdonald]

Since sporting rates were abolished in Scotland, there has been no evidence whatever of any benefit to rural communities, or that it has helped, as was argued during the passage of the 1994 Act, in the management of the estates. All that has happened is that money has disappeared into the pockets of those who own and control sporting estates—by definition, extremely wealthy people. I hope that the Committee will consider that carefully, and reject the provision.

Clauses 6 to 8, which contain provisions dealing with Crown property, affect Scotland and appear to be sensible in principle, but we shall have to look at the detail and to consider how they bear upon the operations of the Crown Estates Commissioners. I look forward to hearing more about that in Committee.

The Bill represents a small drop in the ocean in terms of the support that rural communities need, but it is a welcome drop.

8.45 pm

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait), the first lady member of the Government Whips Office, asked me whether I would speak in tonight's debate. No lady is ever to be denied in my life, but one who has such an interesting array of Whips at her disposal certainly commands my riveted attention.

I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to colleagues on both Front Benches, for the fact that I was not here for the opening speeches. I was attending upon one of Her Majesty's Treasury Ministers with the leader and two officers of the Isle of Wight council to discuss the minting of the Isle of Wight ecu, for the illegal sale of which the council is facing prosecution.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned, the Bill is all about subsidiarity. The Isle of Wight council recently spent nearly £15,000 on a MORI poll asking people on the island whether they would like a referendum on independence and how they would vote in such a referendum. On the first question, 71 per cent. said yes; on the second, 44 per cent. said that they would be against the independence of the Isle of Wight, 33 per cent. said that they would be in favour, 17 per cent. said that they did not know enough about it and 1 per cent. said that they would not vote.

It seems not untypical of the Liberal Democrats that the council now wishes to have an Act of Parliament allowing a referendum on independence, which would cost about £120,000, in order to pose a question to which it already has the answer, because a large majority have already said that they do not want independence. Indeed, the Liberal Democrats' prospective parliamentary candidate accused the leader and deputy leader of the council of forming a breakaway party that had not been authorised by Cowley street. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will therefore realise that subsidiarity is high on the agenda on the Isle of Wight at the moment.

Rating is at the heart of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) gave an excellent exposition of the merits of the business rate as it stands. He left out only one important point, a point that, if I may say so, is often missed by the Government. The fashion of the day when I came into the House—it was parroted throughout the country and not only in political circles—was to ask what the Government were doing for our manufacturing industry, yet so many people forget that the legislation setting up the business rate favoured, and still favours, manufacturing premises. I have not found a single manufacturer on the Isle of Wight who wants to do away with the business rate.

I can explain that to the House and give ample illustrations: the rates on the Isle of Wight were uncompetitive, we could not get people to invest in the island and set up factories there, and many of the large multiples and international companies were considering moving away to their spare capacity in other parts of the country.

Today, the Isle of Wight's business rates are pari passu—four square—with those of the rest of the nation, which is very helpful. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield also said, that gives businesses the opportunity to plan their budgets in advance. That is to say nothing of the extraordinary increases in the old business rate when the Liberal Democrat council had the matter all to itself.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel)—or is it Papworth, I can never remember which it is, but I know that it is something to do with bypasses—mentioned that Liberal Democrat councils were used to giving rate relief. When he generously gave way, I pointed out that I had never known the Isle of Wight council to use that facility.

When I was elected to the House, the Liberal Democrats suddenly started asking about the village shops that were shutting, and asked why I was not doing something about it. I pointed out to my local councillors that they already had the power to do something if they wished. There is nothing Liberal Democrats hate more than being given a solution that bursts the balloon of their protest and takes away the oxygen they need to shout about such matters. They have never used that facility to assist village shops. I have been able on rare occasions to negotiate with the council on behalf of businesses for time for them to pay in exceptional circumstances.

As of tonight, I have a new policy for winning the next general election. It is to be nice to Department of the Environment Ministers. There is no Department I have spent more time kicking, screaming and shouting at since I came into the House. If there is one outstanding reform that the nation needs, it is an end to the annual junket that runs from local authorities to Marsham street and back. Year in, year out it costs the nation millions of pounds and is ineffective.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) put through the House the order that created the Isle of Wight unitary council, he ran from the Chamber with my protestations about the problems of the electoral cycle of the unitary council and the parish councils ringing in his ears. Such was my angst, I even offered him a free demonstration of one of my company's products. I should at this point declare my interest in both beer and burials.

Parish councils bring Government nearer to the people. They have never been capped, because they act responsibly. In many parts of the country, they are unpolitical. In my constituency, there is a strong tradition of not standing for parish and town councils on a political ticket, even when candidates are already elected party political representatives of local councils. It gives a much better standard of decision-making at the grass roots when people hang their political hats up outside the door on parish councils. My constituency much appreciates that.

Clause 20 more or less restores the position that existed before we passed the legislation that created the Local Government Commission and the unitary authorities. I welcome that. It is rare for a Member to have a Government Bill that is almost entirely and exclusively dedicated to his constituency, but that is the case with the alignment of the electoral cycle in the Bill.

Clause 11 allows a petition by the community to set up a parish council. It is unclear whether a time scale is involved, though some of the wording suggests that, where a community has already made a petition, it will suffice. Is a time scale involved? My hon. Friend the Minister knows, because of my representations, that East Cowes has made a petition. We all support its having a parish or town council. Will it have to go through the exercise afresh?

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) talked about planning and parish councils. When I was elected for the Isle of Wight, I met our chief planning officer and pointed out that, if he required people seeking planning permission to bring an extra set of plans when they made their applications, it could be distributed to parish councils, which would involve them much more in the process. He said that he did not believe that it could be done, because it was ultra vires and outside the law. I pointed out that, when I had been a district councillor, we had required it.

Most people who wanted planning permission would not baulk at the legality of what was involved and would provide the extra set. Since we adopted that on the Isle of Wight at my suggestion, I have not heard of any developer or architect who has baulked at supplying additional plans for the parish council, so that it can be fully consulted in the planning process.

Clause 20, as the hon. Member for Newbury said, exclusively affects the Isle of Wight. It might be thought that there would be other cases, but we are the only unitary authority where the electoral cycles do not match. I welcome the fact that the Bill deals with that. On the Isle of Wight, we have many tiny parish councils whose precept comes to less than would their election costs if they had to have stand-alone elections. That is nonsense.

I should have been on the island tonight with the deputy chief constable for a first meeting about some neighbourhood watch arrangements. I know how much the Bill's anti-crime measures, such as closed circuit television and the appointment of parish constables, will be welcomed. Hon. Members with mixed rural and urban constituencies such as mine will have had representations from the community, generally speaking, about anti-social behaviour and vandalism rather than serious crime. The parish council can play a useful role in that respect.

We must guard against the district councils walking away from their responsibilities, and leaving it by default to the parish councils to get on with some of these duties. That would be wrong.

Rating relief for shops is welcome. Several hon. Members have asked about the pubs. In some cases, the pub has a dual role as village shop. I hope that that will not preclude them from this welcome rate relief.

Finally, clause 3 activates the Government's long-standing policy of abolishing Crown immunity and Crown exemption. I welcome that, for a number of reasons. On the Isle of Wight, the Home Office owns the Albany, Camp Hill and Parkhurst residential estates, including roads and street lighting. Now the Home Office is trying to hand over the ownership to local residents.

I welcome the abolition of Crown exemption because of the major problem that arose when I entered the House in 1987, when I was landed with the difficulty that rating valuation officers had misjudged the rates on what were in the main residential properties for prison officers. The mistake amounted to several pounds per head of the population of the Isle of Wight.

I went to see Nick Ridley, who told me that the problem had nothing to do with him: I should go and see the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I went to see Nigel Lawson, who told me that it was nothing to do with him: I should go and see Nick Ridley. I am sometimes asked why I still languish on the Back Benches. It is because I shuttled endlessly between those two gentlemen and made myself extremely unpopular with them, which killed my prospects of advancement.

Eventually I was told that there was no legislative mechanism to put this major problem right. What was more, it had never occurred before. In desperation, I got in touch with the Cabinet Secretary. I felt that my constituents were getting a raw deal, and that no one wanted to help me out with it. In the end a solution was found; I was never allowed to be privy to what it was, but the debt was written off. That explains why I welcome the abolition of Crown exemption.

No speech of mine mentioning parish councils would be complete without paying tribute to Lord Mottistone, who has been an ardent champion of the cause of parish councils. He was chairman of the Parish and Town Council Association of the Isle of Wight, and his family enjoyed a long association with the councils as well. He tried to promote a private Member's Bill in the other place with the intention of marrying up these election dates. In no small measure, clause 20 is a tribute to his efforts.

This Bill is about a way of life and a form of government which are for ever England. It will ensure the continuation of that way of life on the Isle of Wight and in the other English shire counties.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): I do not know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether you were in the Chamber earlier this afternoon when I raised a point of order about the closure of the Gulf refinery in my constituency, which was announced this morning. It is planned to close it by the summer of 1997, with the loss of 350 direct jobs and a similar number of indirect jobs.

My constituency, a peripheral part of the United Kingdom, has over the past five years suffered defence cuts that have meant 1,050 job losses in defence establishments both in the constituency and in neighbouring ones. There have also been job losses in the energy sector, another pillar of the local economy, totalling 400 over the past five years. In the food production and processing sector, the third pillar of our local economy, we suffered the closure of the Whitland creamery, in 1994, and we are now suffering the effects of the BSE crisis.

[Mr. Nick Ainger]

The fourth pillar is tourism, which this year was hit by the Sea Empress spillage. Cardiff business school calculates that that resulted in a loss to the local economy of between £21 million and £30 million this year, with the consequential loss of between 1,100 and 1,400 jobs in the holiday season.

The cumulative effects of all that have been catastrophic, particularly for unemployment. In September this year, male unemployment in Milford Haven on a narrow base rate was 26 per cent., in Fishguard it was 20 per cent., in Pembroke Dock it was 20 per cent., and in Tenby, 22 per cent. The report produced by Cardiff business school and the Institute of Rural Studies in Aberystwyth also shows that, before the Sea Empress disaster, average income per head in rural west Wales was 72 per cent. of the European average, making it as poor as many parts of Portugal—which, along with Greece, is the poorest country in the European Union.

I represent a rural seat, because all the jobcentres that I have quoted in my constituency cover rural areas as well as the urban areas of particular towns, so I welcome anything that could alleviate some of the problems that my constituents face.

I am disappointed with the Bill, not precisely because of what it does, but because of what it does not do. It does not take on any of the major issues identified by the Government in their rural White Paper, nor in the responses from various rural organisations in England and those received in response to the Welsh Office rural White Paper. The scope of the Bill is extremely limited, and it does not get to grips with some of the fundamental problems that Wales in particular faces.

I was somewhat amused by the comments of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who said that the problems faced by those in the rural areas of his constituency were caused by success. He said that, because people could afford a car, they could travel to the supermarket 10 miles away, thus depriving the local community shop of income. That is certainly not the case in my constituency.

The sad fact is that, two years ago, the Employment Service conducted a survey on behalf of the local leading pressure group, South Pembrokeshire Action for Rural Communities, in which it identified the fact that lack of transport was one of the main reasons why people remained unemployed or were unable to upgrade their skills on training schemes. It discovered that people could not get to a job even if one was available, and that they could not attend a training scheme even if one was offered to them, because of the Government's failure to ensure that we have reasonable transport services throughout our rural communities.

A survey carried out by Cardiff business school discovered that those on low incomes remained so poor because, even though they had a job, they had to pay car insurance, car tax and the high price of petrol for a car that they could not really afford, but which they kept because, without it, they could not get to work. Many of those people were going without to keep their car on the road. That is the reality for many in rural areas, particularly in Wales.

I welcome the limited proposals in the Bill, although I have certain concerns about some of the details. Bearing in mind the limited amount of cash that will be available under the mandatory scheme, it is surprising that it will not be more closely targeted. It is quite possible that a successful shop in a village, which makes a reasonable turnover, will receive rate relief under the mandatory scheme because it is the only shopping outlet in that village. Unless we start targeting that limited resource, I am afraid that other, perhaps more deserving, shops and garages might go without. In Committee, we shall have to examine closely whether it is right to offer relief according to a blanket definition which means that, if a shop is the sole outlet in a community with a population of less than 3,000, it is automatically entitled to that rate relief.

As many hon. Members said, there are serious problems in areas that people from a city would regard as rural, but which the relevant local authority might regard as urban. Today, I asked my staff to carry out a small survey in two towns in my constituency, Pembroke Dock and Milford Haven. I asked them to count how many shops were boarded up, how many had "To Let" signs up and how many were unoccupied.

In Pembroke Dock this afternoon, 39 shops were either to let, boarded up or unoccupied and a further 16 units in a small shopping mall were also vacant. In Milford Haven, 15 shops were unoccupied or boarded up. That shows that we are examining the problems not only of purely rural areas, but of those not especially large towns where people from rural areas shop. The Government should address the crisis in the retail sector in many of our small towns. It is rather unfair that successful shops outside so-called urban areas will receive rate relief, whereas those suffering real problems in small towns will get no help at all.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) has returned, because my next point relates to what he said about garages. If certain bypass schemes go ahead, some villages in my constituency in which the village garage is also the village shop will face problems, because their garage-cum-shop will be bypassed along with the rest of the village. Obviously, a significant part of such outlets' income derives from passing trade, and when that traffic has gone, because the trunk road will go round and not through the village, they will face real difficulties. The Committee should examine that issue because there is a deliberate policy on trunk roads that affects such village shops, especially those that also serve as garages.

As I explained, Whitland was a thriving town until November 1994. It had a large creamery that employed 156 people, and most of those people lived in the town. As a result of the deregulation of the milk market, that creamery was closed by Dairy Crest, and 156 people lost their jobs. Earlier this year, the town was bypassed and now, instead of going through the centre of the town, the A14 passes to the north. From an environmental point of view, that is undoubtedly a benefit; it is also an economic benefit, because it speeds up traffic between the far west of Pembrokeshire and the M4 corridor. However, the impact on the town centre—its shops, pubs, takeaways and garages—has been catastrophic.

The irony is that, under the present arrangements, the creamery, which is still owned by Dairy Crest and which the company refuses to sell, lease or otherwise put on the market, has received rate relief; whereas the poor shops, garages, takeaways and other outlets have received no help whatever. That is another matter which the Committee should seriously examine.

I recently asked the Post Office how many post offices had closed in rural west Wales, and I was told that six had closed this year alone—in Rhyd Lewis, Aberaeron, Freshwater East, Tufton, Bosherston and Fron Deg Terrace. I do not think that anything in the Bill will encourage anyone to take on those franchises, reopen those post offices and provide a vital service to people in those villages. Another opportunity has been missed to establish essential services. Elderly people and those on benefit need a local post office that is operational.

I shall now discuss community councils, as we call them in Wales. Wales is completely covered by community and town councils. I served on the Committee on the Local Government (Wales) Bill, which addressed many of the issues that are addressed in, I think, part III of the Bill, which relates purely to England. I am a great supporter of community councils, and I welcome some of the moves in the Bill towards increased responsibilities and powers for community councils, but we must be realistic.

Many of the new powers relate to improving transport facilities. Castlemartin community council in my constituency has 121 electors. It has serious transport problems; almost its only remaining public transport is a post bus. Those 121 electors would not be too happy with their community council if it suddenly started levying a rate to provide a vital service. They would appreciate that service, but those 121 people would not like the bill that they would have to pick up.

In that case, the issue is too great for a community council, and can be tackled only by the county council, but its hands are tied because it is in effect capped by the Welsh Office. It cannot expend the money necessary to provide that community with a reasonable transport service.

Mr. Rendel: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the worries about the extra powers that the Bill would give to parish councils is that, although parish councils are not capped, the money that they spend counts against the capping limit for the higher-level council, so any money that those poor 121 electors might be asked to spend will have to be deducted from the spending of the higher-level council?

Mr. Ainger: I was going to make that point, and I can illustrate it. In 1994, Pembroke Dock town council was levying a rate that was higher than the district council rate for various purposes. As the hon. Gentleman says, we run the risk that, although the Bill would give those extra powers and allow community councils to levy a rate, it would have a knock-on effect on the upper tier of the local authority.

In Committee on the Local Government (Wales) Bill, I was worried—I still am—about the cost of democracy in community councils and town councils. If a member resigns or dies and there is a contest, the election can cost about £1,000. In Castlemartin, with 121 electors, if people decide that they want to hold an election, because everyone is concerned about a local issue and there are two points of view, that election almost bankrupts the community council. People are therefore reluctant to engage in local democracy because they are advised, "Do you realise that, if you do contest this seat and we hold an election, it will cost £1,000?" That problem must be tackled if we are to have vital local government at all levels.

The Bill presented a great opportunity—which has been lost—to tackle many of the profound problems that directly affect rural areas, especially in relation to economic activity. Why is there no rate relief for small business units, which would be a way to create and sustain jobs in rural communities? Why is there no rate relief for conversion of redundant farm buildings? Why has the Welsh Office systematically cut grants to village halls, which are often the only place where young people, the elderly, toddler groups and so on can meet? Although there is a token gesture towards education in rural areas through our small rural schools, why are local authorities constantly told that they must cut surplus places? That is the biggest threat of all to the small rural schools.

There have been cuts in support for the Leader groups, which are doing excellent work throughout rural England and Wales and addressing issues at the grass roots. In many cases, they are creating excellent training opportunities and in some cases good jobs as well. In 1995-96, £4 million was cut from support for rural initiatives in Wales. As a direct result, European money could not come into rural Wales. That is a travesty.

Although I welcome some of the measures in the Bill, I feel that an enormous opportunity has been lost.

9.20 pm

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North–West Durham): We have had an interesting debate. I originally thought that the Committee stage would be short, but as almost all Members who have spoken, on both sides of the House, have said that there are serious problems of definition in the Bill and flaws that will have to be worked out in Committee, I am beginning to wonder whether the short time between now and the election will be sufficient to sort it all out. Some of us hope that the Government will see sense and call an early election. It is interesting that all hon. Members who have spoken referred to the shortcomings of the Bill. They recognised that, although it is acceptable to Members in all parts of the House, it is a narrow measure.

I do not have a pecuniary interest, but I always like to make it clear to the House where I am coming from, so to speak, so I should state that I am vice-president of the National Association of Local Councils and president of the Durham branch of the Association of Parish and Town Councils.

Mr. Curry: Where is the hon. Lady's chain of office?

Ms Armstrong: We do not go in for that sort of thing in Durham, but I hope that I have made clear my commitment to local and parish councils.

The Secretary of State was mistaken when he said that some people did not understand rural areas and were not concerned. He almost implied that only Conservative Members were competent to speak about rural areas. The debate has shown that there is considerable knowledge, experience and commitment to a living, thriving rural environment. That is evident on both sides of the House.

[Ms Armstrong]

Members from Scotland and Wales as well as from England have stated their determination that rural life in their constituencies should thrive and develop, but they recognised that the measures in the Bill were minuscule relative to the needs of rural areas in the 21st century.

Interestingly, the debate has highlighted the differences in our experience of rural life. That inevitably means that we have different ideas of what needs to be done to enable the community to flourish in the next century. I was particularly struck by the comments by the hon. Members for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who described a type of rural life which certainly exists but which is not the only form of rural life and which in my experience is not the predominant form of rural life for many people living in villages. If it were, we would face a difficult future, because both hon. Members described many people who lived in rural areas but who were making their living outside those areas and commuted to work.

The very high use of cars is leading to problems in rural areas. In the Weardale area of my constituency, there is one road. There is a railway line, but it is now unused; that is another story and another tragedy. There is one road, and the increased use of that road is leading to enormous difficulties, both for the industries in the dale and for the people living there. If we have the idea that rural life in Britain can prosper only by people making their living and doing the main things that sustain their lives, such as shopping, outside the rural area, we shall make rural areas intolerable places in which to live. The people who live there now will move back to the towns because they do not want such a quality of life. My belief, and that of many hon. Members on both sides of the House, is that that is far too simplistic a view of what is going on in rural Britain today.

The Rural Development Commission carried out a survey in 1994 which cautioned all of us not to be glib about the nature of rural life. The survey shows that it is much more complex, that different patterns are emerging and that we as decision-makers need to think about the kind of communities that we shall encourage by the measures that we take. The Bill should have been approached in that way, but I am not sure that that has been the major motivation behind it.

The Rural Development Commission's survey makes it clear that many of the new incomers to rural areas are people on low incomes. That suggests that many of them are elderly people on fixed incomes who are moving back to their home areas or to the area where they have had a caravan. That is the common theme in Weardale. Sometimes they come to the area with an over-rosy picture of what life will be like there in their declining years. As they have low incomes, they desperately need resources and services in their locality. Many of them do not have cars or, if they do, the cars are on their last legs—or wheels. As those people get older, they are less capable of maintaining the car and they get to the stage when they cannot use it.

I was horrified to hear the hon. Member for Hexham say that the lack of a car did not matter in his constituency, because his constituents now had the air ambulance. The head of the Northumberland ambulance service tried to endear a public meeting in my constituency to the idea that his ambulance service would do a much better job if it took over Durham's ambulance service. He talked about the air ambulance, and one person in the audience said that the only reason people would need an air ambulance would be if all the amenities were closed and they were not able to get to them.

The closure of the local accident and emergency unit at Shotley Bridge hospital has led to many problems and the people in the top end of the Tyne valley whom I represent have enormous difficulties because of it. If they are taken by ambulance to the accident and emergency service, they are then left to find their own way home. I have a letter from one constituent who was charged £14 to travel 15 miles in the middle of the night because he had ended up in hospital after an accident and there was no ambulance to take him home.

It is not true to say that people in my region do not face problems because of the distances involved and do not feel isolated. Those problems exist. What is happening in the health service in my region is no different from what is happening in other regions. The closure of health care units adds to the difficulties of local people, but health is not the only issue to which those problems relate.

My experience of living in a rural area is different from the picture painted by Conservative Members, but it is not all bleak: many people enjoy living in rural areas and want to be able to continue to do so. We should address the issues dealt with by the Bill on that basis.

If we are to have a rural life that is sustainable, and if we are to manage the environment and the land effectively, we must have a working life. The number of small businesses and village shops that have had to close in recent years is staggering. The measures to save small village shops are welcome but, my goodness, we have had to wait until so many of them have closed. We must now consider not only how to save those village shops, but how to make them viable and able to meet the needs of rural communities in the next century. I am disappointed by the approach taken in the Bill. It does not look forward and consider how most effectively to support village shops and businesses to ensure that they can play their role not only for the present generation but for the next.

The Government should have thought more about a partnership approach, and should have developed their proposals in that context. In some areas of the country, local authorities together with local people are already working hard on imaginative and innovative schemes, especially schemes involving small businesses. Measures are being taken to encourage young people to get jobs. If we cannot create opportunities for young people, our rural areas will become the preserve of older people and those who are getting older. If young people are unable to find work and opportunities, they will leave. I know how many people have left my area in the relatively short time that I have been in the House. I know how many young people have been driven out of my constituency because of the decline of industrial development in the dales, in the rural areas around Consett and in Consett itself.

We have heard far too little from the Government about the work of local authorities in finding ways to encourage new industry and small businesses. Given the importance of small businesses, and given the critical importance of economic regeneration to small businesses, I am amazed that the Government have come forward with so little. Small businesses in rural areas will be encouraged not only by the presence of village shops but by the overall rural environment.

However, as I have said, village shops can develop to meet the challenges of the future. In Hertfordshire, for example, centres have been established in village shops and in "telecottages" through the collaborative initiative of all local government tiers—district, county and parish—showing what can be accomplished by adapting a village shop or community facility to the changing needs and demands of a new century. Such initiatives prove that rural businesses can thrive. Perhaps there will be information centres and other facilities in village shops that will involve not only village shop owners but others in offering new opportunities in rural areas.

The Government have taken so many actions that have frustrated the efforts of so many people. Many of my constituents have been unable to pursue training or other schemes to get them back into work because of the Government's benefits rules, which have proved a major disincentive, especially for those who wish to undertake part-time training.

The Government have failed to tackle other issues in reducing unemployment. They have made it increasingly difficult for farmers' wives in my constituency, for example, who have come to see me anxious about whether their children of school-leaving age will have any work opportunities in the dale. Those women know that there must be support for initiatives to ensure that the dales and other rural areas can survive and grow.

I am also very disappointed about the Government's work on parish councils—which I support, as I have already made clear. I find it incredible that it is necessary for the Bill to state that Parliament will allow parish councils to organise car-sharing schemes or to take initiatives to tackle rural crime. Rural crime is a desperately important issue. In my area, we have worked with the police and with parish and district councils to establish a rural crime watch.

In Burnhope—I assume that this is one of the examples used by Ministers—we have a parish bobby who is paid by the parish council. Burnhope is an old, very isolated mining village, with incredibly high levels of poverty and deprivation. The situation is much worse there than in many other villages in my constituency, which itself has the lowest income per household of any constituency in England.

There is poverty and deprivation in rural areas, but people want to live and work in the areas in which they grew up. Our job is to provide the framework so that they can do that. Only when we deliver that framework will we be able to ensure that we look after the land—the green and pleasant land in which we live—so that it is maintained for future generations. The Government have missed many opportunities in the Bill, but the Opposition will table amendments in Committee to ensure that the Government consider those opportunities.

I hope that the Government will also examine other proposals affecting rural areas, such as the nursery voucher scheme, which is creating havoc in the rural areas of Norfolk and will create havoc across the country. There are enormous opportunities to make child care available, which will greatly assist rural women who want to end their children's isolation so that they can have a proper start in life.

The Government must examine their policies so that they encourage a thriving existence for everyone in rural areas, not just those with cars. Many rural areas have low car ownership and people living in those areas have as much right to our attention as anyone else. If we are to provide them with real opportunities, we need a Government who will take a more serious approach to those difficulties than that taken in the Bill. I suspect that the present Government will not do that, and I look forward to being a member of a Government who will find a solution.

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): It may assist the House if I begin by trying to answer some of the questions of fact and interpretation that have been raised in the debate.

The hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs) asked why the measure did not embrace Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland does not have a system of parishes analogous to that in the rest of the United Kingdom. Northern Ireland is currently undergoing a rating revaluation, so it would not be easy to graft such a Bill on to the existing structure of legislation in Northern Ireland. No doubt the hon. Gentleman may wish to discuss with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland his interest in measures that would have a similar effect to the Bill.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) asked which parts of England, Scotland and Wales were covered by the Bill. The complicated answer involves the way in which Bills are drafted in order to observe legal technicalities. I could give him a detailed explanation which would leave him better informed, but possibly none the wiser. Perhaps it would be easier for me simply to list the parts of the Bill and the areas to which they apply. I can do that with certainty.

The village shop rate relief applies to England, Wales and Scotland. The abolition of duty on sporting rights applies to England and Wales, as there is already a similar measure for Scotland. The abolition of Crown exemption applies to England, Wales and Scotland, as does the retention of the exemption for visiting forces. The creation and review of parish arrangements is confined to England, as is the consultation framework for parishes, but the transport and crime prevention powers for parishes apply to England and Wales.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman is satisfied with an exhaustive topographical explanation of the Bill. I counsel him not to seek a detailed explanation. He can have one if he wants, but he will find it truly helpful only if he is deeply insomniac.

It may also be helpful if I cover some of the basic elements of the Bill, as I can provide clarifications and explanations that may save us time elsewhere. The village shop relief applies to the only shop that is a general store, selling food, hardware and household goods, or a post office. It will get a 50 per cent. mandatory relief. If there is a post office that is a general store and there is another general store in the village, the relief will apply to the post office, although the local authority will have the discretion to apply it to the second store as well.

Discretionary relief can be used to increase the 50 per cent. mandatory relief to the designated store.

Mr. Rendel: I seek clarification on that point. If a joint village store and post office is the only post office in the village, is the rate relief given only on the post office element of the store or on the total value of the property?

Mr. Curry: Rate relief is given on the total value of the property, as I shall explain in more detail.

Mr. Dobson: I am genuinely trying to be helpful. Will the Minister consider a problem that may arise when the proposals in the Bill are put through by local councils? At the moment, auditors interpret any advocacy by a councillor of action to be taken in the ward or district that they represent as disqualifiable interest. Councillors from particular villages may well wish to advocate some of the proposals that have been put forward today. Under current auditor's rulings, they would not be allowed to advocate them or be present at a meeting at which they were discussed, still less vote on them.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman has raised a serious point. As he knows, the Nolan committee is considering local government issues. The Government's submission to that committee will be published shortly. I shall undertake to consider what the hon. Gentleman has said—his point covers many issues—in the light of the discussions that are taking place.

Other stores can qualify for discretionary relief, not just the pub, the garage or the pharmacist. The power is deliberately widely drawn to give the local authority discretion. Any business can be included if it is important to the local community—the butcher, the baker or, for the sake of argument, the sawmill rather than the candlestick maker.

In our consultation, we suggested a ceiling of £5,000 in rateable value for the mandatory element and £10,000 for discretionary relief. The consultation showed a general agreement with those figures. In the light of the broad consensus that they achieved, I suspect that my right hon. Friend will probably settle on them.

The hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) asked about mobile shops. They are almost certainly not rated at the moment, although a central storage element, if they have one, may be. I am happy to consider that more closely and write to the hon. Gentleman if I need to qualify what I have said.

We think that some 30,000 businesses will benefit from the two schemes.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, because I have been persistent on some points today. Will he confirm that it is possible to have several settlements—the term used in schedule 1—in one parish or community? If there are post offices in several villages in one community, will they all qualify?

Mr. Curry: I shall come to that. We have defined a rural area. It will be for the local authority to identify the settlements lying within that area. There may be more than one settlement in a defined rural area. The answer is therefore yes.

A local authority can already grant charitable relief, discretionary relief and hardship relief. None of those powers is affected by the new powers.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson), who is not in her place, asked about settlements in metropolitan areas. Nothing in the Bill prevents a village in a metropolitan area from being deemed eligible. We will follow the definitions produced as a result of consultation under the Housing Act 1996, which lists 30 or so areas in South Yorkshire, for example, designated as rural areas.

Any settlement of no more than 3,000 people within one of those parishes is eligible, each one being eligible separately. I know that that will also interest many of my hon. Friends. I understand that the hon. Member for Hillsborough has explained that she cannot be present now because she is in a Select Committee. It is for the local authority to define the curtilage of a settlement.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson) asked where the money comes from. I suppose that I had better answer.

The money comes from the pool, which is redistributed. Under the local government financial system—with which the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South will be intimately familiar—any cut in the amount available for distribution under the business rates is compensated for under the revenue support grant. The money comes from the Exchequer, and is not a charge upon what is distributed in the pool.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) asked about a lower limit, a part-time post office in a garage, and a newly provided store. The answers are no, yes and yes. He will forgive my shorthand, but I think the answers are satisfactory.

A number of questions were raised on parishing. There are essentially three routes into parishing. First, a district council can undertake a review and make a recommendation to the Secretary of State, who then makes the necessary orders to create the parish. The district council then makes the orders to create the parish council. Secondly, a petition, by either a minimum of 250 electors or 10 per cent. of the electors in the area of the proposed parish, that defines where they want the boundaries to lie, goes to the district council, which can comment. These comments are then sent to the Secretary of State for a decision.

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): Will my right hon. Friend include metropolitan councils in what he is saying?

Mr. Curry: Not in all of what I am saying, but I shall refer to metropolitan councils in a moment, when my hon. Friend will be as satisfied with what I have to say as he was with what I have just said.

The third route is for the Secretary of State to direct the Local Government Commission to carry out a parish review from scratch, or where there is some dispute about the need for a parish. In that case, the Local Government Commission can investigate and make a recommendation.

Mr. Barry Field: My right hon. Friend has referred to petitions. If a community has already petitioned before the passing of this legislation, will that stand good, or will it have to do it all again?

Mr. Curry: We would expect a new petition if one had been rejected, and there must be a two-year interval between petitions. Parishes in metropolitan areas are exactly the same as those I have described in the countryside, because, in law, a metropolitan council is a district council. There will be no upper limit to population size, except where the creation of a parish would dominate an entire district.

The parish council can currently precept £3.50 per elector for general purposes, such as recreation or the upkeep of the village hall. It will now be able to precept above that for the reasons specified by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today. There was a question about traffic calming and the relationship between parish councils and the Highways Authority. The parish council will be able to support traffic calming projects, provided it has the consent of the Highways Authority, which will carry out the work. Other than the parish council opting to lie in the middle of the road, as it were, it will be able to contribute to the work.

It is worth remembering that, in trying to enhance the roles of parish councils, the recent national parks legislation created a route by which people from the national parks and local parish councils could serve on the national park authority. In my local national park in the Yorkshire dales, the new authority that will come into being next spring contains people who have come through a sort of parish electoral college to enhance the views of local people in the national park.

In areas such as that—where planning issues are particularly sensitive—there is great resentment at the feeling that decisions are too often made by people who do not live in the park and who are not closely in touch with people who know the real problems, including the need to earn a livelihood in the park as well as to provide a refuge for visitors.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Is it the Government's intention that planning site visits should be open to parish councillors to put their points of view while district councillors are visiting particular areas within the parish?

Mr. Curry: Under the consultation proposals, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends that parishes should participate fully in planning procedures by means of a voluntary arrangement with the planning authorities. We will consider guidance that will help that process, and if the voluntary system were to fail and people did not apply it with good will, my right hon. Friend would necessarily have to consider using his powers to move towards a more mandatory system. Our intention is that people make a habit of working sensibly together on planning, which is likely to be the most sensitive issue.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State observed earlier—I was not able to intervene in his speech—the problem is that councils such as Lancashire county council totally ignore parish councils. They consult, but they write the parishes' opinions off. Councils in Garstang and Catterall, which have strong views, are totally disregarded by Lancashire county council.

Mr. Curry: The Bill contains powers to formalise, if necessary, the consultations that are required. We hope that that will not be necessary, and that the Bill will be sufficient to make it clear to local authorities that we expect pragmatic action.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The councils will ignore it.

Mr. Curry: If they choose to ignore the Bill, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have the remedies to ensure that it does not continue to be ignored. I am sure that he would not hesitate to use those powers.

The electoral cycle for parishes—the unitary districts—will fall into place once the unitary councils have been established. The normal electoral cycles will come into sync, and I will give the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) details in due course.

Mr. Rendel: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Curry: I will send details to the hon. Gentleman. I have allowed many interventions, and I have four minutes left to get through three quarters of the Bill, so I hope he will excuse me.

I do not wish to return to site value rating. We mentioned it last week, and the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) cringed visibly. That system considers the development potential and values a site at that potential. It does mean that a village bank and Dorothy's olde tea shoppe next door would pay the same rates and that the latter would suffer as a consequence. The system that the hon. Member for Newbury described is the existing rating system, and he should consider what he means by the policy that his party is supposed to endorse.

There are real dilemmas in the countryside, which none of us can avoid. Planning is difficult, because the countryside is under pressure. People want to preserve it as it is, but the household growth figures will cause real, unavoidable dilemmas. Education will also produce dilemmas. We must not assume that a village school is excellent merely because it is a village school. Many are, but there is a trade-off between the intimacy and community of a village school and the facilities of a slightly larger school. That is self-evident. Access is also not an obvious issue.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Curry: If my hon. Friend will permit me to say so, she has had one bite at the cherry already.

In my constituency, in the three peaks area, access is wearing the footpaths away, and hardcore has to be helicoptered in to reinforce them. The situation with the use of green lanes by four-wheel drive vehicles is even worse. The green lanes spread and death traps are created, in winter conditions, for livestock.

It is true to say that there is not a single countryside—there are hundreds of countrysides in the United Kingdom; there are half a dozen in my constituency. The difference between the vale of York and Upper Wharfedale is enormous. The Pennine dales, the constituency of the hon. Member for North-West Durham (Ms Armstrong), the maritime constituencies of the south-west and the home county constituencies are different in their working patterns, the social mix, the relationship between rural areas and the towns, and transport characteristics.

It is important to observe that diversity. We must not fall into the trap of talking about diversity between urban and rural areas as if there were no diversity within each or, indeed, within shorter distances.

I sometimes felt that the countryside that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras described was a sort of Tolkienesque fairy story peopled with demons of his own creation. The real countryside is not uniformly rich and lush, either socially or economically. It does not mean a "Miss Marple" village, but nor does it mean the hon. Gentleman's demon landscape of oppressive landlords, cringing peasantry and exploited youngsters.

We must create a living countryside in which people want to live, where they can earn a decent livelihood and take part in decent recreation. The Bill is designed to deliver that. The need is there, the Government have addressed it, and we shall deliver the results. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

PETITION

10 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I fully support the petition on the future of services at Arbroath infirmary in the names of Neil Thomson, Yvonne Cargill and Des Nicoll on behalf of the 8,500 citizens of Arbroath and district who signed their names in support, who demand a better deal for the hospital, and improvements across the range of service provision for the largest population centre in Angus:

To the House of Commons the Petition of residents of Arbroath declares that the maximum level of hospital services for Angus should be provided locally.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Scotland to ensure that an end is brought to the cutbacks and downgrading of services at Arbroath Infirmary so that Arbroath Infirmary and Stracathro can jointly provide major hospital services for Angus until the new Angus District General Hospital is built as a matter of urgency.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

I wish to submit the petition for the people of Arbroath.

To lie upon the Table.

Care of the Elderly (Hillingdon)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Anthony Coombs.]

10.1 pm

Sir Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): For me, the care of the elderly in Uxbridge and in the borough of Hillingdon as a whole is one of the most important parts of public policy. As president of the Uxbridge Abbeyfield Society, which provides care for many of our senior citizens, I have been able to learn at first hand, and gain valuable insight into, the way in which places are funded and provided in the community.

The recent media coverage of Hillingdon hospital's patient admissions policy has caused unnecessary alarm and distress to my elderly constituents and to the constituents of my hon. Friends the Members for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) and for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes), whose constituencies, with mine, share the hospital's catchment area.

A headline in The Guardian at the beginning of October, "Hospitals in cash crisis bar many elderly", triggered a mass of reports in the press and on the radio and television to the effect that Hillingdon hospital was no longer admitting people over 75. The facts behind that health scare are very different. That is why I am raising the matter this evening, and why I invite the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister.

It is also why I want the Government to make it clear beyond any shadow of a doubt, first, that there is no cash crisis at Hillingdon hospital; secondly, that at no time were people over 75 who came from the hospital's catchment area refused admission on the ground of their age; and, thirdly, that the responsibility for funding and providing beds for elderly patients is the responsibility of the local agencies concerned—the hospitals, the local health authority, the local social services department and the local medical committee. It is for them to co-operate and co-ordinate the necessary arrangements to ensure that the necessary accommodation is always available to everyone, irrespective of age.

I was first made aware of the pressure on Hillingdon hospital at a meeting that I had with the chairman of the Hillingdon Hospital NHS trust, Mr. William Glyn-Williams, and the chief executive, Mr. Philip Brown, on 1 October. I was told that the hospital faced the possibility of having to refuse accident and emergency admissions for a short period because the number of elderly patients referred by general practitioners, especially from the north of the borough, was resulting in more than 30 additional admissions each day.

There are 600 beds in Hillingdon hospital and I am told that about 300 of them are occupied by elderly patients. The 30 referrals a day, multiplied by the number of days in the month, was equivalent to 900 bed days a month. That was the scale of the problem that Hillingdon hospital was facing.

I was also told that Mount Vernon hospital in Northwood, in the constituency of Ruislip–Northwood, was not admitting as many patients as it might have done because of the case mix in the hospital, and that it would greatly assist if Hillingdon council's social services department could receive into community care as quickly as possible patients who no longer required hospital treatment and needed to be cared for in community homes or, if insufficient places were available, in independent residential care.

I was very concerned to learn of the situation. I advised the chairman to discuss the matter urgently with the chairman of Mount Vernon and Watford Hospitals NHS trust—a former chairman of Hillingdon health authority—the officers of the authority and the social services department and to sort out the problem. I also offered to arrange a meeting with my hon. Friend the Minister if it was thought that that would help to find a quick solution to the problem.

I heard no more until 8 October, when the chief executive of Hillingdon hospital wrote a letter to general medical practitioners in the north of the borough—areas such as Ruislip, Eastcote, Northwood, Harefield and elsewhere on the borders of the north of the borough—advising them that elderly patients over 75 years old should be referred to the most appropriate local hospital, Mount Vernon.

There is great concern in Ruislip and Northwood at the moment because many elderly people do not like the prospect of being referred to Watford general hospital, which principally admits accident and emergency patients, because they feel that Watford is a long way from Northwood and is not easy for people to visit. There is considerable pressure when a patient cannot be admitted to Mount Vernon to send that patient to Hillingdon, to which, of course, the doctors have to respond.

The letter sent by the chief executive of Hillingdon health authority to doctors was leaked to The Guardian and resulted in the highly misleading headlines that I have mentioned and the subsequent alarm that spread throughout my constituency. I have been assured by my hon. Friend the Minister that Hillingdon hospital was not seeking to discriminate on the basis of age but wished to ensure that all patients received safe and effective NHS treatment in the most appropriate location in accordance with their clinical need.

In a programme of public information designed to correct the misleading information that had been given, Hillingdon hospital went to very considerable lengths to reassure the public whom it serves by means of an advertorial in the local press, which appeared for two consecutive weeks. I welcome that initiative, which I hope will go a long way towards dispelling any remaining doubts that elderly people might have about their right to treatment in hospital when they need it, at any time, irrespective of age.

As I have said, I undertook to raise the matter of more community care with the acting director of social services of the borough of Hillingdon and to find out what could be done to place patients in the council's homes and independent homes as quickly as possible. I have done that. The acting director tells me that Hillingdon council has 330 beds in eight homes; in addition, it currently funds 219 permanent residential and nursing placements, has 172 permanent complex home care packages and approximately 100 short-stay residential nursing home care packages. About 70 permanent residential or nursing home care packages are to be made available between the beginning of this month and 31 March next year.

The current community care budget for the elderly is £5 million, and the council intends to allocate another £1.3 million to its community care budget next April.

I put on record the accommodation that is available, because it was suggested to me that one of the problems facing Hillingdon hospital in discharging elderly patients into the community was Hillingdon social services' slowness to take some patients. Following my discussions with the acting director of social services only today, I am assured that Social Services will take all necessary steps to speed up admissions and to increase the availability of beds.

I am glad to report that, as a result of all that activity, Hillingdon health authority has taken immediate action to reduce significantly the number of Hillingdon residents—56 at the end of September—waiting in hospitals solely for residential and nursing home placement. It will use six of the 12 care beds that it currently funds at Hayes Cottage nursing home, will agree with Hillingdon council how it can assist with the temporary funding of 30 additional nursing and residential home places at a cost of £90,000 this year, and will continue to work with the council to ensure the effective use of all the in-house residential beds and services that provide care in the community.

For 1997-98, there will be further costs to be met by the council, which will be expected to accept the responsibility for funding. I understand that Hillingdon council estimates that it will have to provide £100,000 to fund 30 beds. It is expected that those proposals will allow 30 people currently waiting for a nursing or residential home to be placed by Christmas.

Another six beds are to be made available immediately at Mount Vernon hospital by reopening beds in existing medical wards, which will make possible about 18 additional admissions a month. There will be joint monitoring to ensure the effective implementation of the health authority's short and medium-term plans.

I greatly welcome the fact that it has been agreed that the chief executives of the health authority and of the two trusts and the director of social services will in future meet on a fortnightly basis to keep the situation under review.

Taken over two years, the proposals will represent a cost to the health authority of £283,000 and will better enable the two local hospitals safely to meet this winter's demand for emergency admissions. That point was raised by the chairman of the Hillingdon medical committee, and I hope that he and his colleagues will be reassured that all the necessary steps have been taken.

As president of the Abbeyfield Society, I declare an interest in asking my hon. Friend the Minister why better use cannot be made of Abbeyfield places to provide additional beds for people being discharged from hospital. I tabled some parliamentary questions on that topic that were answered by my hon. Friend's Department as long ago as July, and I was advised that the elderly people who were in Abbeyfield homes before a certain date were protected there but that, for some reason that I cannot quite follow, they could not go into Abbeyfield places after that date.

It is extraordinary that we are in such a situation when a national charity that is well represented locally has some extra places and could take additional patients discharged from hospital. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be kind enough to look into the matter and find whether further steps can be taken to fund places in Abbeyfield homes for patients who are discharged from hospital.

In passing, because it is too good an opportunity to miss, I mention that the Uxbridge Abbeyfield Society has acquired a site in the Greenway, Uxbridge on which it could build a home for about 35 elderly people to live in very good conditions. It is unable to build the home because it cannot get its bid high enough up in the local authority's bidding list, because the local authority has responsibility for families with children, who come ahead of the elderly in budgetary terms and in bidding generally. I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will consider that matter, because Uxbridge cannot be alone; there must be other towns and cities where people have voluntarily raised considerable sums to buy land and which are ready to build but are unable to do so because of the way in which the system works.

Finally, 36 extra beds have been provided in the borough of Hillingdon. The pressure on Hillingdon hospital has been relieved. The problem has been solved. The headlines in The Guardian and other papers were unjustified. I hope that my elderly constituents and those of my hon. Friends—my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West is in his place tonight—will be greatly reassured. I look forward to hearing my hon. Friend the Minister because I hope that he will be able to give further assurance on these matters.

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby). I congratulate him on securing a debate on the important topic of care for the elderly in Hillingdon and on the part that he has played in explaining some of the issues more sensibly than would otherwise have been the case. I know that he speaks on behalf of several colleagues, including my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes).

He is also to be congratulated on securing a debate on health care 50 years to the day after Royal Assent to the Act that established the national health service. We shall see in considering health care in Hillingdon that the founding principles of the NHS are very much alive and well there as they are throughout the country.

It is a pity that the letter written by the chief executive of Hillingdon hospital has been taken out of context and used to generate unnecessary concern about hospital care for local elderly residents. I will put the letter into its proper context later, but first I want to make it absolutely clear—this is the most important point for my hon. Friend's constituents—that there was no question at any time of any Hillingdon resident of whatever age not getting from the NHS the care and treatment demanded by that resident's clinical condition. The health authority and local hospital trusts acted promptly to reassure local people of that.

Hillingdon hospital made it clear that it would under no circumstances decline to treat any patient, elderly or otherwise, and that no patient requiring emergency treatment would be turned away from accident and emergency untreated. Those reassurances have been fulfilled. In the four weeks since the chief executive's letter, no patient has been disadvantaged, and everyone who has needed a bed at Hillingdon has got one.

Before discussing the Hillingdon situation in more detail, I should like to reassure the House on the treatment of elderly people generally. It is not and never has been Government policy for NHS treatment to be withheld from anyone on the ground of age. We have always made it clear that, whatever the age of a patient, there are no exceptions to the fundamental principle that the NHS is there to provide services for everybody on the basis of clinical need.

Let me turn to the recent circumstances at Hillingdon. The letter from the chief executive was not a panic measure in the face of a crisis but one part of a complex issue that local health and social services agencies had been working on constructively for some time. As my hon. Friend knows, two excellent hospitals serve Hillingdon residents: Mount Vernon hospital to the north, and Hillingdon hospital to the south. They are run by Mount Vernon and Watford Hospitals NHS trust, and Hillingdon Hospital NHS trust respectively.

Both are extremely good hospitals with good reputations and devoted and caring staff. More particularly, both hospitals provide comprehensive and excellent services for elderly people. The record speaks for itself. Hillingdon hospital provided 34,800 ordinary and day case treatments in 1995-96, and Mount Vernon provided 61,295 treatments—in both cases, some 4 per cent. more than in the previous year. That is a considerable tribute to the doctors, nurses and other staff at both hospitals. Both trusts have been in discussion with Hillingdon health authority about how services can best be provided to meet the needs of residents.

Back in the spring, Hillingdon hospital became concerned about the pressure on beds at the hospital. It already had an acclaimed bed management system which enabled it to use the 630 beds that it has as efficiently as possible. The reasons for the pressure appeared to be twofold. First, the hospital was seeing an increasing number of patients, particularly elderly patients, requiring hospital admission. Secondly, elderly patients were staying in hospital for longer.

The hospital explained its concerns to the health authority and the social services department and in June a working party was set up to examine the issues. Immediate action was also taken, including the provision of additional social work posts in the hospital to ensure prompt assessments of patients' continuing care needs and to assist in the hospital discharge process. Since then, hospital discharge has been kept under close review, and early last month the social services department made additional facilities available to take elderly patients discharged from hospital by re-opening 10 places in a refurbished residential care home, and by the approval of seven extra nursing home places.

It is clearly in everyone's interest to ensure that GPs refer patients to the most appropriate local hospital. It appeared, however, as my hon. Friend says, that in a few situations GPs in the vicinity of Mount Vernon hospital were referring elderly patients to Hillingdon hospital although Mount Vernon was the closest local hospital and could provide the service required.

This was the background to the Hillingdon hospital chief executive's letter to GPs of 3 October. It did not seek to deny treatment to anyone; rather it sought to ensure that patients were treated in the most suitable NHS hospital, and the one most conveniently situated for the patients themselves. The intention behind the letter was to ensure that NHS resources were used to best effect, for the benefit of all patients, whether young or old and wherever they lived in the Hillingdon borough.

When it became clear that the letter had generated anxiety, albeit misplaced, among the elderly of Hillingdon, the hospital promptly explained that under no circumstances did this mean that patients would be turned away. Mount Vernon and Watford Hospital NHS trust also acted to reassure residents, pointing out that, since the merger of Mount Vernon and Watford General hospitals under single trust management, the trust now guarantees admission for the elderly patients of local GPs and has some 90 beds for the elderly across the two sites.

I have already mentioned the working party set up in June to examine the pressures on Hillingdon hospital and to develop an action plan to address these concerns. The working party consisted of representatives from the two hospital trusts, Hillingdon health authority, social services, and Age Concern. The group was tasked with producing an action plan for the health authority meeting of 31 October. I stress that local co-operation between local agencies—health agencies, social services and the voluntary organisations—is essential. I am pleased to say that the group's action plan was duly prepared and endorsed at the health authority meeting last Thursday.

The action plan provides immediately 30 additional places in the community, including six in the independently run Hayes cottage hospital. Those 30 places include the 17 that I mentioned earlier. It also provides six new medical beds at Mount Vernon hospital to provide enhanced services to GPs' patients in the north of the borough. These steps should relieve the pressure on Hillingdon hospital now and into the future.

The health authority has also agreed in principle to provide further investment next year to support hospital discharge procedures at Hillingdon hospital, and to look at innovative approaches to patient care as an alternative to hospital admissions. All parties will be looking to improve working practices to ensure the timely discharge of patients from both trusts.

I should of course also point out that this action is complementary to the plans that Hillingdon and all other health authorities have prepared with trusts during the summer to ensure that the service is best placed to respond to any surges in emergency demand in the coming winter.

My hon. Friend also made the point that the problems in Hillingdon were not due to a lack of funds. That is true. I can tell him that the total personal social services resources available to Hillingdon stand at almost £35 million a year, 8.5 per cent. more in cash terms than last year and more than double the resources available six years ago.

Hillingdon health authority has more resources than ever before. Its revenue allocation for this year is £106.4 million, £3.3 million more in cash terms and more than £500,000 more in real terms than it was the previous year. I therefore agree with my hon. Friend that it is not a problem of lack of resources locally.

[Mr. John Horam]

My hon. Friend also spoke about Abbeyfield homes. That serious issue needs to be investigated, and I undertake to reflect upon it and correspond with him about it.

As my hon. Friend was pleased to note, Hillingdon hospital is now reporting that although it is busy, the pressure on beds has eased, and it is managing its work load satisfactorily. My hon. Friend will also be pleased to note, as I am, that the founding principle of the national health service to provide health care to all, on the basis of need, regardless of ability to pay, is alive and well in Hillingdon, as it is throughout the country on this day, the 50th anniversary of the Act that established the NHS.

Question put and agreed to.

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN

QUEEN'S SPEECH (ANSWER TO ADDRESS)

The VICE-CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:

I have received with great satisfaction the loyal and dutiful expression of your thanks for the Speech with which I opened the present Session of Parliament.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Convictions

1. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each of the last three years the proportion of criminal offences that ended in a court conviction. [914]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): About 6 per cent., but the percentage for more serious offences was very much higher and many of those convicted will have committed other crimes of which they have not been convicted.

Mr. Ainsworth: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that that figure is a percentage of recorded crime only, that the level of convictions is a disgrace and that the biggest deterrent to crime is the fear of getting caught? Will he accept that it is now three times more likely that a burglar or rapist will escape punishment than when Labour was in power? Will he do something to address that problem, instead of giving us this continual rhetoric?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman's comments would carry some conviction if he and his hon. Friends had been prepared to support the measures that we have taken to increase the likelihood of convictions taking place. Let me give an example: if the rate of suspects refusing to answer questions has fallen by half—as it has since we reformed the right to silence—that reform is likely to increase the proportion of convictions, yet the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends, including the Leader of the Opposition, steadfastly opposed it, root and branch.

Sir Irvine Patnick: Some of those offences will be knife offences. As my right hon. and learned Friend is aware, I contacted the umbrella organisations for the industry in Sheffield to ensure that none of the manufacturers were disadvantaged. I sent him some of the work done by the Cutlery and Allied Trades Research Association. Has that been taken into consideration when framing any proposed legislation?

Mr. Howard: I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall take into account all representations, including those to which he referred, when considering proposals for further legislation on this matter.

Mr. Riddick: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, when someone is convicted of a criminal offence, it is important that he receives an appropriate sentence? Will he assure the House that he will continue to work towards his objective of imposing longer sentences on burglars, rapists and other people who commit violent crimes, and that he will not be deflected from that objective by the views of former Ministers, liberal judges and penal reformers? The British public are entirely behind his efforts on this front.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I can certainly give him the assurance that he requests. If we are to fight crime effectively, we need both to convict the criminals and to ensure that they are properly dealt with—and properly punished—when they have been convicted. That is one of the purposes of the proposals set out in the Crime (Sentences) Bill—a Bill to which the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) referred on the radio this week, saying that he was leading the opposition to it.

Mr. Beggs: When criminal offences involving the illegal smuggling of tobacco products into the United Kingdom occur, such as the recent large haul impounded in Belfast in Northern Ireland, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman seek to ensure that the level of fine imposed on conviction matches the value of the impounded cargo and thereby protect our local newsagents and, indeed, the Treasury, which is losing valuable revenue?

Mr. Howard: I understand and sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's argument. I am not sure that we are yet ready to introduce a series of minimum mandatory fines and, in the absence of such fines, the matter is for the discretion of the court concerned, but I have great sympathy with the argument that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Mr. Michael: As the Home Secretary issues his soundbite attacks on the Opposition, he knows in his heart of hearts that Labour has worked hard in opposition to be tough on crime, to be tough on the causes of crime and to support the Government when they make constructive proposals. In contrast, would not a little more humility be appropriate when the Home Secretary considers the facts: that recorded crime is double the level it was when the Conservative party came to power, that fewer than one in 50 crimes end up in a punishment by a court, and that, in his county of Kent, violent crime has gone up by 300 per cent.—and robbery by 600 per cent.—since the Conservative party came to power?

Mr. Howard: We hear these inane generalities from the Labour party, but Labour Members refuse to deal with the specific points such as the example that I put to them a few minutes ago. The number of suspects refusing to answer questions has nearly halved since we reformed the right to silence. When we reformed the right to silence, the Labour party—whose shadow Home Secretary at the time is now the Leader of the Opposition—opposed that reform root and branch. What we have done—not uttering inane generalities across the Floor of the House—is the way to get criminals convicted and to reduce crime.

Handguns

2. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's latest proposals on handguns. [915]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Miss Ann Widdecombe): The Government have introduced legislation that will stop all handguns being kept at home—.22 rimfire handguns will have to be kept in licensed, secure pistol clubs. All higher calibre handguns will be prohibited. I believe that those provisions will give the public the protection that they need.

Mr. Winnick: Is there not overwhelming public support for a ban on handguns? Is it not a pity that the Government are not going even further, as requested by the police and as would certainly be supported by the public—although Ministers are shaking their heads? Is it not disgraceful—almost obscene—that some members of the gun lobby are reported to be urging a dirty tricks campaign against the organisers of Snowdrop? How low and deplorable can one get?

Miss Widdecombe: I naturally deplore all dirty tricks campaigns and all low and deplorable levels to which people sink when opposing perfectly sensible legislation. I believe that the measures that we are introducing produce the right balance between protecting the public, ensuring that handguns will not be in circulation outside secure clubs and preserving what has been a perfectly legitimate sport in this country for more than 100 years.

Mr. John Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend accept my total opposition, of which she knows, to this intended Bill? The Government intend to confiscate the personal property of innocent individuals. The Bill will have an enormous effect, not only on those individuals but on numerous businesses and very many others attached to the industry. The proposed compensation is totally inadequate. In a sense of fairness, will the Government accept that they are wrong? Will my hon. Friend ensure that compensation is much fairer and wider than is presently proposed, especially in the money resolution associated with the Bill?

Miss Widdecombe: Our current proposal is to compensate people for the loss of their guns at the market value of those guns on the day before the Secretary of State's statement. We shall compensate dealers for their stocks of guns on the same basis. I am always prepared to consider any sensible and reasonable suggestion that any hon. Member on either side of the House may wish to make during the Bill's passage, but I have explained our present thinking to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Henderson: The Minister will be aware that, arising out of the gun Bill, there has been wide public debate not just about pistols, but about other forms of firearms currently used in the United Kingdom. Has consideration been given to airguns, which are commonly in use in many parts of the country? They are often used by young people to intimidate and harass others in the community, and can be purchased by a 17-year-old and used by a person aged 14. Does the Minister believe that there is a case for reviewing the law on airguns, considering a system of licensing, and changing the age at which people can buy or use such potentially lethal weapons?

Miss Widdecombe: Licensing is important. That is why, although the Bill is largely geared to handguns, it includes proposals that cover rifles as well. The proposals that we have produced are in response to the independent report by Lord Cullen. It is in the public interest to get legislation on the statute book quickly. We therefore thought that we should tackle the particular problem in hand.

Mr. Peter Griffiths: Can my hon. Friend say when she may be able to offer a considered response to the genuine concerns of those who shoot with muzzle-loading, flintlock or matchlock pistols, which could not by any remote stretch of the imagination be connected with contemporary crime?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend will be aware that we have made a number of exceptions—for example, for antique guns and trophies of war. We are giving careful consideration to the definitions that we have used. We will take into account the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend, and consider our response as soon as possible.

Ms Eagle: Will the Minister comment on the availability of extremely dangerous shotgun cartridges, which often do greater damage than smaller bullets in handguns? Although everyone in the House accepts the argument that handguns should be banned because they can be more easily concealed, does the Minister agree that we should consider stricter licensing measures for rifles and shotguns as well, and the possibility of including such measures in the Bill?

Miss Widdecombe: I have already said that we have tightened up the conditions for issuing certificates, especially with regard to the referees required and the proof of fitness. That applies not only to handguns, but to rifles as well. I also said, in response to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), that many issues might have been considered, but, in the interests of getting legislation quickly on to the statute book to protect the general public, we have addressed principally the concerns raised by Lord Cullen.

Schengen Treaty

3. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the Government's policy with regard to United Kingdom accession to the Schengen treaty. [916]

Mr. Howard: The Government have no intention of seeking accession to the Schengen treaty.

Mr. Brown: I am delighted to hear that answer. Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that border controls are essential in our aim to defeat drug trafficking and all other forms of crime? May I appeal to my right hon. and learned Friend to have a word with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ensure that there are sufficient customs officers at ports such as Immingham in my constituency, and at Humberside airport in my constituency, which are vulnerable to drug trafficking and the importing of illegal goods?

Mr. Howard: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of maintaining our frontier controls. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have made it clear on more than one occasion that we have no intention of doing anything to dismantle or weaken them. With reference to customs and immigration officers, my hon. Friend will be aware that we are making greater use of intelligence-led action to deal with the importation of drugs and other forbidden substances and articles into the United Kingdom. Those methods are having considerable success.

Mr. Beith: Does the Home Secretary's opposition to the Schengen agreement extend to the work of Europol, which is essential in tackling international drug trafficking and in which British police officers play an important role? Why has the British Government resisted the development of Europol, on occasion blocking its essential provisions? Is that part of the Schengen argument?

Mr. Howard: As usual, the right hon. Gentleman has completely the wrong end of the stick. In fact, the United Kingdom Government were at the forefront of progress in establishing Europol. We continue to make progress in advancing it, and we expect to be one of the first countries to ratify the Europol convention.

Handgun Control

4. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the public representations he has received since 16 October on handgun control proposals. [917]

Miss Widdecombe: Since 16 October, we have received upwards of 250 letters on this subject from right hon. and hon. Members. The Department has received more than 700 telephone calls and more than 1,200 letters from the public. The great majority of letters have been from individual shooters.

Mr. Dykes: As to the idea of a total ban on handguns or one so close to being a total ban that it renders unnecessary the creation of new loopholes in the future, does my hon. Friend agree that the overwhelming views of about 56 million people are much more important than those of 56,000 shooters?

Miss Widdecombe: As I said in response to a previous question, we are trying to strike a balance between protecting legitimate sporting rights and protecting the public. Lord Cullen produced an independent report with 24 recommendations, 23 of which we have accepted. I assure my hon. Friend that we are trying to get the balance right.

Mr. Ainger: Will the Minister confirm that, under the proposed legislation, individuals who currently own high calibre weapons will receive compensation, and, there is nothing to stop them buying .22 calibre weapons, so the estimated figure of some 40,000 .22 calibre weapons in circulation after the legislation is enacted is likely to fall far short of the mark, and people may use many more such weapons than they do at present?

Miss Widdecombe: That is an impossible prophecy. Perhaps some people who currently own .22 calibre weapons will decide, because of the restrictions on other weapons or the inconvenience caused to some—but not all—clubs, to cease to use .22 calibre weapons. It is quite impossible to make that sort of behavioural prediction.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend concede that there is a serious possibility that the judges of the European Court of Human Rights may oblige the British taxpayer to provide compensation on a much wider basis—to those who manufacture pistols, to gun clubs owners, professional shooters and those who supply the ancillary trades? As the object of the exercise is to preserve human life, does my hon. Friend agree that, if the level of compensation were to rise to between £0.5 billion and £1 billion as some suggest, taxpayers might consider that the money would be better spent elsewhere?

Miss Widdecombe: Our estimates are nowhere near the figures mentioned by my hon. Friend. We shall take full account of all our legal obligations in deciding how we should compensate and what compensation is proper. There are plenty of precedents for providing compensation following changes in the law. We shall do what we believe is right, and we shall put our proposals before the House.

Dr. Godman: May I point out to the Minister that, a few years ago, two Glasgow police officers were shot dead by an assassin armed with a .22 calibre pistol. Does she realise that the overwhelming majority of people in Scotland demand that any ban on pistols should include .22 calibre weapons?

Miss Widdecombe: The statistics for homicides between 1992 and 1994 show clearly that only about 5 per cent. involved .22 calibre weapons. I agree that 5 per cent. is too much, but it puts the problem into context. I sympathise with the relatives of the policemen to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, but I believe that, by confining guns to clubs, we are tackling the problem of guns in circulation and held perfectly legally by the general public.

Short-term Remand

5. Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce short–term remands to allow fast tracking of cases; and if he will make a statement. [918]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): We want to ensure that cases come to trial as soon as possible. All the criminal justice agencies are committed to this end and much is being done. We have also recently set up a review to identify urgently what more can be done to reduce delays, including the possibility of shorter-term remands.

Sir Michael Shersby: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as there are only 349 secure places available in England and Wales, a new sort of secure facility is needed in which juveniles can be held in secure conditions while their needs are assessed by a multi-agency group? The problem that is being experienced quite widely is that juveniles abscond from normal community homes, or sometimes abscond from a car on their way to such a home. We need short-term secure remand facilities.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend will be aware that, in conjunction with the Department of Health, we have been investing sums to ensure that more remand spaces are available, but we must be interested in speeding up the process of bringing all cases to trial, whether in the Crown courts or magistrates courts, whether for adults or for juveniles. A range of studies is under way, which is being supervised by the pre-trial issues steering group. The group is endeavouring to ensure that all parts of the criminal justice system move as quickly as possible in future.

Criminal Cases (Review)

6. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the criminal cases review authority to be established; and if he will make a statement. [919]

8. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimated date by which the body set up for the review of criminal cases will begin its operation; and what criteria will be used to determine the order of review of disputed convictions. [921]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): We expect the Criminal Cases Review Commission to be established around the turn of the year. It will be for the commission to determine its own criteria for the order in which it considers the cases that come before it.

Mr. Mullin: Was the Home Secretary aware when he appointed Sir Frederick Crawford as chairman of the commission that Sir Frederick was a freemason—and not just any old freemason, but one of the leading freemasons in the land? May I say to the Minister that those of us who take an interest in miscarriages of justice have always been a wee bit cynical about the role of the Home Office, but even I was somewhat taken aback to find that the Home Secretary was so daft as to appoint a leading freemason to such a sensitive post?

Mr. Kirkhope: The post was openly advertised. There were 124 applicants, and consideration of them was conducted in a proper manner in accordance with the Nolan procedures, which the House approved recently. Indeed, the appointment was one of the earliest to go through the Nolan procedures. I have no doubt that the appointee, Sir Frederick Crawford, will act with complete integrity and impartiality.

Mr. Gunnell: Is the Minister able to say that the appointment was considered by the officer who has been given responsibility to review public appointments—Sir Len Peach? Is he able to give us Sir Len's view of the appointment? Is the Minister aware that many prisoners, including the sons of some of my constituents, are held without time limit because they have not agreed that they committed the crimes of which they have been convicted? In many instances they have served a longer term than they would have served if they had pleaded guilty. Will the Minister ensure that the authorities are aware of such cases and that they take into account the time that prisoners, who may be innocent, have spent in gaol?

Mr. Kirkhope: The guidelines of the commission for public appointments were followed. Once the commission is working, I am sure that it will want to set its own timetable for the cases that it will have to consider. Slightly more than 200 cases are awaiting final consideration, and will go to the commission. It is expected that there will be an increase in the number of applications during the commission's first year of operation. Nevertheless, I am sure that it will review the nature of the cases and will have its timetable fixed accordingly.

Dame Jill Knight: May I tell my hon. Friend that many Birmingham Members will strongly resent the slur against Sir Frederick Crawford, who did an excellent job as vice-chancellor of Aston university for many years? Does my hon. Friend accept that what a person chooses to do in his spare time should not be a bar if his abilities are such that he will fulfil correctly a job that is offered to him?

Mr. Kirkhope: I am sure that my hon. Friend is quite right about that. As long as the proper criteria are met in appointments, and they are in accordance with the Nolan procedures, I have no reason to doubt that the chairman will do an excellent job.

Mr. Nicholls: As one who is not a freemason and never intends to be, I find it rather distasteful that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) conducts this campaign against freemasons when, to my certain knowledge—and perhaps that of my hon. Friend as well—many of them are among the most upright people in the community and do a great deal of work for charity as well. It is rather unpleasant that hon. Members should use their position in the House to attack people of that quality and calibre.

Mr. Kirkhope: Our major concern in relation to the commission is to have the best people doing the job. Many hon. Members have called for us to set up a commission. They expect us to set it up in such a way that it will be effective. For it to be effective, we need to ensure that the best people are involved in chairing it and in membership of it. I believe that that will occur.

Queen's Speech

9. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the measures announced in the Queen's Speech. [922]

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office measures announced in the Gracious Speech have one simple aim—to protect the public. As my right hon. and learned Friend told the House last week, they represent the most radical attack on crime this century. They have won wide support from the police and the public.

Mr. Thurnham: Will the Minister join me in congratulating Bolton's police force on achieving, against the national trend, a 10 per cent. reduction in crime over the past five months? Should not those figures be published quarterly, as they always used to be?

Mr. Maclean: Greater Manchester police have been successful in reducing crime, as have many other forces, leading in the past three years to the largest fall in crime for 40 years.

If the hon. Gentleman is interested in the success of the Greater Manchester police in reducing crime and in more bobbies on the beat, I am very surprised at his new choice of party. I must give him the Liberal party policy document that I have here, which says:

"Putting more police officers on the beat will ... have little effect in reducing levels of crime".

If he wants crime in Manchester to keep falling, I hope that he will change his new party's policies.

Mr. Alexander: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the law and order measures announced in the Queen's Speech, particularly those that will ensure that sentences mean what they say, have been widely welcomed in the constituencies? Is he further aware that, even in the constituency of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), that is certainly the case? Sentences must mean what they say, and that is clearly provided for in the Gracious Speech.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The key measures in the Crime (Sentencing) Bill—of honesty in sentencing and of minimum mandatory sentences for burglars, drug dealers and serious violent and sexual offenders—have been welcomed and are widely supported by everyone except the Labour party, which dithered and sat on its hands on Monday night, was afraid to vote for them and faced the shame of some of its own members voting against them on Monday night.

Mr. Flynn: Did not the Minister of State expose the absurdity of the Government's attempt to reduce the number of guns when she confessed this afternoon that she did not know how many people who, deprived of their high calibre guns, would transfer to .22 weapons? Does not that mean that, if all of them do that, there will be no reduction whatever in the number of guns in people's homes? Has she not exposed this afternoon the fact that the Bill is entirely futile unless it is improved by the Labour party's amendment?

Mr. Maclean: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. He is wrong on many counts. He misquoted my hon. Friend, and handguns will not be held in people's homes. It is clearly our intention that the lesser calibre .22 rimfire handguns will be held in secure gun clubs. It is right to say that it is impossible to forecast whether some people may wish to acquire .22 handguns in future or whether even more .22 handgun owners will decide that it is not worth the hassle of complying with the tough new rules and give up their .22 handguns as well. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman is quite wrong to jump to the conclusions that he does.

Rugby Matches (Twickenham)

10. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the policing of big match days at the Rugby Football Union ground, Twickenham. [923]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): I am assured by the commissioner that extra officers for the policing of match days at Twickenham will be deployed as and when needed.

Mr. Jessel: I am grateful for that. Rugby football is a sport of great national importance, but is my hon. Friend aware that the combination of the increase in the number of big match days and the growing number of people who arrive by car has inflicted on my constituents who live nearby almost impossible conditions? Will he please ask the commissioner to ensure that the increase in the number of police is as large as possible so that my constituents can get in and out of their homes?

Mr. Sackville: I very much sympathise with my hon. Friend's constituents, who are, after all, victims of rugby's success. I have sat in a huge traffic jam on the A316 more than once, having the misfortune to arrive at the same time as a match is exiting, and I am aware of the effects of that and of the parking problem to which he referred. I am assured that the police will continue to take what measures they can in order to obviate that distressing problem.

Youth Justice

11. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to speed up the system of youth justice. [924]

Mr. Kirkhope: We welcome the action being taken by all criminal justice agencies to speed up the process of bringing young offenders to justice—for example avoiding unnecessary adjournments, co-ordinating their approach and sentencing persistent offenders promptly without waiting for other changes to be heard. The review on expediting justice, which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned earlier, is also examining this specific issue.

Mrs. Prentice: Is the Minister aware that, despite the painstaking work of the local police, it took more than six months to bring to trial some young hooligans who were terrorising the residents of the Downham estate in my constituency, and that, once tried and convicted, two of them were fined a pathetic £7 and £15 respectively? Does that not send out all the wrong messages to victims and offenders, and is not justice delayed, justice denied?

Mr. Kirkhope: I am sure that the hon. Lady, herself a justice of the peace and a former teacher, will be well aware of the need for us to have a co-ordinated approach to the way in which we deal with young people. Therefore, I hope that she will support the Government's proposals to speed up such matters and bring criminals to justice.

I am pleased to be able to announce to the House that the Magistrates Association and the Justices' Clerks Society have agreed to give guidance that, in future, instead of charges against young people being deferred pending the consideration of other charges that are still being investigated, they will be dealt with there and then in order to ensure that young people understand that they should be dealt with as close to the committal of the crime as possible.

Mr. John Greenway: How soon will the first new secure training unit come on stream? Those units will do a great deal to improve the behaviour of young people convicted of offences. Is it not odd that one of the Opposition's five core pledges is to speed up youth justice, yet they have obstructed the development and construction of secure training units at every turn?

Mr. Kirkhope: The Conservative party has decided to follow that course and I am glad that my hon. Friend is so supportive. I only wish that all Labour-controlled local authorities were doing their best to assist us in opening such centres. Bassetlaw council has decided to block a planning application for such a unit, when it well knows that such a move can only have an adverse impact on our ability to get such units in place and operational as quickly as possible.

Mr. Straw: Is the Minister not aware that there is no better, or worse, example of the failure of this Government after 17 years to deal with law and order than the decay and negligence now apparent in the youth justice system? The case that my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) cited, in which after six months those young hooligans were fined a derisory £7 and £15 for terrorising a neighbourhood, is all too typical of the current chaos in the youth justice system. Instead of initiating studies, why does the Minister not impose clear limits on the time that it takes to get such matters to court, and ensure that in no case is the court allowed to issue another warning after previous warnings have been given?

Mr. Kirkhope: The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. The weasel words that he is spouting do not fit very neatly into the policies and attitudes of his party. The Labour party has just published another piece of paper on the issue, but what have Labour Members been doing all these years, because they have not supported the Government in their attempts to make the justice system tougher? If the hon. Gentleman wants to help us to deal with such matters, he should support us totally by calling for tougher sentences and by supporting my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Crime Investigation

12. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to improve the investigation of crimes across police force boundaries. [926]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend's proposals for a national crime squad will significantly enhance the police's ability to investigate organised crime across police force boundaries at home and abroad.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. Friend share my view that a national crime squad will build on the already considerable regional success that the police are having in tackling organised drugs crime? Does he agree that that, coupled with my right hon. and learned Friend's tough sentencing proposals, will send a clear message to those who destroy lives by peddling drugs?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The national criminal intelligence service and the regional crime squads are a great British police success story. Last year, the total number of drug-related arrests was about 1,400, the total value of confiscated assets was more than £2 million and the total value of street drugs seized by the regional crime squads was more than £250 million. That was their success last year, and they have had even greater success this year. When the Police Bill is on the statute book, we shall have the new national crime squad, which will build on those outstanding successes.

Mr. Miller: Does the Minister accept that one way of improving cross-border activity among the police is the early development of the database HOLMES 2? Will he ensure that the specification for that project includes the most far-reaching data mining processes, which have been used in experiments in Warwickshire and in his authority and by the FBI? Will he also ensure that that specification is out to tender at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. Maclean: I shall ensure that the specifications for HOLMES 2, Phoenix, Quest, the national police information system strategy and the huge automatic fingerprint system are along the lines of what the police want. That is why we are creating PITO, the police information technology organisation, to ensure that the specifications are not drawn up just by politicians, but by the police service according to its needs. With the private finance initiative, we intend to deliver many of those schemes as soon as possible.

Mr. Brazier: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the thinking behind this welcome new national squad is along the lines of intelligence-led policing pioneered by police forces such as Kent? Does he further agree that it will operate most effectively in conjunction with the measures on minimum sentences for persistent drug dealers that the Government are introducing, apparently against the wishes of the principal Opposition?

Mr. Maclean: I congratulate Kent on its initiatives on intelligence-led policing. The success of NCIS and the national crime squads will be obviated if the Labour party do not support measures to ensure that the most dangerous and persistent criminals who are caught by the police are locked up for sufficiently long. We are aware of the two-faced attitude of the Labour party. No doubt, over the next few months, we shall hear Labour Members boasting that they have supported the Police Bill—which sets up NCIS and PITO—whereas on Monday night most of them sat on their hands. Some of them went through the No Lobby to vote against the measures that will ensure that this country's worst drug dealers are locked up for a minimum of seven years. We should not be surprised at that. They voted against every measure like that in the 1980s as well.

Fireworks

13. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents which involved fireworks have been reported to the police in each year since 1992. [927]

Mr. Sackville: The police become involved in a wide variety of incidents involving fireworks, such as illegal sale, misuse and nuisance and serious incidents of fire or injury. The statistics on injuries caused by fireworks are collected from hospitals by the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Heppell: I am sure that the Minister will want to join the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs in expressing his condolences following the death of a constituent of mine, 10-year-old Dale Mitchell, who died because of the misuse of fireworks. Given that a third of firework injuries are not accidents but are caused by illegal misuse, why are there not more prosecutions for illegal misuse, and why are more people not prosecuted for supplying fireworks to under-age children?

Mr. Sackville: I certainly join the hon. Gentleman in condoling with all who have been injured. There are restrictions, and there is a wealth of education each year in an attempt to avoid such incidents. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs said yesterday, he is conducting a root-and-branch inquiry into the whole issue. There is a good deal of evidence that changes are needed: every injury is an injury too many.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [944]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Michael Heseltine): I have been asked to reply.

This morning, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. My right hon. Friend has now departed for Bordeaux to attend the Anglo-French summit.

Mr. Garnier: May I commiserate with my right hon. Friend on the damage recently caused to his property by a gang of criminal thugs, which included two Labour councillors? Will he take this opportunity to contrast the Government's record on law and order with the pathetic performance of the smarmy army on the Opposition Benches? That smarmy army has not even criticised, let alone disciplined, those two Labour councillors.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. I must say that, when I looked out of my window, it seemed like old times—the winter of discontent, with the Labour party on the streets; the mobs of the 1980s, with the Labour party on the streets; and then, in the 1990s, Labour councillors on people's private property, causing damage and disruption: and the characteristic of all three? Not a word of protest from the parliamentary Labour party. Labour Members talk about being tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime, but they do not even have the energy to walk through the Lobbies when we are fighting crime.

Mr. Prescott: Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House why, 50 years ago this week, the Tories voted against the creation of the national health service?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will know that, after 50 years, the health service has been administered and supported by Tory Governments for longer than by Labour Governments. Because of that, we have made it one of the best health services in the world.

Mr. Prescott: Does the Deputy Prime Minister not understand—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Prescott: Does the Deputy Prime Minister not understand that the people simply do not believe the Tories on health? Does he not remember that, before the last election, the Prime Minister promised to cut taxes year on year? They went up year on year. Now the same Prime Minister is promising to increase health spending year on year. Is that not like the tax promise? Should not all Tory pre-election promises carry a Government health warning?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will know that, under this Government, health expenditure has gone up every year. If he really cares about the health service, why will he not, on behalf of his party, now give a commitment to match our pledge to increase, year on year, real-terms expenditure on the health service?

Mr. Prescott: The Deputy Prime Minister fails to understand that our national health service, set up by a Labour Government 50 years ago, was the greatest peacetime achievement of any Government this century. Is not the simple truth this: the British people know that the only way to safeguard our health service for the next 50 years is to elect a Labour Government, and the sooner the better?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The British people know that the Labour party will not give the pledge that the Conservatives have already given. After all, we hear all about windfall taxes. If they are so profitable and so available, why cannot windfall taxes finance the health service? The reason is, of course, that there is not an easy killing of a windfall tax any more than there is a genuine commitment from Labour to the health service.

Mr. Pickles: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in a seminar in my constituency, the chief economist for the National Westminster bank predicted that small businesses would be particularly vulnerable to a minimum wage? He warned that a minimum wage would cost thousands of jobs in Essex. Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that the Government will never introduce a minimum wage?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Any fool knows that a minimum wage costs jobs. After all, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), the shadow leader of the Labour party, has already said so.

Mr. Prescott: Don't get too excited.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am always excited by the right hon. Gentleman. The whole House is excited by him. He is an exciting person. Never has someone been so wrong, so often, on so many subjects.

Q2. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [945]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago, before my observations about the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East.

Mr. Gunnell: Will the Deputy Prime Minister join me in welcoming the support given by players of Leeds United, of Leeds rugby league club and of Yorkshire county cricket club to the urgent appeal for funds by Leeds general infirmary for essential equipment, which, it says, it cannot afford because of the national health service funding level? Is it not an absolute scandal that, after 17 years of this Government, that hospital, having closed 40 beds only last month, is forced to beg to survive?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I would overwhelmingly support anyone who sought to raise funds for charitable purposes for the health service. One of the most exciting additional supports to health funding in Britain has come from the idea of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to ensure that part of lottery proceeds go to charities in Britain. [Interruption.] I am sorry that Opposition Members are prepared to sneer at charitable giving in Britain. I realise that they would rather tax people into a position where charity was compulsory, as opposed to relying on people's natural instinct to give, but I cannot believe that the purpose of such a generous decision by the various players to whom the hon. Gentleman has referred is designed to turn the health service into a party political matter.

Q3. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [946]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bruce: Will my right hon. Friend have a chance to speak to the Prime Minister while he is in France preparing for the summit and get him to bring back a few souvenirs for Opposition Members? I have in mind in particular some recent issues of Le Figaro newspaper, which extolled the virtues of what had happened to French companies that had come to the United Kingdom to invest in British firms, highlighting particularly the low cost base here and the stable, growing economy.

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right to draw to the attention of the House the remarkable article in Le Figaro. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister drew my attention to it earlier today. The House will be pleased to know that copies of the article are on their way to this country. For the benefit of many Labour Members, translations will be freely available.

Q4. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [947]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bayley: Will the right hon. Gentleman remind the House of the new rules that were introduced to curb the abuse by former Conservative Ministers such as Peter Walker and Norman Tebbit, who left the Government and moved to the boardrooms of companies that they privatised while in office? Does he agree that it is an absolute disgrace that the Minister who privatised London's buses—the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris)—has moved from his boudoir at the Department of Transport to the profitable and sweet embrace of Capital City Bus?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The House will want to take that question extremely seriously because a most serious allegation has been made against my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris). My hon. Friend has not accepted any job with Capital City Bus or any other company. He has consulted the advisory committee on business appointments and, of course, he will follow any advice that that committee gives.

I want to stand back from the regrettable nature of the question asked by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) and say that the only reason why no Labour ex-Ministers are in a similar position is that there have been no Labour ex-Ministers in recent memory. However, when there were Labour ex-Ministers, what was Lord Marsh doing—[Hon. Members: "He was a Tory."] When he was at the Dispatch Box, he was a Labour Minister. He only became a Tory when he realised that we were right and he was wrong. What have Labour Members to say about Edmund Dell, who became head of Guinness? What do they have to say about Lord Varley, the former Energy Secretary? What about Lord Barnett, who is on the boards of a raft of different companies? It is one rule for them and one rule for everybody else—hypocrisy from start to finish.

Q5. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [948]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jessel: As next year will be the 50th anniversary of the independence of India, and as relations between India and Britain have never been better, do the Government intend to supplement the Queen's visit to India, the visit of our Prime Minister to India as guest of honour on Republic Day and my right hon. Friend's visit to India to launch the Indo-British partnership initiative, with events in this country to mark the jubilee? Will he bear in mind that a large proportion of Indian people who are resident in Britain are natural supporters of the enterprise economy?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has left out of his list the distinguished role that he has played for 25 years as an officer and chairman of the all-party Indo-British group. He will be pleased to know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has invited my noble Friend Lord Cranborne to chair the group to determine how we can progress with such an important anniversary.

Mr. Janner: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Government have rejected the recommendation of the Employment Committee that, in the unemployment statistics, the Government should include details of the 12 categories excluded from those figures? In those circumstances, does he recognise that the true number of unemployed is not just over 2 million, but nearer 4 million, and that the Government's present figures are a complete sham and a fiddle?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I seem to remember the hon. and learned Gentleman producing reports saying that 100,000 jobs would go in the aftermath of the closure of the mines. Unemployment has fallen every month since.

Q6. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [949]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lidington: Has my right hon. Friend seen recent reports that about 40 per cent. of those leaving the jobless register are now setting up as self-employed to provide work not only for themselves but for other people? Does he agree that that augurs well for the present and future competitiveness of the country, enabling us to look forward to levels of unemployment continuing to fall in my constituency and throughout the nation?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is, of course, right. We have the highest proportion of our population at work of any major European country. The forecasts are that our position will continue to improve. I am delighted to recognise the announcement this morning by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment of a significant extension of project work to concentrate particularly on those who have been unemployed for more than two years.

Q7. Mr. Michael: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [950]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Michael: Has the Deputy Prime Minister seen advertisements for articles such as the Vindicator knife and the Rambo short sword? Does he agree that it would be a good idea to make it illegal to advertise or offer for sale such weapons in a manner that appears to condone or encourage violence?

The Deputy Prime Minister: As the whole House knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is in discussions with Labour and Liberal Democrat Members, but those discussions have not led to a simplistic definition that would have enabled the law to be changed. In other words, my right hon. and learned Friend was correct to say that this is a complex matter to which a satisfactory legal outcome has not so far been found. The whole House will be glad of my right hon. and learned Friend's announcement yesterday about strengthening police powers of stop and search, particularly of those people who are likely to be carrying knives.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): May I ask the Leader of the House for details of future business?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 11 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Education Bill.

TUESDAY 12 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 13 NOVEMBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Opposition Day [1st allotted day]. There will be a debate entitled "The BSE Crisis and the Lack of Progress on Lifting the Export Ban on Beef and Beef Products" on an Opposition motion.

THURSDAY 14 NOVEMBER—Debate on Hong Kong on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 15 NOVEMBER—Debate on rail privatisation on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House will also wish to know that, on Wednesday 13 November, there will be a debate on the identification of cattle and labelling of beef and beef products in European Standing Committee A, and a debate on cinema and television films in European Standing Committee B.

In the following week, more provisionally, the business will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 NOVEMBER—Consideration in Committee of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill.

TUESDAY 19 NOVEMBER—Proceedings on the Welsh Development Agency Bill.

WEDNESDAY 20 NOVEMBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Opposition Day [2nd allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, of which the subject will, no doubt, be announced in due course.

THURSDAY 21 NOVEMBER—Until 7 o'clock, there will be a debate on the impact of a windfall tax on the privatised utilities on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 22 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The House will also wish to know that it is proposed that, on Wednesday 20 November, there will be a debate on waste management strategy in European Standing Committee A.

Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

[Wednesday 13 November:

European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 10495/96, Identification of Cattle and Labelling of Beef and Beef Products. Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 36-i (1996-97).

European Standing Committee B—European Community Document: 12357/95, Cinema and Television Films. Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: HC 51-ix (1995-96) and HC 36-ii (1996-97).

Wednesday 20 November:

European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 9651/96, Strategy for Waste Management. Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 36-i (1996-97).]

Mrs. Taylor: I thank the Leader of the House for that information. In view of today's High Court ruling against the Secretary of State for Social Security—which has implications for the benefit entitlement of many thousands of disabled people and many other claimants—will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State to make an urgent statement to the House on that important matter?

Recently, certain Departments have changed the way in which they handle parliamentary questions, with some apparently transferring all key statistical questions to the Treasury. In addition, Ministers' excuses for not answering parliamentary questions are becoming ever more creative, the latest example being an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who was told that the answer to his question

"is not suitable for publication".—[Official Report, 22 July 1996; Vol. 282, c. 121.]

Will the Leader of the House initiate discussions on enforcing clearer and consistent guidelines to Departments on the answering of parliamentary questions?

On a totally different matter, the Leader of the House will have seen the extensive list of senior military figures who have expressed concerns about the plight of Hong Kong Gurkhas who are being relocated to Britain and are being forced to leave their wives and children behind. Will Ministers be making statements about a matter which even senior military figures have decided is an inhumane example of defence incompetence?

At this time of year, our attention turns to those who served our country in time of war. Would not it be appropriate for the Leader of the House to find time for a debate on early-day motion 19?

[That this House, mindful of the increasing needs of the United Kingdom's ageing ex-Service population and the many problems of younger members of the ex-Service community, in direct consequence of 'Options for Change', considers that there is now a pressing need for an Ex-Service Affairs Unit within an existing Ministry and with a designated Minister to be responsible, as the only fundamental and long-term solution for the care and welfare of ex-Service people and their dependants; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government now to respond positively to the Royal British Legion's urgent call for such a unit to be established.]

In such a debate, the House would have an opportunity to discuss how to improve the care and welfare of ex-service people and their dependants. On a related matter, will the Leader of the House tell us what arrangements have been made by the House authorities to ensure that next Monday's two-minute silence of remembrance is observed by those who work within Parliament?

Mr. Newton: On the first question about the ruling in the High Court this morning, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security is studying the judgment, and clearly he has not had it very long. In due course, he will no doubt communicate the conclusions that he draws from it.

On parliamentary questions, the hon. Lady may be aware that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is responding this afternoon to a number of Select Committee reports on those and related matters, including the issue to which she referred. New guidance will be issued and made openly available on drafting answers to parliamentary questions, and she might have a look at it. If she has any further comments, she can make them in the light of that consideration.

As far as the Gurkhas are concerned, the forthcoming withdrawal means that a wide range of issues affecting the Gurkhas' terms of service are being reviewed by the Ministry of Defence. That review is nearly complete, and I am confident that it will produce a fair and equitable package of recommendations that fully address the brigade's concerns.

On early-day motion 19, the Government have made it clear on a number of occasions that we believe that the creation of a special unit responsible for former service people would simply add—

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): We should have a debate.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman did have a debate on the matter.

The Government believe that that would simply add another tier of administration without improving the present arrangements.

On the arrangements for the observance of the two-minute silence on Monday by those working within the House, perhaps that is a matter for you, Madam Speaker, and not for me.

Madam Speaker: I should like to inform the House that my entire staff in the Speaker's Office will observe the two-minute silence, and I hope that others will follow that example.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): As Monday's business on gun control may result in a number of legitimate sporting clubs and other organisations going out of business or finding themselves unable to meet the financial commitments into which they have entered, will my right hon. Friend consider changing the wording of the money resolution, which would seem to rule out not only the possibility of such organisations being paid compensation, but even the possibility of a debate on such a subject?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend might well make that point in the debate on Tuesday. I shall draw it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): On the point raised by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), which is important, will the Leader of the House confirm that a money resolution in the name of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is unamendable by the House? It is essential for him to consider broadening the terms of the resolution—only he has the power to do so. Otherwise, referred to in the resolution, will restrict the debate and consideration of possible compensation for anything other than the guns.

"property the possession of which becomes unlawful",

Mr. Newton: I have already undertaken to draw that matter to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and I shall do so.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May I support the call for a two-minute silence on Monday? It will certainly be observed by my branch of the Royal British Legion.

May we also have a debate on planning procedures, so that I may draw to the attention of the House the great concern of the people of Greenford about an enormous planning application for Greenford green, granted by Ealing council, which will hugely damage the local community by drawing in large amounts of unwanted traffic, as well as destroying jobs in other parts of my constituency?

Mr. Newton: I note what my hon. Friend said about observance of the two-minute silence. I shall certainly be trying to do so. On the latter point, the right course would be for me to bring my hon. Friend's concerns to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): As the Leader of the House will be aware, the Social Security (Claims and Payments Etc.) Amendment Regulations 1996 have reduced or withdrawn the mobility allowance from large numbers of severely disabled people, not least those with severe learning difficulties. Is it not quite wrong that we have had no opportunity to debate those regulations? When shall we be debating them?

Mr. Newton: The right hon. Gentleman has raised such matters several times, as have other hon. Members. I am not in a position to add to what I have said before.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): May I revert to the question about compensation raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins)? The Leader of the House kindly said that he would draw the matter to the attention of the Home Secretary, and for that we are grateful. Could he go a stage further and ensure that a statement clarifying the position is made in the House on Monday, so that we know what that position is?

Mr. Newton: I shall draw that suggestion also to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): The Leader of the House made a welcome suggestion, by saying that we shall be able to debate rail privatisation and highlight the many abuses, such as the award of £2.25 million in success payments to two City firms.

Will the right hon. Gentleman urgently consider what is happening to answers to parliamentary questions? Frankly, they are becoming almost farcical. In recent times, I have received one answer saying that it was too soon to say and another that was factually inaccurate, which I drew to the attention of the agency head, but which still has not been corrected in the Official Report. Will the Leader of the House take that problem seriously? It is not simply a matter of reminding people that they ought to behave sensibly. The answers are misleading Parliament and it is getting beyond a joke.

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Lady knows that that is the sort of matter that I and the Government take seriously, and that is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has been working on it in the way that I mentioned. It is difficult for me to go beyond that in my response, as the hon. Lady has not given me details of the questions that concern her. If she will provide me with such details, I shall see whether I can do something to help.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid–Ulster): Can the Leader of the House tell me when he might find time in the programme to discuss the important issue of the underfunding of the health service in Northern Ireland, which has led to the closure of many wards and has meant that many people in the Province have failed to have the major operations that they urgently need?

Mr. Newton: I do not think that I can undertake to find immediate time for a debate on that matter, but I can draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is due to answer questions here this day week.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): With regard to what Madam Speaker and the Leader of the House said about the two-minute silence on Monday, would it be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to have words with the House authorities about the annunciator system, to ensure that people know when it is 11 am, so that tours and other activities could come to a standstill, to enable people to pay appropriate respect at that time?

Mr. Newton: As I have already drawn the matter to the attention of the ultimate House authority, to whom I genuflect once again, I am sure that you will consider that suggestion, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an urgent early debate to allow the attention of the House to be drawn to the fact that there are deteriorating road conditions on the A2 trunk road, as it runs through my constituency in north-west Kent, and to enable us to endorse the high-profile campaign being run by the Kentish Times group of newspapers demanding that safety features be incorporated on the road as soon as possible, to minimise accidents and fatalities?

Mr. Newton: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will study my hon. Friend's remarks with great care.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to the questions raised by my hon. Friends about the Government answering questions, is the Leader of the House aware of the alarming events of the past few days, when my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) asked for statistics on lottery pay-outs, constituency by constituency? He was refused that information, so he decided to find it out for himself. The cost was not disproportionate: he estimates that it cost £15. It showed that there was a great lottery fiddle, inasmuch as Derbyshire authorities were not getting a fair crack of the whip.

I drew that to the attention of the House at the beginning of the year, but nothing has been done—in fact, the situation has got worse. It is high time that different regions and different constituencies had a fair crack of the whip in the pay-outs.

Mr. Newton: There were two points there—one rather better than the other. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage recognises that the request for information could have been met within the £450 limit, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State is writing to the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) about that today; so the first point was fair. For the rest, frankly, the hon. Gentleman is on rather less safe ground. The plain fact is that lottery awards are made by people independent of Ministers; they are invited to take into account various criteria for determining the pattern of awards, and those criteria, as I understand it, are never geographical but based on quality of project.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): Can my right hon. Friend ensure that a Minister of the Crown makes a statement to the House after the European Court gives its judgment on the United Kingdom's appeal against the working time directive next Tuesday? The judgment will have the most profound implications for working practices, for employment law, for competitiveness and for what should be Britain's internal social affairs. Can we have a guarantee that we shall be able to question a Minister of Her Majesty's Government about it?

Mr. Newton: There are two points. First, I share my hon. Friend's view of the importance of the matter, and he will be well aware of the views expressed by the United Kingdom Government. Secondly, I shall bear in mind his request for a statement.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): May I remind the Leader of the House that I raised with him last Thursday the introduction of regulations on the concessionary television licence scheme? I did so after I had extended the normal courtesy of ringing the Department of National Heritage to say that I intended to raise the matter. A week has gone by, and I have heard nothing from the Department. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman is now in a position to say whether the regulations will be introduced before Christmas.

Mr. Newton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in warning me that he intended to raise the matter again. That has enabled me to be in a better position than I was last week, and I can inform him that I understand that the Department of National Heritage intends to lay regulations before the end of the year and is about to write to him about the matter. It may be of interest to the House to know that the new regulations will not only deal with sheltered housing, which is the hon. Gentleman's focus, but clarify the treatment of caravans.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): My right hon. Friend will recall that last week I asked for an urgent debate on the recent Social Security Committee report on unfunded pensions in Europe. I should again like to call for such a debate, because in Hansard of 6 November there is a question headed "Public Pension Liabilities" from my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Mr. Banks). My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has sought to answer some of the points. We seem to be engaged in a debate, because I notice that the Chairman of the Social Security Committee has given notice of a question calling for a response to the report. I urge my right hon. Friend to think carefully about that and urge his right hon. and hon Friends to hold a debate rather than conducting so important a discussion across the pages of Hansard.

Mr. Newton: I think that I have demonstrated over the years that I take account of requests for debates, but I am not immediately able to respond this afternoon. I pointed out last week that we are not many weeks away from a substantial debate over several days on the Budget, when such matters would be in order.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May I draw the Leader of the House's attention to early-day motion 105?

[That this House notes the continued suffering of the people of the Sudan and the Reverend Dr Dick Rogers' 40 day bread and water sympathy vigil outside the Foreign Office; encourages Her Majesty's Government to become actively committed to the pursuit of a fair settlement of the war in Sudan as part of a multi-national effort to that end, with consideration given to the appointment of a special envoy; and calls on both sides of the conflict to enter into negotiations that embrace all parties in the country, with a view to the acceptance of the subsequent settlement by the said parties.]

The motion calls for peacekeeping in Sudan and draws attention to the 40-day vigil in Whitehall by the Rev. Dr. Dick Rogers. I urge Foreign and Commonwealth Office Ministers to keep a closer watch on what is happening in the Sudan and to take a lead in bringing people together towards peace.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman can be assured that the Government share his concern for the people of Sudan as expressed in the motion. He may know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office explained in answer to questions on 30 October that we do not believe that a British initiative would be fruitful at the moment.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on firework safety, so that the House can assist my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs in the review of firework regulations to which he referred yesterday? I ask that because of the plea in my local paper, the Bromley and Hayes News Shopper, by the brother of Steve Tinker, the man who was tragically killed last Saturday in a firework accident.

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot promise a debate, although my hon. Friend might like to consider the Wednesday morning possibilities. I assure him that my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs is well aware of the widely expressed concerns about the availability of certain sorts of firework and is reviewing firework controls and the availability of bangers.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): I refer the Leader of the House to early-day motion 151, the contents of which have already been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

[That this House notes that in response to a parliamentary question for written answer by the honourable Member for North East Derbyshire, the Department of National Heritage has supplied a computer disc to the Library which details, by parliamentary constituency, each National Lottery award made up to 30th September 1996; further notes that a list compiled by the Library from this disc shows the total amounts awarded in each United Kingdom parliamentary constituency listed in descending order with the top award of £201,480,455 and in 651st place the bottom award of only £12,000; is dismayed that there is such a massive maldistribution of awards with the bulk of awards being skewed towards a small group of constituencies and to certain parts of the United Kingdom, as illustrated by the fact that the three constituencies in north eastern Derbyshire all fall within the bottom 10 per cent. of places on the list with North East Derbyshire placed 587th, Bolsover 616th and Chesterfield 628th; further calls upon the Government to take immediate action to ensure that the National Lottery is obliged to correct this disgraceful state of affairs and to operate formulas based on equity and need, subject to regional, county and district democratic input; and regrets that the National Heritage Minister claimed it would be of disproportionate cost—defined as £450—to rank the awards per constituency when this operation only cost the Library £15.]

The Library now has a list detailing how much lottery money each constituency had received by 30 September. The sums range from £201 million at the top to £12,000 at the bottom. That is a massive maldistribution, whatever considerations are given to the needs of particular areas. Should we not therefore have a full debate about the national lottery and the way in which funds are distributed, so that they can be better related to the people who purchase lottery tickets and so that some areas are not almost excluded by the current provisions?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman might like to consider trying to raise that matter on a Wednesday. I cannot add to what I said before. The lottery money is distributed by independent bodies according to the merits of the proposals that are made and I think that that is right.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): May I say respectfully to my right hon. Friend that he showed some irritation in answering the questions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) on the compensation for those who will suffer through the intended legislation on firearms? Does he accept that that legislation is not worthy of a Conservative Government, and that it will affect thousands of innocent people, cause the loss of jobs and put businesses out of business? The money resolution as drafted will not cover that problem. Will he ensure that it is changed before we come to Tuesday's debate, so that the people involved are fully compensated for a loss of business incurred through no fault of their own?

Mr. Newton: I must say that I do not think that I betrayed the slightest sign of irritation when responding to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) and others. I simply said—as calmly and straightforwardly as I could, given that it is clearly not a matter that I can decide at the Dispatch Box—that I would draw it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I am bound to say, however, that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) has irritated me somewhat.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I hope that I do not irritate the Leader of the House. Will the House, or any of its Committees, be considering the annual report of the prisons ombudsman? He said that the Prison Service withheld vital files and lied in one case, but instead of taking appropriate action, the Home Secretary reduced the prisons ombudsman's powers, so that he can now obtain only the files that the Prison Service wants to give him—indeed, he cannot check on the Home Secretary's and other Ministers' roles, either. Surely, that is not the right way to proceed, and the House should consider the ombudsman's report.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will himself consider the report very carefully.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Will my right hon. Friend find time, as soon as possible, for the House to discuss the impact of the 48-hour directive and the minimum wage on employment and the economy of this country? The 48-hour directive is totally impracticable and a lunatic suggestion to be imposed on this country. On the minimum wage, we are discussing not only a level of pay below which people would not drop, but the massive impact of differentials throughout the economy. Both are job-destroying measures and both are supported by the two Opposition parties, and that will not go unnoticed.

Mr. Newton: I have already indicated in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) that the Government are aware of those concerns. I cannot add to my earlier answer, but I take note of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans).

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When can we debate a matter of great importance that was recently the subject of a lead story in "GP News", in which it was revealed that one in four of all elderly patients who were admitted to a hospital in Gloucester were suffering from the misuse of medicinal drugs? As 40 per cent. of all hospital admissions are elderly patients, does that not show that there is an extraordinary over-prescription of medicinal drugs? Most of those people were taking up to six different drugs for non-life-threatening conditions. If deaths from medicinal drugs continue at the present rate, within four years more people will die from misuse of medicines than die from all road traffic accidents. Is that not a matter of prime concern to the House?

Mr. Newton: The Government have sought to tackle issues of over-prescribing for a long time—certainly going back to my time as Minister for Health. Ministers continue to take such matters very seriously and I shall bring the hon. Gentleman's concerns to their attention.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Can my right hon. Friend find time for the House to debate, or draw to the attention of the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for National Heritage, my early-day motion 154, which was published today?

[That this House continues to honour, respect and cherish the name of Mahatma Ghandi; takes note that in a will made in 1940 the Mahatma left all his property and the copyright to all his writings, published or unpublished, to the Navajivan Trust, which he had set up in 1929, with absolute rights vested in the Trust, the will being duly probated after his assassination in 1948; that Mr. Kalyanam, an employee in 1948 in the office of the Mahatma, offered some of his papers for sale by Sotheby's who commendably refused to put them on sale; that the papers are now advertised for sale by auction by Phillips on 14th November, which would cause a sense of outrage in India; and calls upon Phillips forthwith to withdraw these papers from sale and to take steps to ensure the safe return of these objects as soon as may be to their rightful owners, the Navajivan Trust in India.]

Action should be taken to ensure that Mahatma Ghandi's own papers, which appear to have been purloined by a former employee of the Mahatma's, either before his assassination in 1948 or shortly thereafter, and which have been placed on sale to be auctioned by Phillips in London one week from today, on 14 November, can be safely recovered and returned to their rightful owners in India.

Mr. Newton: I should say that, as far as I know, that issue has not been raised with us by the Indian Government, either in London or, to our knowledge, in Delhi. However, I am told that the Indian Government have supported attempts to have the papers withdrawn from auction and that the sale to which my hon. Friend referred may not now take place.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): Has the Leader of the House seen the feature in tonight's Evening Standard about poverty in London, which is based on the report produced by the London Research Centre, "The Capital Divided"? The report uses only official Government statistics and, as the Evening Standard says, shows that poverty in London is worse than anywhere else in Britain and spreading like a cancer. Is that not an indictment of Government policies as applied to the capital city over the past 17 years? Could we please have a debate on London? There is a Minister responsible for London, and it is about time we held him accountable for what is going on in this city.

Mr. Newton: I have not seen the feature article to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I shall ensure that I look at it, and I am sure that colleagues will do so. I shall keep in mind the idea of a debate on London; I hope that, in return, the hon. Gentleman will keep in mind the huge amount that the Government have done—not least through the London Docklands development corporation and the huge infrastructure projects that are going on in London—to regenerate the city and provide a firmer basis for employment.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): With the peace process hanging by a thread, will the Leader of the House persuade the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House next week about two matters—first, about how quickly Sinn Fein would be allowed to enter all-party talks should there be a further cessation of violence by the IRA, and secondly, about confidence-building measures, especially regarding the treatment of prisoners from both communities? Does the Leader of the House agree that it is imperative that that statement is made to the House rather than to any other forum elsewhere?

Mr. Newton: Of course I shall bring the hon. Gentleman's request to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I am bound to say, however, that it seems to me that our position on the talks and a settlement is clear and on the record.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Following the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), may I ask that a statement be made to the House about the report by Dr. Brian Caddy on the use of questionable forensic evidence in terrorist cases? May I ask that, in such a statement, there be specific reference to the interviews, which I understand have now been concluded, by Home Office officials with Padraig MacFhloinn in prison? He has accepted responsibility for the Warrington bombings and made a formal statement about the non-involvement of my constituent, John Kinsella.

If, in the absence of any forensic evidence and any other substantive evidence, those interviews confirm statements that John Kinsella knew nothing about the contents of the holdall that he was left, will his sentence and conviction be reviewed immediately?

Mr. Newton: I understand and respect the hon. Gentleman's reasons for raising what is obviously an important constituency case to him. He will understand that I am not in a position to comment from the Dispatch Box this afternoon on the detail, but I shall ensure that the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is drawn to what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): May I take the Lord President back to the request of the shadow Leader of the House for a debate on ex-service men and women's affairs? On 1 July 1994, I instituted a private Member's motion and debate, which was approved unanimously by the House of Commons, calling for a Minister responsible for ex-service people's affairs. Since then, there have been early-day motions signed by 279 Members from all parties in the House of Commons, asking the Government to look at that possibility and to think about it again.

This is not a party matter; hon. Members from all parts of the House want the Government to reconsider it. There are 1.5 million members of the Royal British Legion, and many hundreds of thousands more in the Royal Air Forces Association and the Royal Naval Association, who are bewildered and dismayed by the Prime Minister's belief that, uniquely, the United Kingdom does not need a Minister responsible for veterans, whereas most countries, including our former adversaries, the United States and Commonwealth countries, have one.

Mr. Newton: Of course I accept that that is not a marked party matter. I have not treated it as such, and nor has anyone else, to my knowledge, but it is a matter of judgment to decide the best way of providing the help and support that we all wish to give to our ex-service men. On that front, I cannot add to what I said earlier.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): When my right hon. Friend reads the Evening Standard report on poverty, will he note the extraordinary correlation that the worst examples appear to occur, time and again, in boroughs that have been controlled and run by the Labour party? Is that not a reflection on Labour's approach to policies to help business and encourage employment, and is it not a further example of Labour's record in government in the 1990s?

Mr. Newton: Had I wished to be more aggressive than is my wont with the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), I might have added to what I said earlier about the London Docklands development corporation by saying that, until we took that out of the hands of the Labour local authorities in the area, nothing happened; had we not done so, docklands would still be derelict.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Was not the question asked by the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) a gross misrepresentation of the facts? He is playing with statistics, and he knows it. Was the Leader of the House in the Chamber yesterday when I expressed my concerns about the unemployment statistics that have been published in relation to Workington constituency? I do not believe those figures. I know that they are not true; they are false figures. I asked yesterday for a house-to-house survey to be carried out in my constituency, so that the real figures can be produced.

May we have a statement at the Dispatch Box about how the figures are being compiled? If not, may we have a debate in which hon. Members on both sides of the House can press Ministers on the compilation of unemployment statistics?

Mr. Newton: I regret that I was not in the House yesterday when the hon. Gentleman asked his question, and it had not been drawn to my attention. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is due to answer questions on Wednesday next week.

4.5 pm

Madam Speaker: We now come to motion No. 1. I call Mr. Secretary Lang—I am so sorry, Mr. Ian Taylor, whom I know very well. He is a most important Minister.

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): I beg to move,

That the draft Copyright and Related Rights Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 11th July, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.

Madam Speaker, you quite raised my pulse rate with that instant promotion.

The regulations implement two European Community copyright directives on satellite and cable broadcasting, directive 93/83, and on rental, lending and other rights related to copyright, directive 92/100, and also aspects of directive 93/98.

The directives harmonise rights in areas such as the rental and lending of copyright works, other uses of works, such as broadcasting of sound recordings and cross-frontier satellite broadcasting and cable retransmission. Most of those rights already exist in the United Kingdom, and the directives in many cases raise the standards of protection elsewhere in the European Union to those that exist here. So, although the directives require changes to UK law, they will be of substantial benefit to important UK industries, such as the record industry, by establishing similar and improved rights throughout the European Union.

Many, often complex, changes are nevertheless needed to bring UK law fully into line with the directives. The main changes include, first, the extension of rental and lending rights to all copyright works, whereas at present they apply only to books, computer programmes, films and sound recordings. Secondly, they give authors and performers rental and lending rights in films and sound recordings, which at present only producers have. Thirdly, they give performers rights in relation to broadcasting and public performance of sound recordings.

Extensive consultation with all interested parties—about 200 representative bodies—has been undertaken, and we have tried to find a balance that is fair to them all, which means, inevitably, that not everyone is completely satisfied.

That consultation and the complexity of the provisions has, regrettably, led to delays in implementation of the directives, which is now overdue. Implementation of the rental directive should have taken place by 1 July 1994 and that of the cable and satellite directive by 1 January 1995. We are not alone in the EU in being late. I apologise to the House, but the delay has been due to the complexity of the matter.

As there are many issues on which I could now address the House, which would take considerable time, and as I would be interested to hear which of the many aspects interest Members, I will undertake to respond to all the points raised, if I catch your eye, Madam Speaker, at the end of the debate.

4.8 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I thank the Minister for his brief—I am tempted to say terse—outline of a statutory instrument, which, as I understood it, implemented three directives: the rental directive, the cable and satellite directive, and residual parts of the duration directive which were not dealt with when that directive was substantially passed into British law.

I make it clear at the outset that the Opposition do not intend to vote against the regulations. However, it is equally clear that there is profound dissatisfaction with the way in which they have been drafted. That is obvious from the various representations that I have received. It is clear that, in dealing with copyright, the Government have been uniquely successful in once again bringing together different organisations that historically have very different perspectives but are consistently concerned about the way in which the proposals affect both individuals and the industries in which they work.

My first general question to the Minister is whether it is appropriate to deal with three different directives in a single, and inevitably complex, statutory instrument. Why could we not have dealt with the directives separately and had three separate statutory instruments dealing with each aspect at the European level? Alternatively, given the delay that we have faced, why not deal with all outstanding copyright matters in a comprehensive piece of primary legislation?

I am sure that the Minister is aware that the main criticism levelled by the various organisations affected is that they do not have the opportunity to amend the proposals. There are detailed points of criticism that cannot be dealt with in this kind of debate. Given the lack of any substantive legislation from the Department of Trade and Industry, I am sure that the Minister would welcome the opportunity to do something substantial as he whiles away his time before the general election.

My second general concern is with timing. The Minister has already made the point that the legislation is woefully overdue. The statutory instrument was laid on 19 July this year and is therefore more than two years late, as the directives' implementation date was 1 July 1994. What is the reason for the delay? I do not make that point simply to dwell upon the lack of timeliness or competence on the part of the Minister's Department, but it is relevant to the general question of whether the legislation is needed today.

We are debating directives that were agreed in 1992. Therefore, given my understanding of the processes of the European institutions, it seems reasonable to suggest that the directives were drafted in the mid-1980s—probably based on a perceived need in the early 1980s. Given the pace of technological change, the real question for the Minister is whether we should be addressing perceived needs in the early 1990s and those of the next century rather than conducting an historical debate about proposals that were drafted in an earlier age.

As the Minister said, the principal purpose of the rental directive is to provide new rights for creators and performers to earn additional revenue from rentals and lending. My third query is whether the statutory instrument succeeds in translating that aim properly into law. In the explanatory recitals, the directive states:

"Whereas the creative and artistic work of authors and performers necessitates an adequate income as a basis for further creative and artistic work . . . Whereas the equitable remuneration must take account of the importance of the contribution of the authors and performers concerned to the phonogram or film".

The directive's specific purpose is to ensure that the rights of performers are properly recognised in law.

Performers are clearly concerned that, far from generating new income for them, the statutory instrument is likely to place an inappropriate financial burden on the kinds of small businesses operated by many creative individuals who should benefit from the rental directive. There is concern about the expenditure likely to be incurred by authors and performers having to refer constantly to the Copyright Tribunal and to the courts as a result of this statutory instrument.

There is particular anxiety about the requirement for authors and performers to give notice before 1 January 1997—which is not far away—of any intention to exercise their right to remuneration where rental arises from agreements concluded before July 1994. That places an unnecessary burden upon them in terms of time and cost. The Minister might explain how notification will be given. Will it cover all the agreements before July 1994 or only those made between July 1992, when the rental directive was adopted, and July 1994?

Similar anxieties are expressed on behalf of performers about the meaning of equitable remuneration. How is that to be calculated? Would it not be appropriate for authors and performers to have the right to information, to allow them to calculate the basis for that which is meant by equitable remuneration?

The fairness of such payments from users, and broadcasters especially, to performers is generally speaking adjudged by statutory tribunals or courts, which examine the value of the right to the users, the extent and profitability of the use and the economic circumstances and prospects of the user. The formula in the statutory instrument does allow performers, individually or collectively, to take the user to the Copyright Tribunal on these questions, but only the copyright owner of the record.

A clear criticism of the proposals is that United Kingdom performers will be the only performers in the European economic area, not just the European Union, in such a disadvantaged position. Is that consistent with the intention that is behind the rental directive to provide a consistent approach across both the European Union and the European economic area?

It seems clear that article 182 is not properly translated into British law by regulation 20. The statutory instrument provides for the performer to exercise his or her rights to equitable remuneration solely against the record company and not against the user. Now that I have the Minister's full attention, I should be grateful if he takes up that matter. The statutory instrument fails to ensure that it is the user who should pay the equitable remuneration for the use of a record in any communication to the public. That is different from the arrangement in any other European member state.

A practical problem for performers is obtaining appropriate remuneration due to them in other countries. They clearly have a legal right under the directive, but they believe that it will be difficult and expensive to enforce. I would be grateful if the Minister could inform us of any steps that he might be prepared to take to assist United Kingdom-based performers to secure the rights to which they are entitled, given that it is his legislation that is responsible for causing the difficulty that I have outlined.

All other European countries allow the collective administration of performers' rights as against users' collective organisations. In the UK, only record companies and their organisations will be involved. That means that performers will be placed in an inferior position compared with their continental counterparts. It means also that the United Kingdom is out of step with every other system in the European Union. As it is United Kingdom music that is widely played and listened to throughout Europe, it is unfortunate that we are not giving our performers and creators of music in the UK the same rights as are available to performers from other countries.

It is clear that the identification of users and their uses of records is relatively straightforward. Performers, however, will face considerable difficulty in identifying the owners of the copyright in all the records used and in enforcing their rights against dormant or insolvent owners.

A further problem with the translation of article 182 concerns section 72 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988. Article 182 clearly requires payment of equitable remuneration by the user if a record is used in broadcasting or for any other communication to the public. That is both direct and indirect broadcasting. Section 72 provides that when a broadcast is shown or played in public to an audience that has not paid an admission fee, there is no infringement of copyright in any sound recording which is included in the broadcast. That limitation does not apply to the rights of authors, and it is almost unprecedented in other European countries.

I should be grateful if the Minister would explain why it is possible to introduce the statutory instrument without dealing with section 72 of the 1988 Act, because it is clear that the directive deals with both direct and indirect broadcasting. Indeed, if section 72 were to continue, there would be a continuing cost to performers. To repeat the point, if the purpose of the statutory instrument and the directive on which it is based is to provide greater revenue for performers, it seems unfortunate that that aspect has not been dealt with.

Indeed, if we pursue the statutory instrument without some later amendment, the United Kingdom will be out of step with all other European countries. Only the United Kingdom, Ireland and Greece have a section 72 exemption or its equivalent. It is significant—I hope the Minister will agree—that Denmark used to have a similar exemption but repealed it on the basis that it was necessary to implement the rental directive properly and to meet its Community obligations. There will be important economic consequences—estimated to be in the order of £80 million loss of income to performers and rights holders—as a result of failing to repeal section 72.

There is a further area in which performers' and authors' rights are not protected in the statutory instrument in the way in which the rental directive at least contemplated. Article 5(6) of the rental directive includes an optional provision for member states to provide for a presumption of transfer of authors' rental rights to the film producer. In regulation 12 of the statutory instrument, the Government have chosen to implement this option. I should be grateful if the Minister would explain why it was not possible to leave the assignment of the copyright to be freely negotiated between the two sides. Why is it necessary to rely on the presumption in the statutory instrument? How can that be reconciled with the requirement of the 1988 Act, which says that copyright assignments must be in writing?

[Mr. Geoffrey Hoon]

Regulation 14 establishes the right to equitable remuneration payable by a person to whom the right is transferred or any successor in title. One of the problems for those engaged in the film business is that many film companies are formed simply for the purpose of producing a particular film, after which they have no continuing existence. Moreover, not all of them are successful, and clearly there are difficulties in enforcing rights against bankrupt organisations. Would it not be more sensible—this is the practical suggestion made by those affected—to allow that right to be exercisable against all those who benefit commercially from the rental process, including the rental outlets?

I have a final technical question concerned with satellite broadcasts, in particular the way in which the statutory instrument affects CNN International and other satellite channels that use similar means of distributing their programmes. CNN International is edited in Atlanta. It is then transmitted to British Telecom in the United Kingdom, which simultaneously uplinks the signal to the Astra satellite for pan-European broadcast. Paragraph 6 of the statutory instrument deals with satellite broadcasts made from non-European economic area states that do not provide a specified level of protection.

The concern is that, since the United States would not provide the specified level of protection, this clause would operate in relation to CNN International's broadcasts. That would mean, according to the rules, that BT, which provides CNN International's uplink facility, would be defined as "the person making the CNNI broadcast", pursuant to the proposed section 6(A)2(b) of the statutory instrument. Because of that definition and the rather artificial way in which it is constructed, the anxiety is that the statutory instrument could be interpreted as defining BT not only as the maker of the broadcast for infringement purposes but as the owner of the copyright in the broadcast. That is clearly not the directive's intention, but I, and I am sure CNN, would be grateful if the Minister would clarify that.

I have made a series of technical observations about the statutory instrument's drafting, but it is necessary, in conclusion, to make some more general observations about the way in which the Government have approached the important area of copyright.

The United Kingdom clearly has an opportunity here to make a significant contribution to Europewide and worldwide technological initiatives aimed at establishing secure electronic trading and providing protection for intellectual property of all kinds. As we move into a digital world, copyright protection will be crucial to allowing our industries, based on the development of intellectual property rights, to flourish and to compete around the world.

It is unfortunate that, in drafting the statutory instrument based on the directives, the United Kingdom has not been able to provide an approach consistent with that of our European partners, and we could not blame them if they looked elsewhere when standards were being decided. It will be unfortunate if we have domestic legislation which appears to have been drafted in such a way as to circumvent certainly the spirit of the directives when later we want the co-operation of our European partners in drafting legislation that is to the benefit and protection of performers and creators based in the United Kingdom.

As I have said, it is unfortunate that we are debating matters now which could have been dealt with many years earlier, when the pace of technological change has brought up many different issues. The key issue that we have not yet faced is digital distribution. That should be the underlying issue. Is the Minister confident that the existing copyright legislation will be sufficient to deal with the rather more complicated intellectual property that will arise as a result of the digital distribution of a wide variety of intellectual content?

Those matters will be discussed shortly at a conference in Geneva as part of the World Intellectual Property Organisation's debate. It is trying to establish standards now which will affect the way in which digital distribution develops. It is clear that the content providers, those who are responsible for creation and performing, will not be willing to see their talent exploited unless they are properly protected by the legislation that needs to be brought forward.

I hope that the Minister will tell the House that the Government are actively pursuing the matter, are concerned to see a proper protection for intellectual rights, and are not simply belatedly enforcing legislation agreed at the European level which is looking increasingly out of date.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) made two suggestions to the Minister about potential ways forward. One was to deal separately with the different parts of the statutory instrument stemming from three different directives, and the other was that the Government should bring forward comprehensive primary legislation on the matter. I shall seek to explain why my preference is strongly towards my hon. Friend's second proposal.

During the passage of the Broadcasting Bill in the previous parliamentary Session, I suggested to the Minister, and I think that he agreed with me, that our parliamentary process has a fundamental weakness when it comes to dealing with matters such as this where the technology is moving so incredibly quickly. The context of that remark in relation to intellectual property is obvious. Given the development of digital signals, it is easy to envisage ways in which people will be able to bypass attempts to protect copyright, as readily available technologies are open to misuse.

The Minister will be pleased to hear that in a speech at the opening session of Telework 96 in Vienna on Monday I extended to all Parliaments my criticism of the Government's attempts to deal with this problem. All owners of intellectual property face a major problem in the digital age.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield cited an extremely good example of the problems we face when he referred to the CNN equation. The same applies to all existing broadcasters. One can also envisage the existence of a rogue broadcaster—the next century's version of Radio Caroline. It would be easy to bypass any attempt to regulate copyright on a world basis simply by setting up just offshore and buying a piece of satellite space.

This is a serious issue, and it has enormous implications for musicians, authors and writers of software, and for every other signal that can conceivably be transmitted in a digital form. The important discussions that are taking place in Geneva through WIPO—an appalling acronym—should be uppermost in our minds.

Will the Minister tell us what contribution the Government are making to those important discussions? How will we persuade not only the countries that try to restrict incoming signals, but those that take no notice of existing copyright regulations on hard copy to participate in a regulatory regime that will work? As is often the case, we will end up having a local debate on whether one nation or another in the European Union has failed to address its responsibilities. We will not deal with the underlying problem, which is of enormous proportions: the ability of a nation or a company to bypass any attempts to regulate.

Other matters that are currently subject to directive considerations overlap into this area—some slightly and some significantly. Data protection must be carefully considered. How do we ensure that the two-way trade between ownership and protection of information is properly balanced? In another capacity, I sent a strongly worded recommendation to Members of the European Parliament on the draft directive on telecommunications data protection urging them to slow down or, preferably, to stop that directive. It strikes me as a very uncompetitive approach, which, although it may be to the advantage of Deutsche Telekom, certainly will not benefit companies in this country.

All those aspects are linked. The missing part of the equation is a strategic overview from the Government. I do not claim that the issue is simple, and the Minister will understand that I am not trying to score a cheap political point; but we have a real problem. Although we pick away on a piecemeal basis at the various issues—all of which stem from the power that will rest with the potential abuser of digital information, and all of which are closely linked—there seems to be no over-arching Government strategy.

Nor is there such a strategy from the European Union, whence the directives came. It would be helpful if the Minister could explain in detail what representations have been made in respect of procedures currently taking place in the European Union—and, indeed, in the Geneva talks, which are of the utmost importance.

If we fail to address those important matters, we shall do a massive disservice to a very large revenue earner in this country. It is not simply finding a bureaucratic solution to satisfy the whims of the drafters in Brussels that should concern us; we should be worrying about how properly to protect the important people to whom we owe so much—the authors of music, software and all sorts of technical journals whose copyright will be at risk if we do not solve the overall problem.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give some comfort to those of us who are just a little worried about the fact that we are rushing headlong, at an unstoppable pace, into a new era of communication with one missing element: a Government strategy that will make it work.

4.37 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) has already mentioned this point, but I should like the Minister to comment. It relates to matters arising from a letter that I received from Dennis Scard, general secretary of the Musicians Union. I know that the Minister has corresponded with the union, and, indeed, with hon. Members who written to his Department following representations received from it.

The union makes it clear that

"some changes have been made in response to our representations", and it is obliged to the Minister for that. It regards those changes, however, less as concessions than

"as an indication that the earlier drafts did not meet the objectives of the Directive or the realities of the situation."

The general secretary expresses his union's disappointment that that is still the case

"in the key issue of who the performers' right is against and the equality of that right compared to the record producer."

The letter continues:

"The Minister concedes that the term 'equitable remuneration' means a fair payment in relation to the use of the record. The fairness of such payments from users—(e.g. broadcasters) to rights owners (e.g. performers) is judged between the parties in every country, including the UK, by statutory tribunals or courts which examine the value of the right to the user, the extent of profitability of the use, and the economic circumstances and prospects of the user."

The union makes it clear:

"The formula adopted in the Statutory Instrument does not, however, allow the performers, individually or collectively, to take the user to the Copyright Tribunal on these matters, but only the copyright owner in the record. UK performers will be the only performers in the EEA in this disadvantaged position."

Is that the Minister's reading of the position? If so, and if performers in the UK will be treated differently from any other performers in the European Economic Area, will the Minister kindly reconsider the matter and find out what he can do about it? Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

4.40 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor: This has been a constructive debate about some complex issues and about the future of the digital age. I shall try to touch on the questions and the issues of the future.

The directives are brought together in the statutory instrument because they closely interrelate. They were not tabled by the European Union at the same time, but, by the time we got around to it, they affected the same Act—the Copyright, Design and Patents Act 1988. Frankly, it was just more efficient to do it this way. We should also bear it in mind that we consulted with the same dramatis personae on each of the directives. It was easier to consult on the directives at the same time than to do so consecutively, and the directives are overdue, largely because we have had such a complex and lengthy consultation. These are difficult matters to draft into UK law, as has been recognised by the hon. Members for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) and for Newham, North–West (Mr. Banks).

I know that the Musicians Union was worried about whether we had fully implemented the directives. There is a difference of judgment on what the directives obliged us to do and who we should target in relation to the use of exercisable rights. Only record producers in the UK have had rights enabling them to obtain royalties from users. We do not consider it desirable to disturb the traditional relationship between producers and end users.

[Mr. Ian Taylor]

Granting performers rights would have disturbed the traditional pattern and would have meant, in effect, restructuring producers' rights. We felt that not disturbing that traditional relationship was the best way forward, and that has been reflected in our interpretation of the directives.

The Musicians Union also raised with us the issue of the percentage share. Performers are granted a 50 per cent. share, usually in respect of traditional forms of broadcasting and performance. The rights that are being granted in the UK will apply also to newer forms of exploitation that are emerging, but that have yet to become established in practice. In those changing circumstances, we are reluctant to prescribe a share.

This deals with another point that has been mentioned in all three speeches. We must try to anticipate changes in the market. It is clear that 50 per cent. would not necessarily be appropriate in relation to all the future technological means of delivery. For traditional uses of recordings, however, we understand that producers have already said that they are willing to share royalties on a 50:50 basis. Clearly, therefore, other means of distribution would be subject to negotiation.

Further questions were asked about the difficulty in obtaining payments from other European Union states unless rights in Britain are similar to those elsewhere. Again, the directive does not require any particular form of implementation, and we have had to make judgments as to what is most appropriate in Britain. In many cases, the rights that are referred to elsewhere in the EU again relate to rights for traditional broadcasting matters, not some of the newer ways in which we are likely to be engaged. There could be a collective negotiation of reciprocal arrangements, with performers collecting remuneration in other EU countries. The UK Government are prepared to take up any problems in obtaining remuneration with other EU Governments, as we have done when necessary.

There was a question about the exception to public performance rights in relation to sound recordings in section 72 of the 1988 Act and why that measure was not repealed, as some believe the directive seems to require. The directive does not expressly require us to repeal it. We consider it undesirable in any event to remove such a specific exception, approved by Parliament during the passage of the 1988 Act, without an equally express exclusion provision under the directive or other measure.

Our legal advice is that the exception in section 72, which is in respect of sound recordings contained in broadcasts seen or heard by non-paying audiences, is within the limitation to record producers' and performers' rights permitted by the directive. I am aware that record producers are concerned about the impact of section 72 on their economic interests, now that broadcasts are replacing the direct playing of sound recordings in certain retail outlets, but we do not consider that repeal of section 72 is an appropriate way in which to deal with any difficulties, particularly as it would also impact on other very different situations. In any event, the Copyright Tribunal is likely to deal with what is the appropriate royalty level for use of sound recordings in broadcast services specifically tailored to retail outlets.

Mr. Hoon: The Minister has mentioned the interests of record producers, but are not performers, record producers and, most significantly, record companies all united in asking the Government to reconsider section 72 because of those groups' clear concern about the impact on their income?

Mr. Taylor: There was pressure on us, but pressures would arise in following other courses. The retail trade, for example, is developing various ways of using music in their outlets. Repeal would be an extremely restrictive practice and, in the long term, it would not necessarily be in the interests of any of the parties concerned, which is why we have continued the exception in section 72, which was debated in the Standing Committee on the Copyright, Design and Patents Bill.

Mr. Hoon: Surely, if the retail trade or other organisation—restaurants, cafes, public houses, and so on—chooses to use music, particularly broadcast music, it should pay an appropriate fee for the use of that music. It paysa fee if it uses specialised music services. Why is there a distinction between the use of specialised services and the use of broadcast music?

Mr. Taylor: We should bear it in mind that, often, such organisations do pay a fee—to the broadcaster. We are not removing the exception in relation to the further reproduction of that music in any retail outlet. We consider that to be a sensible way forward, and therefore we have not made the changes that the hon. Gentleman has requested. It was a fine balance, but, having heard all the arguments, I decided that that was the right way forward. The Copyright Tribunal is considering the matter.

The hon. Gentleman talked about equitable remuneration for rental and how it is defined. The directive did not define "equitable", as what is fair in one set of circumstances may not be so in another. Nor, therefore, can the regulations set that out, but they do provide that remuneration is not to be considered inequitable simply because it is paid in a single sum or at the time an author or performer transfers his exclusive rental right to a producer—the directive says that the remuneration may be paid in either of those ways. Again, the matter will need to be tested by the Copyright Tribunal, were there to be a dispute.

Mr. Hoon: I accept that the directive does not, in any event, define equitable remuneration, but I made the point to inquire of the Minister whether he thought it appropriate that performers in particular should have the means to ascertain the information that would allow them to find out whether they were receiving equitable remuneration—information about the number of times that the music in question was used, the circumstances of the user, the number of times and the form in which the music was reproduced, and so on. That would allow them to build the sort of picture of remuneration that is obviously available to users.

Mr. Taylor: Obtaining the proper information is a matter for the traditional negotiations with producers. As we move forward, there will be cases in which producers may not have negotiated a particular package based on what they would regard as full remuneration, simply because of the commercial opportunity, but the regulations give performers increased rights to claim an equitable remuneration from producers. We have taken steps to help the producers, and I have tried to explain that to them. The assumption about the transfer of authors' rental rights in films to producers—a point raised by the hon. Member for Ashfield—received careful consideration.

Throughout, we have tried to err on the side of there being a proper way to get works to market without undue complexity. We certainly do not want to put a burden on any rental outlets, many of which are small businesses. We have had to make a decision about who are authors and about the respective rights of performers. On balance, I think that we have got it right. The statutory instruments were tabled on 11 July, and we have had extensive consultation since then. I am aware of the arguments.

The hon. Member for Ashfield raised a number of minor points on which he wanted guidance. For the sake of brevity, I shall write to him on those. However, he raised a serious point about the position of uplinks within the European Economic Area, from one area to another. It is a complex matter. We have attempted to apply the copyright law from the place from which the signal has been broadcast. Of course, there will be certain safeguards for countries if the uplinkers come from outside the EEA. Again, it is a matter of giving some comfort to the broadcasters about which copyright law applies.

I do not have details to hand about the specific case of how Cable News Network would be affected, but I am concerned about the possible effects on satellite uplinks. That point has been clarified in the regulations by reference to the use of the law of the country from which the signal originates.

Mr. Hoon: It would be helpful if the Minister would say categorically that there will not be any effect on the ownership of copyright. There is ambiguity under the provisions as drafted. I am not questioning the underlying reason behind the drafting; it is simply that, because of the way in which the rather technical provisions operate, there is concern that the statutory instrument could be interpreted as defining British Telecom not only as the maker of a CNN or similar broadcast for infringement purposes—the point just dealt with by the Minister—but as the owner of the copyright in that broadcast. I hope that the Minister will say that that is not the case; that would resolve any ambiguity.

Mr. Taylor: It is not the intention behind the regulations to affect authorship of broadcast or ownership of copyright, and we do not consider that they do so. Regulation 6 states not that the operator of an uplink station is the person making the broadcast, but rather that he is to be treated as such. In addition, we believe that it is clear from the manner in which the regulations are presented that the uplink operator should be treated as the broadcaster only for certain purposes—in relation to clearance of the rights in underlying works in broadcasts identified in regulation 6.

I stress that the regulations must be construed in the light of the directives that they are intended to implement, which similarly have no bearing on authorship or ownership of copyright in broadcast. That is also the approach that will be taken by United Kingdom courts in interpreting the legislation.

The key point is that, in attempting to implement the directives in UK law, we have tried not to disturb traditional relationships. We have tried to make it as simple as possible for content comfortably to flow into the UK market. In many cases, that means that, although we have strengthened the rights of performers and given them an underlying position in negotiations—the right to equitable remuneration regardless of the economic arrangements entered into by the producers—they should nevertheless negotiate with the producer.

The Copyright, Design and Patents Act was far-reaching in its vision of the future. It covers some of the problems relating to the new age of electronic interactivity—video on demand. We are comfortable that we have anticipated ways in which that may evolve as the information society progresses. An important point, which was raised by the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller), is that the European Commission has already published a Green Paper on copyright in the information society. Clearly, further directives that may emanate from that in due course will consider the way in which the electronic age will be accommodated. Before I conclude, I intend to deal with the wider issues that the hon. Gentleman raised.

Mr. Miller: I am a little puzzled about the Minister's remarks relating to proposed section 144A(7) and the definition of cable re-transmission. I am not sure that the definition will meet what the Minister says is the intention. For example, in transmitting a compact disc that has been recorded digitally on to a network server, or in receiving a signal, encoding it oneself and putting it out on to a server through BT networks, who would be in breach of copyright? Clearly, the person doing that would be in breach, but there is some doubt whether responsibility would also lie with BT or the cable provider—or, in the case of mixed provision, a network of people. Will the Minister explain how the definition will work?

Mr. Taylor: In some cases, such matters will have to be tested in the courts. We are talking about issues such as common carriers, whether there is a burden of proof that there was a knowing breach of copyright by a carrier, whether it be a telephone company or a broadcaster; whether rights have been properly obtained; and whether they were knowingly obtained. Quite honestly, it is not for me, across the Floor of the House of Commons, to anticipate how the courts will interpret such matters, but they will need to be tested.

As media convergence comes about, many such matters will be affected. Indeed, the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston said that, increasingly in the digital age, it would be easy to lose intellectual property. There could be instant quality reproduction. That is why I have been in discussions with companies, not least the Thorn EMI laboratory, about electronic digital signatures, or watermarks, embedded into a chip, which can be picked up only by special monitoring equipment. That equipment can sensibly work out whether any broadcaster is using copyright material that has not been paid for, or material that has been paid for in the proper way. Technological solutions will have to reinforce the law as we make progress.

Mr. Tony Banks: I know that it is not the Minister's job to anticipate or interpret that which the courts might decide, but there is something that he can tell us: are performers in this country challenging the fairness of remuneration treated differently from performers in the other countries within the EEA? Are they or are they not being treated differently from all the other performers in the EEA?

Mr. Taylor: To my knowledge, our performers are not being treated differently from all other performers. There are variations within the EEA, from country to country. Many of the ways in which our performers feel they might be treated differently in fact relate only to traditional broadcast materials. To that extent, we are attempting to provide a flexible way for performers—while still protecting them—to pursue their interests and get equitable remuneration, without specifying that in statute. As we move forward to new distribution mechanisms, we shall quickly find that the 50:50 split is not tenable. It is in the long-term interests of performers for their material to be distributed more widely rather than for it to be carefully restricted and used less. Content will be king in the new age, putting performers in a much better position.

The Government have played a leading role in the development of the wider market. We are active in the preparations for the World Intellectual Property Organisation conference in December. I have had active talks with the various music organisations in this country and in Europe. Rupert Perry of EMI has played a leading role in that. I have recently been to India to talk about copyright issues. One or two European Union countries, such as Italy, do not have a good record on copyright. We are drawing attention to that. We have also had severe problems with China and Bulgaria.

We are well aware of the need for copyright. If intellectual property is not protected, there will not be a content industry capable of dealing with the pressure of public demand. It is also necessary to protect intellectual property by technological means. Electronic signatures, or watermarks, will be essential and there will be a much greater need for monitoring. Intellectual property will be important in the transmission of music, software and programmes. It will be downloadable only in a country in which a performer is confident that his copyright will be protected rather than one without secure copyright protection.

That can be resolved only through the implementation of responsible policies around the world. Sir Leon Brittan will be assisting in the World Trade Organisation talks. Further talks are being held by WIPO. We are putting as steadfast a case as possible, for good commercial reasons. The music industry is one of the few in this country that export twice as much as they import. It is an important player in the national economy and we want to do everything possible to ensure that it and all the other providers of intellectual property gain secure access to world markets.

Mr. Miller: Is the Minister seeking to redefine the traditional meaning of the word "broadcast" in the context of this debate? Will he press for that definition to extend to all forms of digital transmission?

Mr. Taylor: I am cautious about broadening that definition. The hon. Gentleman will well understand that I believe that there will eventually be convergence. Even the BBC has openly announced plans for broadcasting over the Internet. There will be a convergence of all means of transmission—including cable, telephone and satellite. Broadcasters and other content providers, including the music industry, will come together in the new multimedia age.

As I mentioned in the Command Paper issued yesterday in response to the report of the House of Lords Science and Technology Committee on the information society, we envisage looking at the regulatory environment in the context of changing industries. The time is not yet right for that. We have made some pre-emptive moves—for example, through the regulation by the Office of Telecommunications of conditional access as a result of the Broadcasting Act 1996. We are well apprised of the changes and well aware of their significance. It is not sensible to move too far or too fast. We are watching carefully to see where technology leads.

We have to protect copyright and intellectual property. I believe that the measure will do that, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Copyright and Related Rights Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 11th July, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.

Licensing Law (Northern Ireland)

5.3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Malcolm Moss): I beg to move,

That the draft Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, which was laid before this House on 30th October, be approved.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I understand that with this, it will be convenient to discuss the following motion:

That the draft Licensing (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, which was laid before this House on 30th October, be approved.

Mr. Moss: We are considering two orders, which together form a package of reforms. One deals with the licensing of premises such as public houses, hotels and restaurants, the other with the registration of private clubs in Northern Ireland to permit them to supply alcohol to members.

The orders consolidate, with amendments, existing Northern Ireland law in the Licensing (Northern Ireland) Order 1990 and the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. A wide-ranging review of the laws on alcohol began in December 1992 with a review of the laws on registered clubs. A review of the licensing laws was instigated in February 1994, after it became clear that much common ground existed between clubs and licensing laws. The orders are coming before the House only now because there have been extensive consultations since then.

The orders contain many new deregulatory provisions and reflect the changing social attitudes and expectations of modern society. We have sought to strike a balance between the need to control and regulate the sale of alcohol in an effective, enforceable and equitable way and the need to have full regard to the wider public health issues. The main changes represent a balanced relaxation of the law, while preserving the safeguards necessary to promote sensible and socially responsible attitudes to drinking and prevent alcohol abuse.

I shall try to deal quickly with the more significant provisions that amend existing laws or propose new measures. I shall first explain the provisions common to both orders and then explain those unique to each.

Articles 13 and 21 of the licensing order and article 24 of the clubs order provide that liquor licences and club registrations, currently granted or renewed for a maximum of one year, may now be valid for up to five years at the discretion of the courts. That deregulatory measure will be welcomed by licenceholders and registered clubs, and will also free up valuable court time.

Article 42 of the licensing order and article 24 of the clubs order will abolish the compulsory Sunday afternoon break and allow the supply of alcohol between 12.30 pm and 10 pm on that day. That has been a contentious issue in the reforms. However, the proposal brings the law in Northern Ireland into line with that in England and Wales, recognising widespread demands to be able to enjoy a more leisurely lunch, to have an early high tea or, as is becoming increasingly popular, to watch a satellite football match with friends.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will the Minister clarify a point in the registration of clubs order that I cannot work out? Article 24(1)(b) says that the permitted hours are "on Good Friday from 5 in the afternoon to 11 in the evening"

Article 24(2)(b) says that the hours shall

"provide for a break of at least 2 consecutive hours between 2 in the afternoon and 5 in the afternoon on Good Friday"

Mr. Moss: That is reasonably clear. Article 24(1)(b) gives the total period during which a club can be open, provided there is a two-hour break at some stage.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Article 24(1)(b) says:

"from 5 in the afternoon to 11 in the evening".

That is six hours. Article 24(2)(b) provides for a break between 2 in the afternoon and 5 in the afternoon when the club should not be open.

Mr. Moss: I shall come back to that point when I wind up.

Now, where was I? High tea, I think. There is no evidence that the change to the law in England and Wales has led to an increase in alcohol consumption.

Article 59 of the licensing order and article 33 of the clubs order bring the law in Northern Ireland more closely into line with England and Wales with the introduction of children's certificates, which will enable young people under 18 to be in licensed premises and registered clubs up to 9 pm, provided that they are accompanied by an adult.

The presence of children in an alcohol environment has been an emotive issue in Northern Ireland, although I would inform hon. Members that children have been allowed into the bars of sporting clubs in the Province for many years. There has been a considerable demand from people in Northern Ireland to be able to enjoy a drink in the company of their family, usually as an accompaniment to a meal, and the Government are satisfied that such a proposal will also enable children to see sensible drinking in a family context. The Government have taken the power to prescribe by regulations the requirements that all licensed premises and registered clubs must meet, should that be necessary.

I come now to proposals unique to the licensing law. Article 5 creates three new categories of premises that may be licensed—guest houses, conference centres and higher education institutions. There has been a considerable demand from the public to have a drink with a meal in guest houses, and the Government, with strong support from the Northern Ireland tourist board, believe that that limited extension will assist Northern Ireland's tourism industry.

In addition, one of the fastest-growing businesses in Northern Ireland is the conference industry, and the Government believe that that industry should be given every opportunity to compete for its share of the United Kingdom market. The Province's universities also host a number of events and conferences, and having their own licences will provide them with a greater degree of flexibility.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): In communications with, I suspect, all Northern Ireland Members of Parliament, the Minister has suggested one or two conference centres that are likely to fall within the description, but he has added "and some others", which widened the description to one that we cannot define.

[Mr. Peter Robinson]

How will the Government define which centres are to be allowed a licence under the heading of "conference centres"?

Mr. Moss: Many of the larger hotels in Northern Ireland now operate as conference centres, but obviously their licences will be taken care of in the usual way. The universities open during their vacations for conferences, and the measure will enable them to run sensible bars during those conferences. The Waterfront hall in Belfast will also run conferences. The definition will be easy to achieve and, in issuing licences, the courts will be quite clear as to what constitutes a conference centre. Such a centre should have facilities available for large groups of people to participate in a proper programme of discussion and debate over one, two or more days.

Article 5 also provides the powers under which regulations may be made specifying the conditions under which shops and/or supermarkets in Northern Ireland may, in future, sell alcohol alongside other goods. The provision that currently prevents mixed trading will be dropped from the legislation, thus bringing the law in Northern Ireland more closely into line with that in the rest of the United Kingdom. The Government are aware of concerns that placing alcohol on a supermarket shelf could give the wrong message, and could result in impulse buying and in exposing children to alcohol in the course of shopping. For that reason, regulations will be put in place to ensure that, among other things, stores set aside a designated area for the sale of alcohol.

Article 42 changes the permitted hours for free-standing off-licences, which have been at variance with the rest of the United Kingdom since 1987, and those for off-licences in, or attached to, pubs, which have differed since 1989. The Government now propose to bring all off-sales outlets in Northern Ireland broadly into line with the rest of the United Kingdom.

Article 44 introduces two measures that I would wish to highlight. First, licence holders who apply for additional permitted hours will no longer be required to provide food and entertainment, but instead will be required to provide one or the other or, if they so wish, both. That change is in recognition of the contention that many people may want food or entertainment, but not necessarily both.

The second change will allow licensed premises providing food or entertainment, or both, to apply to the courts for an additional two hours on a Sunday night, taking the permitted hours up to midnight, other than on Christmas day or Easter Sunday. It is becoming increasingly popular in parts of the Province for Sunday nights to become social evenings, and the proposals are a sensible recognition of that.

Article 45 deals with small public houses that cannot supply food or entertainment and, under the present law, cannot have late licences. It is therefore proposed that such pubs be allowed up to 20 late licences a year, and the Government are confident that that small but significant concession will be warmly welcomed.

Article 51 deals with the conditions as to the sale of intoxicating liquor in guest houses and restaurants. I shall target my remarks primarily on restaurants, where I am bringing forward a number of changes that I should like to bring to hon. Members' attention. The sale of alcohol in restaurants will continue to be ancillary to the purchase of a main table meal, and to assist the policing of that provision, it will be a feature of the new order that payment for food and drinks must be on the same bill. Additionally, to curb the possibility of premises masquerading as restaurants when they are really discos or something similar, I have decided to introduce a provision prohibiting the charging of an entrance fee.

While on the subject of restaurants, I should point out that I have decided to remove the provisions whereby such establishments applying for a licence to sell alcohol are subject to an annual inspection by the Northern Ireland tourist board. That inspection was extremely detailed and did not need to be satisfied by the non-licensed restaurants. I decided that the system was over-prescriptive and have taken the opportunity to deregulate and allow market forces to operate.

Articles 67 and 68 strengthen the law in relation to the presence of alcohol at unlicensed entertainments or unregistered clubs. In relation to the former, the existing law is targeted at entertainments organised for gain and has proved inadequate. The new provisions prohibit alcohol at any entertainment outside of licensed premises or registered clubs unless it is being held for other than private gain, and places the onus on the organiser to prove that it is not being held for private gain. Article 68 prohibits illegal drinking in clubs that are not registered, and is targeted at what are commonly called "shebeens". Rights of entry have also been provided to the police to investigate suspected breaches of the law.

Article 72 introduces a new provision whereby the police may seek the suspension of a licence if any change of circumstances occurring since the grant or renewal of the licence would suggest that the licence holder was no longer a fit person to hold a licence, or the licensed premises were no longer suitable for such a business.

Finally, I shall detail proposals unique to the clubs law. Articles 3 and 15 are related, and I shall deal with them together. Article 3 tightens the existing restrictions on the sale of alcohol in clubs that have ceased to be registered. That provision outlaws the presence of alcohol in such premises and introduces an automatic five-year disqualification for clubs that are convicted of that offence. That tough new measure is in direct response to clubs that have been exploiting weaknesses in the existing law by claiming that alcohol present in the premises is not being supplied by the club.

Article 4 strengthens the existing laws by providing that, during the waiting period before a court hearing of an application for registration, clubs must have in place certain rules designed to demonstrate their ability to operate within the law. That is coupled with a relaxation of the existing laws, whereby the waiting period to be served by clubs before their applications for registration can be dealt with by the courts will be reduced from two years to one. The waiting period enables clubs to demonstrate that they are bona fide and well run, and a one-year probationary period is now regarded as sufficient.

Article 26 contains an amendment that will increase from 20 to 52 in any year, the number of special occasions on which a club may supply alcohol to 1 am. The figure of 20 was fixed in 1987 and it now seems only reasonable to permit clubs to enjoy an average of one late night each week throughout the year, subject to police approval.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): While there is concern that liberalisation of the regulations could lead to increased alcoholism in Northern Ireland, residents living in close proximity to licensed premises and the premises that will have extended, late-night provision for their clientele, are concerned that they will be subjected to unnecessary disturbance arising from the late-night activities. What assurance can those people be given that, if a racket is created week on week, the Royal Ulster Constabulary will take prompt action, and the privilege that we are about to introduce will be removed?

Mr. Moss: The article enables the extension from 20 to 52, but it is an extension of permitted hours. I understand that the club would have to apply for each extension. The hon. Gentleman has rightly drawn to my attention the concerns of people in the vicinity. If such an extension caused them concern or disturbance, they would be able to oppose an extension of the permitted hours in court. That is my understanding, and if I have not given the hon. Gentleman the correct answer, I shall clarify it later.

Article 40 contains significant changes to the existing law, enabling the manner in which accounts are to be kept and presented to be prescribed. Among other things, the 1987 order contained provisions to combat racketeering in the affairs of some clubs. The Government believe that it is vital that all registered clubs should manage their financial affairs in a responsible manner, and the police, along with the terrorist finance unit of the Northern Ireland Office, have warned that there is a continued need for vigilance to ensure that clubs comply with the law.

Article 42 will therefore give the RUC wider powers of entry and inspection, so that clubs can be policed more effectively. It will enable the police to enter and inspect premises, particularly those that continue to supply alcohol after losing their registration and clubs that are awaiting registration.

Article 43 will introduce a penalty points provision under which points will be attributed for certain offences relating to the keeping and presenting of accounts. It is aimed at clubs that commit serious or persistent breaches of the law in relation to their accounts. The RUC and the Northern Ireland Office requested, and strongly support, the introduction of that provision, particularly as the courts will no longer be renewing registrations on an annual basis. Bona fide, well-run clubs, which the majority are, have nothing to fear from that proposal.

That concludes my outline of the main provisions of the Orders. I hope that hon. Members will accept that the proposals comprise sensible relaxations in the law as well as maintain essential safeguards. I commend the orders to the House.

5.22 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): As the Minister said, the two measures are to some extent deregulatory, although the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1997 contains a restatement of existing law, which is different from the comparable legislation for the rest of Great Britain. The order is much less deregulatory than the Licensing (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, which brings the law into line with that for the rest of Great Britain.

When similar licensing legislation was introduced in the House for the rest of the United Kingdom, the Labour party did not oppose it and we shall not oppose the orders this evening, although I understand and am well aware of the objections—the Minister circulated them to hon. Members—to the increased availability of alcohol, particularly on Sundays.

I wholeheartedly endorse the Minister's comments on sensible drinking and striking a balance between giving people the freedom to enjoy the increased availability of alcohol, especially on Sundays, at meal times and with their families, and increasing alcohol consumption and abuse.

I agree with the Northern Ireland Federation of Clubs that the original order increased the regulations applicable to clubs in certain areas and did not deal with some of the issues that the wider club movement, both here and in Northern Ireland, wanted to raise. The Minister was good enough to meet representatives of the Northern Ireland Federation of Clubs, hon. Members and myself, and the draft order was amended to take account of some of the points made. I am grateful to the Minister for the time that he took to meet us and discuss the issues at length, and for rethinking the order in relation to article 43 and penalty points. As a consequence, we shall not oppose the order.

I am conscious of the Government's fears about clubs in Northern Ireland; the Minister mentioned the enforcement details. Clubs in Northern Ireland are different from those in Great Britain. The latter are usually non-profit-making or working men's clubs. In Northern Ireland, clubs are usually of a sporting nature or have some other social function. The Government have argued that some have been vehicles for paramilitary funding and, although there is no proof, that fear remains and the Government are conscious of it, as are the Opposition.

That possibility has to be borne in mind when we discuss these proposals, particularly the requirements for improved accountancy for clubs in Northern Ireland, which we welcome. When we debate such orders in future, I hope that the accountancy systems in place and the details contained in the present orders are such that we might be able to deregulate some of the prescription surrounding bookkeeping for Northern Ireland clubs, bringing them more into line with the systems that operate throughout the rest of the United Kingdom. The Government are still overly prescriptive in a few areas, and further deregulation measures could have been implemented.

While we welcome the reduction in the waiting period for registration from two years to one, the licensing order provides for a provisional licence. We appreciate that there is a need to be able to establish that a club and its activities are bona fide and that it is seeking to obtain a licence in the proper manner. I suggest to the Minister, however, that the Northern Ireland Office could have considered a probationary licence, rather than the probationary one-year waiting period.

We also welcome the increased duration of a certificate from one to five years, which will enable clubs to enjoy a period of stability and reduce the bureaucracy surrounding annual registration—the annual visits to the magistrates and the licensing bench and all that goes with that. We are aware that the Government felt that the extension merited the penalty points system. The Minister pointed out that the deregulatory aspect of the increased duration of the certificate meant that such a system should be put in place to enable the police to monitor clubs throughout the five-year period.

An application concerning a club can still be made to the courts at any time under article 13. So an application for the cancellation of registration can be made at any time, regardless of the five-year period. Under article 8, the period for consideration of the conduct of a club in relation to the renewal of a certificate has been extended to six years. The five-year registration period is also at the discretion of the courts. I hope that the magistrates courts in Northern Ireland will honour the intention of the order that the registration period should be five years, and that registrations are not granted for one or two years.

We welcome the changes that will allow clubs to apply for registration out of time and temporary premises to be certificated. We give a cautious welcome to the extension of Sunday hours. I endorse the Minister's comments about eating times on Sunday and about sporting activities on satellite television. It is now more than a year since similar legislation was introduced in Great Britain, and there have been no particular problems with it.

We welcome the special occasion authorisations, although I am conscious of the point made by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs), that residents living near clubs or pubs that will have a licence to operate until 1 am should be given due consideration; we must be aware that some complaints may arise.

I hope that the courts will make a reasonable interpretation of what is a special occasion. When the Licensing (Sunday Hours) Bill was debated in February 1995, reference was made to the inconsistencies between magistrates in various parts of the country; what some regarded as a special occasion others regarded as not warranting an extension.

The order allows for children accompanied by an adult to be in a club until a 9 pm threshold, provided that the club has applied for a children's certificate. The licensing order contains a similar provision, and my comments apply to both orders, which stipulate that for a children's certificate to be granted, there must be a suitable environment for children. That means that there should be facilities for family meals, especially on Sundays. I welcome that, as it would allow families to enjoy meals together on Sundays—something of which most hon. Members will be conscious.

I am not sure how many clubs in Northern Ireland would be deemed to have a suitable environment or how many would even want to admit children. My club allows children to remain until 9.30 pm, and that curfew is well policed by members, who genuinely do not want to drink in an area with children.

Magistrates should consider no-smoking areas when children's certificates are applied for. The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley) raised that point during the debate on the Licensing (Sunday Hours) Bill in 1995; he objected to magistrates imposing a requirement that a club should have a no-smoking area to gain a children's certificate and maintained that they did not have that discretion. I take issue with that, and I hope that the Government, who are responsible for targets for reducing children's smoking under "The Health of the Nation", will share my view that no-smoking areas should be taken into account. For children, a suitable environment should surely be a non-smoking environment.

I fully support the idea of children being able to accompany their parents in clubs and pubs with eating facilities and a pleasant atmosphere, but I would not like children to be taken to smoky bars or taprooms with a less pleasant atmosphere. It behoves us to ensure that the environment is indeed suitable.

Some parts of the order are unnecessarily prescriptive. On article 38, can the Minister tell me why it should be illegal for clubs in Northern Ireland to advertise, when clubs in Great Britain can advertise social events and entertainment? Unfortunately, clubs in Northern Ireland do not have the system of associate membership and are restricted to the members themselves, but there is no reason why they should not be allowed to advertise events in the club to try to increase their membership or attendance.

I have already referred to the penalty points system and to the fact that the Government compromised on the issue and accepted some of what was said by the Northern Ireland Federation of Clubs and by hon. Members. I hope that improved accountancy systems will enable us eventually to get rid of the points system altogether. The system is now to apply only to accountancy and bookkeeping matters, as it was felt that that was appropriate to the Government's fears about clubs and fund raising. However, the three-year period for expunging those penalty points is still too long.

Article 47 relates to the presumptions applicable in Northern Ireland but not in the rest of the United Kingdom. It is surprising that is considered to be evidence that the liquor was supplied by that club and that the person consumed that liquor.

> "Evidence that any person obtained, consumed or intended to consume intoxicating liquor in the premises of a registered club"

The article also states:

> "Where intoxicating liquor in open vessels is found in the premises of a registered club during any period when the consumption of intoxicating liquor in those premises is prohibited . . . consumption . . . shall . . . be deemed to have taken place during that period".

That means that a police officer who walks into a club and sees an empty glass that may have contained alcoholic liquor can assume that liquor was consumed outside the permitted hours, which seems a bizarre interpretation of the law. There were complaints about the penalty points system, because it was felt that the presumptions could be abused if the police or the authorities wanted to close down a club quickly. I find the proof elements of article 47 surprising.

I want to deal with some issues that are not included in the order, but on which we pressed the Minister earlier in the year. One issue that is always raised in relation to clubs is associated membership. That system has been in use in the rest of Great Britain since 1875. It was supported in a letter from the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Stafford Northcote, to the licensing bench. He said:

"There seems no reason for refusing the exemption to a club because it admits to honorary membership subscribing members of other clubs affiliated to the Working Men's Club and Institute Union and supplies them with liquors on the same terms as its own subscribing members".

The associate membership system has been in place for more than 100 years. The Working Men's Club and Institute Union, the CIU, in Great Britain had been hoping to extend those provisions to Northern Ireland. The CIU has printed a set of model rules, which it hoped would be adopted by clubs in Northern Ireland, that would allow for associate membership but strengthen the rules for clubs there and address many of the fears that the Government have raised about improved accountancy and bookkeeping.

It appears that the model rules will not now be applied, because of the restrictions in the order. In schedule 1, paragraph 8 does not replicate the reference to temporary members in the 1987 order. There is no reference to that in the explanatory document. Temporary membership would have afforded something similar to associate membership, but it has been removed without explanation. It seems that the Northern Ireland Office is dead set against associate membership in Northern Ireland's clubs, despite its long history in this country and the fact that it has not caused problems. The associate membership system means that people attending clubs other than their own must have their membership and other details checked before they can gain entry. It is well policed and controlled by the CIU.

We will not oppose the licensing order. The provisions for the rest of the United Kingdom were debated in February 1995. There have been no significant problems with them since then. I expect that the House will soon debate further licensing deregulation, which perhaps should have been in place last year but which was rejected by the deregulation Committee in another place. There are legitimate concerns, such as the extension of Sunday drinking and the increased availability of alcohol in supermarkets and shops, and I am sure that Northern Ireland Members will list them. I endorse again the Minister's view that we have to strike the right balance between the public's freedom to drink on Sundays and the encouragement of increased alcohol consumption. Proper safeguards are essential.

We welcome the extension of licensing to guest houses, conference centres and higher education establishments. Tourism is a major industry in Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the United Kingdom. There should be a uniform system throughout the United Kingdom. The measure will help the tourist industry in Northern Ireland. There are initiatives between the tourist boards of Ireland and Northern Ireland to increase tourism in Northern Ireland, and regulating the licensing system in this way will help.

On the mixed trading provisions, I hope that there will be adequate safeguards on sales from supermarkets and off-licences. It is all too easy for under-age drinkers to obtain access to alcohol from them. We are talking about kids obtaining access not to beer or lager, but to alcoholic water, alcopops, hooch and ciders of about 9 per cent. alcohol by volume, such as Blastaways, Castaways and all the rest. They are attractive to children and easy to drink. They are a problem, and I hope that adequate safeguards are in place to prevent under-age drinking of such alcohol.

We welcome the decrease in bureaucracy that results from longer licences and the idea of occasional licences, especially where the extended hours do not cause problems in residential areas. My earlier comments on magistrates' discretion apply to that.

I have touched on Sunday hours and I give that provision a cautious welcome. It is appropriate to extend Sunday hours and take away the break, but I hope that it is regarded sensibly and that the law will be used as intended to allow families to eat and drink together on Sunday afternoons or take advantage of Sunday televised sport. People have more leisure and they want the freedom to enjoy it in pubs and clubs.

We hope that the additional hours in the order are used sensibly by the licensed trade. There is always a demand for later drinking, but that must be balanced against the public's freedom to avoid rowdiness in the early hours of morning. My experience is that later closing times help to avoid pubs emptying at one time, which can lead to disorder and rowdiness. Lengthened drinking time will allow people to leave in a staggered process. [Laughter.] I mean staggered in time, not physical staggering.

I mentioned children's certificates in relation to clubs, and I would reiterate my comments on what constitutes a suitable environment. We welcome the orders and hope that they are implemented sensibly. We do not want to condone increased alcohol consumption or the increased availability of alcohol to minors, but we want the public to be able to take advantage of deregulation and have the extra freedom to drink with their children on Sunday afternoons. We shall not oppose the orders.

5.47 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I have two introductory comments. The Minister will by now have realised that, when he undertook to review licensing legislation, he took on a greater problem than he had envisaged. I am sure that he has not thanked the people in his Department and the outside interests who pushed him down that road.

Secondly, it is right that at the outset I should register a protest about the way that the legislation is being handled. We have two orders substantial in both content and size. One has nine schedules and 57 pages, the other has 113 pages and 13 schedules. They contain matters of great importance to the people of Northern Ireland. The concern of people in Northern Ireland is shown by the 700 responses that the Minister received.

However, we have only one and a half hours, and the two Front-Bench spokesmen have taken half that time. That is not adequate and should be deprecated by hon. Members who believe that there should be greater opportunity to speak on such matters, especially given the backcloth that we cannot table amendments to Northern Ireland legislation. It is put through by Order in Council on a take it or leave it basis, which is most unsatisfactory in all circumstances.

I note the cost of the orders. The Licensing (Northern Ireland) Order is priced at £11 and the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order at £7.10. Looking at the number of hon. Members in the Chamber, with the purchase price of the two orders, we could probably have bought several rounds of drink and had change left over. The high price reflects the volume of the orders.

[Mr. Peter Robinson]

I shall take the two orders separately at first. I can accept where the Minister is coming from in respect of the clubs order. Everybody recognises that there are unscrupulous organisations and individuals in Northern Ireland who will try to use every opportunity—whether in the drink trade or anywhere else—to gain funds for themselves or their organisations and the uses to which they might put the money would certainly be condemned by the House. I therefore entirely support the Minister's aim of ensuring that clubs are regulated in such a way as to ensure that no organisation with links to paramilitary or other such groups can benefit from the sale of intoxicating liquor and aid those groups as a consequence.

However, there has been a massive change in the club trade in the past few years. I am sure that the Minister recognises that the Northern Ireland Federation of Clubs has played a significant role in regularising the clubs business in Northern Ireland. There has been a massive shift away from the shebeens that were on almost every street corner in some parts of central Belfast. There are now few clubs of questionable legality operating, and all the clubs registered with the Federation of Clubs are recognised as bona fide. The federation has played a major role in urging the Minister to ensure that the licensing laws are such that they remove from the club trade those who would not be proper recipients of a licence.

The main requirement is the one that the Minister sought to deal with under article 43—to ensure that money is not siphoned off for illegal and other purposes. In his enthusiasm, the Minister might have gone beyond what is sensible in that respect. He will want to ensure that there is appropriate legislation to give the Royal Ulster Constabulary whatever support it requires in taking action against those involved in paramilitary attempts to siphon off money from clubs. However, in the original proposal for article 43, the Minister brought in a penalty point system that removed magistrates' discretion to such an extent that we would have had mandatory sentences for technical offences.

One solicitor described such a technical offence in terms of a minor infringement, such as an individual staying a minute after he or she was due to be out of a club. Technically, that individual would be guilty of having broken the law, and the magistrate would have had a duty to require that points be set against the club's licence. It would have been ludicrous for a club to lose its licence as a result of such a technical offence because the magistrates' discretion had been removed.

I am therefore glad to see that the Minister's confidence in magistrates has increased during the draft stage of the order, and that he has removed from schedule 6 several of the non-financial elements where the magistrate would have been required to impose mandatory penalty points. I welcome that change, and the Minister can expect the support of me and my colleagues on that order.

The Minister might find less welcome my comments on the licensing order. I have several concerns about that order, the first of which relates to its very nature. It is enabling legislation, and because so much depends on the regulations and conditions that will apply to the various articles, it is difficult for hon. Members debating the merits of the order to know what the final outcome will be.

The Minister's original intention expressed in a statement in January 1995 made me examine three specific areas. One of those has subsequently and, in my view, rightly been dropped from the order—the surrender requirement for licences. The House should thank the Minister for recognising that that would not have been helpful.

The general commercial value of a licence is such that many of those involved in the licensed trade use their ownership of a licence as security with their banks. Since about 1902, anyone who wants to open licensed premises in Northern Ireland has had to secure a licence from an existing licenceholder. That requirement was of benefit in preventing the proliferation of pubs and off-licences throughout Northern Ireland. In addition, licenceholders had an asset of value. I understand that about £100 million was invested in licences and that banks were greatly concerned at the prospect of so much being wiped off the balance sheets of publicans and off-licence owners, to devastating commercial effect.

The Minister has done the right thing in changing his mind. I raise this matter not only to thank the Minister, but to set down a marker, lest any successor to the Minister might be persuaded by the civil servants who originally proposed that we should go down that road. It would not help the licensed trade, nor would it help those who are against drink because it would lead to a greater number of licenceholders in Northern Ireland. The Minister has nevertheless made a brave fist of considerably extending the licensed trade in Northern Ireland through other measures in the order.

I turn now to the element dealing with mixed trading. Under the order, the Minister seems to be dragging us back to the days of what used to be called—long before the time of any hon. Member here—the old spirit grocers. Effectively, unless the accompanying regulations state otherwise, the order could result in alcohol being sold on every street corner. There will be nothing to prevent any shop from setting aside a section of floor space and employing someone over 18 for the purpose of selling liquor. The order makes it possible for alcohol to be available on almost every street in Northern Ireland. I am keen to hear what conditions the Minister will impose to ensure that we do not have, dotted across the countryside, people who will be able to run what is effectively an off-licence in every street in Northern Ireland.

The legislation is such that I suspect that it has been introduced primarily as a result of pressure by the supermarket trade—not only supermarket traders in Northern Ireland, but those with whom the Minister and the Conservative Government will be more closely associated, who are coming to Northern Ireland. I notice that J. Sainsbury plc says that it will apply for a licence for every set of premises that it opens in Northern Ireland. If it does so, it will significantly affect jobs in Northern Ireland as well as the availability of alcohol.

Supermarkets such as Sainsbury and Tesco are moving into Northern Ireland. They, and those who are already there—Stewart's, Wellworth's and so on—will undoubtedly out-price the local off-licences, where jobs will be lost.

The legislation introduces to young people the idea that drink is a normal factor in their lives. I suspect that no regulation that the Minister could frame would ensure that young people did not pass through areas where drink was available, either in shops or supermarkets. Day by day, they will have greater contact with drink, and it will be much more obvious to them that drink is available.

I note that the BBC's "Food and Drink" programme sent several under-age individuals to various supermarkets in Great Britain to test legislation currently in force which is similar to that which the Minister proposes to introduce in Northern Ireland. On every occasion, those young people were able to buy drink, whether it was from Sainsbury, Tesco, Asda or other major supermarkets. All were able to purchase drink although they were minors.

There is a much lower standard—and, I suspect, a lower level of awareness—among people who work on the tills of supermarkets than there would be in off-licences. The Minister must at least acknowledge that he will have to take steps to give him other means of dealing with under-age people who will be able to obtain drink as a result of the legislation that he is encouraging the House to support tonight.

I notice from a recent report that J. Sainsbury at York lost its drink licence because it had been caught selling alcohol to under-18s, and children of 14 and 15 were able to buy drinks on three separate occasions when they had been sent into the supermarket by the police. Interestingly, on one occasion when they did so, the person who sold them the drink said, "Put it in a carrier bag or I will lose my job." Obviously, that individual was prepared to sell drink to someone aged 14 or 15, with the knowledge that she was selling it to a minor.

The Minister increases the opportunities for under-age drinking—a problem that already causes great concern in Northern Ireland. I suspect that, almost weekly, people will visit my surgery and those of many hon. Members from Northern Ireland, especially the Belfast area, to complain about under-age youths causing problems in their area because they have access to drink. I also suspect that those people will be able to tell us where those youths are purchasing the drink. The Minister aggravates the social problems in Northern Ireland by this legislation.

I ask the Minister, why has it not been possible, at the time that we are discussing this legislation, for us to have sight of the regulations that will control what goes on in shops and supermarkets? The legislation has not come out of the blue to the Minister; he has been talking about it since the start of 1995. The Northern Ireland Office must have an idea of what the regulations are.

Some of us suspect that the Minister seeks, by the methods that I have outlined, to push the enabling legislation through the House tonight and then introduce regulations that might make the regime very liberal. They might allow supermarkets and shops to sell alcohol to the public without much restriction.

Part of the legislation deals with restaurants, guest houses and so on. The Minister again heaps up problems for the future with that provision. Once again he has an advantage over every other hon. Member, because, although we are aware of what would happen as a result of his legislation, he does not invite us to read the regulations and conditions that would apply, under the legislation, to restaurants.

It is possible that, under the legislation, not only will alcohol be able to be sold as an accompaniment to meals by bona fide restaurants whose main business is selling food, but it could be the major source of income for many of those people whose contact with food will be only a matter of convenience for their profits, who will almost run a bar. By introducing drinking into every restaurant, which would undoubtedly be the result, such regulations would destroy the family atmosphere that exists in so many restaurants in Northern Ireland. They would increase the temptation for people to remain after their meal to continue drinking, with a consequent effect not only on social problems related to drink but on drinking and driving and so on.

The Minister has built up many problems for the future in Northern Ireland as a result of those elements of the licensing order that he brings before us tonight. I shall briefly comment on how he could overcome those problems in the regulations relating to restaurants, shops and supermarkets.

I have approached the Minister several times regarding shops and supermarkets, suggesting that they should have a separate till that deals only with products from the licensed area, and that there should be a separate door to distinguish that area from the rest of the supermarket. The Minister wants to leave things as vague as possible. That is a mistake; we, if not the Minister, will live to regret that.

The Minister should consider granting restaurants a wine licence instead of a full licence. That would restrict drinking to some extent. It would also take drink away from public view. A bar is unnecessary if there is only a wine licence. If the Minister does not follow that road, he should consider restricting the floor area of the alcohol sales element of the restaurant in accordance with the size of the restaurant.

What is the Minister's definition of a guest house? Will having an upstairs room available for a lodger allow a person to hold a licence on the strength of running a guest house? Perhaps the Minister will tell us in detail how flexible he will be about that.

On the Sunday issue, I do not agree with the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley). I do not believe that there is any demand for an extension of drinking time on Sunday. I do not believe that the Minister has been pressed by the people of Northern Ireland to extend the Sunday provisions. The whole tenor of his legislation is to extend drinking time, to increase the number of outlets from which people can secure alcoholic beverages, to increase young people's exposure to alcohol, to impose on people in Northern Ireland the view that alcohol is a normal part of everyday life, and to increase the pressure to introduce them to drink.

The Minister should consult his colleagues in other Departments to learn the cost of the abuse of alcohol to many Government Departments in Northern Ireland and to local government there. If he were as aware of that as are many of us who live in Northern Ireland, I doubt whether he would try to extend the availability of alcohol to the extent that the legislation does.

6.9 pm

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I shall not cover the ground that was covered by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), except to underline the concern that he expressed. There seemed to be some naivety among Members on both Front Benches when they spoke about extending the licence to stores.

I query the concern that the police might be too quick to prosecute. The evidence over the years is that they have been slow to do so. Many years ago, complaints were made to a police officer that a publican was selling alcohol to minors. The police officer claimed that there was no evidence of that, but the late Rev. Sammy Simms of the Bethany congregation gave a youngster money to go into the public house and buy alcohol, and frog-marched the constable in behind him. Although we hear it said that the law is too restrictive, it may not be restrictive enough to prevent the exploitation of men and women, boys and girls.

On a recent visit to California, I was struck by the fact that, in virtually every restaurant, and in other places, there was a sign warning of the health hazards not only of smoking, but of alcohol in certain conditions. It is important to recognise that in this debate we are dealing with one of the most serious problems of the human race, especially in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland.

Perhaps it is because I pride myself on being an Ulster Scot that I have some sympathy with the calumny of Scotland and Glasgow in the words of the song: "There's something the matter with Glasgow, boy—she's going round and round." There is nothing wrong with the one who had imbibed, but the rest of the world is in trouble.

I shall press the Minister on the issue of designated areas and ask him to underline the fact that not only the sale but the supply of alcohol to minors is against the law. That is sometimes misunderstood. People say, "But we didn't sell it to them." However, the person who sells or gives alcohol to minors is guilty of a breach of the regulations.

In the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, article 3(2) states:

"every person who supplies, obtains, consumes, keeps for supply"

alcohol without a licence

"shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or to both."

It is an open breach of regulations to supply or sell without a proper licence, but that carries the same penalty as supplying alcohol to a young person, which is covered by article 34. The first offence seems more serious than the second.

I make a plea to the Minister. If the House is not prepared to do so for the nation as a whole, can we not move speedily towards the introduction of a common form of ID in Northern Ireland? A shop or club selling alcohol would no longer be able to hide behind the excuse that young people look older than they are. It is common practice in the United States for the provider to ask for an ID. If that were introduced in Northern Ireland, it would clearly identify the person and make it plain whether he or she was over 18. It would also be helpful for election purposes.

I await the Minister's response to my earlier question. We have expressed our concerns for years, but the Government keep telling us to wait until there is an Assembly. I have long contended that, until there is an Assembly, the House should legislate for Northern Ireland by Bill rather than by Order in Council, so that we can examine the legislation line by line and amend it. Drafting errors have occurred. I suspect that there is one in article 24 of the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order.

The Minister will be aware that many in my constituency have been concerned about the prospect of a floating restaurant or a floating pub on the Lagan. I have no objection in principle to it being on the Lagan, but I am not so sure that I agree with the ambiguous position of the Laganside development body, which stated earlier that it had no opinion on the matter but now clearly wants the development on the Lagan—not towards the mouth of the Lagan, but adjacent to the Queen's recreation and physical education building.

The legislation in that connection is too lax, because it does not take proper account of the objections of residents. Although no firm decision has been taken, it is strange that after a public inquiry turned down the application, there are those who are still pressing for the development against the wishes of the river users of the Lagan, the residents of the surrounding area and others.

If the Government want to discourage people from drinking and driving, it is difficult for them to require licensed premises to provide car parking spaces. Churches and other establishments in new buildings can be compelled to provide parking, but apparently no such requirement applies to restaurants or Canary wharf—on the Lagan, not in London. The calm of the area has been shattered by the provision of parking facilities. It is fascinating to note that, when the floating restaurant was originally proposed, there was a yellow line along Stanmillis embankment that would have prevented people from parking, but when the developers decided that they want the restaurant, the line was removed.

If proper regulations are not drawn up, there will be further infringements of people's liberties and rights. I sympathise with the Minister and accept the necessity for the registration of clubs. I understand the point made by the hon. Member for Belfast, East when he said that his party would support the Minister in that respect. I query the interpretation of some of the regulations. As the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) said, the clubs in Northern Ireland are different from those in this country. It is not true that there are no working men's clubs in Northern Ireland—there are—but sporting clubs are now more prevalent, and shebeens have also become popular.

I ask the Minister about the success in policing those clubs that are closely involved with paramilitary activities. How many of such clubs have had funds sequestered and how many have been put out of business? That should be a touchstone for how we shall police these laws in the future. If we cannot implement the existing regulations, how will the new regulations be an improvement?

I query the views expressed by the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central regarding simplified accountancy. During my lifetime, I have discovered that there are many creative accountants. It is fascinating to learn that restaurateurs can cook and that accountants can cook the books. I would like to see regulations set down that make it difficult for people to mix the books as easily as the drinks—to use a mixed metaphor.

Finally, I understand the concept of the family. I return to my comments in an earlier debate about activities on a Sunday—I prefer to call it the Lord's day. I believe that Sundays were given to us to use for the common good. Many years ago it was argued speciously that football should be played on Sunday because people went shopping on Saturday. Then there was a craze for Sunday shopping, and some football returned to Saturday as the primary league was televised on Sunday.

I return to the question of policing. How do we introduce the English social environment, with the old village pub, to an entirely different cultural situation in Northern Ireland? We will destroy the family if we bring children to such places. If we are introducing laws to allow clubs to open on a Sunday afternoon so that people may watch big sporting matches, how do we explain the fact that people in Belfast have been doing that for years?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I draw the House's attention to the fact that the debate will conclude at 6.33 pm. I am sure that hon. Members want to hear the Minister answer their queries, so I ask the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) to bear that in mind.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): I understand the difficulty that the Minister faces, but our difficulties are greater. I raised the matter of time with the Minister during my last deputation to him, but he did not tell us that he intended to combine the two orders. We could have debated each order for an hour and a half. It is absolutely scandalous to conduct the debate in this manner, and the Whips Office did not inform us of the Government's intention to move the motion to facilitate that process.

It is unbecoming of the two Front-Bench spokesmen, the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and the Under–Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for North–East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), that tonight they spoke for half of the allotted time and left Back Benchers little debating time. It is a very serious matter. There are 172 pages of legislation and 22 schedules upon which we are asked to comment in a couple of minutes.

I shall not go over the ground that has been covered so ably by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). I agree with the general tone of their speeches. I ask the Minister one question: how will he deal with the planning for those premises that will be able to sell liquor? We know the difficulties faced by a public house in obtaining a licence. How will the Minister deal with the widespread clamour for liquor licences? Will there be any restrictions? What does the Minister plan to do?

My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East was absolutely right when he said that we should debate the regulations tonight. We are completely in the dark in that regard. I was amazed by the Minister's explanation when he said that he would minimise the dangers: he should try to eradicate the dangers that arise from young people buying alcohol on impulse. The Minister has not been fair to the representatives of Northern Ireland in his presentation of the legislation tonight. He spent a long time consulting about the legislation, and he should have given the people of Northern Ireland and their representatives an opportunity to debate it.

The Minister is anxious to make some sort of reply to the debate, and if I were a bad boy I would stay on my feet and talk it out. However, I shall not do that. Tonight the Minister has done the people of Northern Ireland no favours—especially in his handling of the Sabbath day issue. That has serious implications. People have differing views on the matter, but those who have spoken to me say that we need not more alcohol outlets but fewer. That should be the Minister's governing principle. There are far too many alcohol outlets and we must restrict, rather than increase, their number. By contrast, we now have an open-door approach.

I conclude by referring to the sale of alcohol in spirit grocers, which ensnared young people—particularly the working-class families of Belfast—in the chain of alcoholism. One of the first acts of the old Stormont Government was to abolish them. There was a social clean-up, and young people were freed from that awful chain. As I have told the Minister, we are returning to that situation in this legislation.

Mr. Moss: I shall obviously not have sufficient time in which to make even a small inroad into the queries that have been raised tonight. I promise to write to all hon. Members who have contributed to the debate to answer their questions.

In reply to a number of general points raised during the debate—particularly by Conservative Members—I am conscious of the contentious ingredients in the legislation, particularly regarding licensing. That is why it has taken three years to bring the legislation to the House. I welcome the general support for the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order and I thank the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley), the Opposition spokesman, for his helpful involvement in the consultation process. The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) brought people to see me to discuss the clubs order and, as a result of those representations, significant changes were made to the face of the order.

I emphasise the fact that consultation took place over a lengthy period. Although criticism has been levelled this evening at the lack of detail regarding the regulations, particularly those applying to mixed trading, I assure the House that when they are published—they are currently with our legal people—I shall send them not only to Members of Parliament from Northern Ireland but to all interested parties for comment before I commit them to the legal system. I give that promise.

We took the view that certain matters should be dealt with in the form of regulations so that we would be able to make changes at short notice if we saw that such provisions were not working in the way that we wanted.

I think that all those who have contributed to the debate have talked about mixed trading. We have made it clear that we want to achieve several objectives. We want to ensure that alcohol on sale will be kept and served within a clearly segregated area. We would, within the floor space of the supermarket, ensure that such an area was clearly defined. The area will be separated from the remainder of the shop, and access to it can be gained only by passing through some form of barrier.

Any non-alcoholic goods kept within the area must also be available elsewhere in the shop to ensure that customers do not have to go into the segregated area for non-alcoholic goods. The area will be under adult supervision at all times. It will be off limits to all persons under 18 years of age unless accompanied by an adult. The prescribed area will be situated in such a way that persons entering and leaving the shop will not have to pass through it. We shall be giving close attention to the provision of designated tills to ensure adherence to the tight regulations that we propose.

Some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), spoke of spirit grocers. The accusation has been made that the liberalisation of the law in the licensing order will lead to a proliferation of outlets selling alcohol. It has been suggested that there will be a shop on every corner selling alcohol. I wish to make it clear that that cannot happen, for two reasons.

First, if a licence were to be obtained from the court, need must be justified. In other words, there should be inadequate provision in a locality before a licence is granted. Secondly, and most important—I am grateful for the support given by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson)—we have not removed the requirement of surrender. Accordingly, there is a finite number of licences to allow alcohol to be sold in Northern Ireland. That number cannot increase. Corner shops will be able to obtain licences to sell alcohol only if other licences elsewhere are surrendered. A licence is trading at about £40,000, and is used by many off-licences as security at the bank for loans. That being so, I do not believe that what we propose will lead to many shops taking up licences to sell alcohol.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [1 November].

The House proceeded to a Division:—

Rev. Ian Paisley (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Are we to vote separately on the orders, which were put together? Are they to be voted on separately in the order in which they appear on the Order Paper?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's question is whether we are to vote separately on each of the orders. Is that right?

Rev. Ian Paisley: Yes. The first order deals with the registration of clubs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Rev. Ian Paisley: We shall be dividing the House on the second order. Given the way that the orders were called, we can do nothing else.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is, motion No. 2. I think the Ayes have it.

6.46 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): May I first of all welcome the fact that you in particular, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are in the Chair for the Adjournment debate tonight, because, although I appreciate that you will be totally neutral in chairing the debate, I want to express my personal appreciation for the work that you have done as a constituency Member on a number of the issues to which I shall refer tonight. I also express my personal appreciation to my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett), who hopes to catch your eye. I am grateful for his support in staying behind to speak in this important debate.

It is customary at the outset of Adjournment debates to express appreciation for being granted the debate, and although I am most grateful for the opportunity to raise this subject, it is a matter of great concern to me that once again I find it necessary to have to draw the attention of the House to the considerable public disquiet over what is happening in the health service in the Wakefield metropolitan district.

When a similar Adjournment debate took place on 3 April this year, the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), the Minister who is here again tonight, remarked that that was the seventh occasion in five months that I had raised the subject in the Chamber. I take no pleasure whatever in reminding him that this is the sixth separate Adjournment debate that I have had on health issues in Wakefield in my time in the House, and I have, as he knows, been forced to raise my concerns in numerous other debates and at Question Time, including Tuesday of this week.

I have found it necessary to speak so often because, throughout my time in the House, the health service in my area has appeared to be stumbling from one crisis to another, without strategy, direction or purpose. I make it clear that I do not blame in any way those dedicated people who are involved in the front-line services in the national health service in Wakefield. We are very fortunate to have in our area some of the best general practitioners, hospital consultants, doctors, nursing and ancillary staff. Most of them believe as strongly as I do in the basic principles of the NHS, but they are deeply demoralised by the consequences of Government health policy in Wakefield and the complete lack of any clear vision for the future.

Those people will have been as angry as I was to hear the Prime Minister say only this week that the service "is now being properly managed".

If the situation were not so serious, they would have laughed at his assertion that, as a result of this "proper management",

"money is being allocated to where it should go."

Let met set out the background to the current merger proposals. The Minister knows as well as I do that the local health managers in Wakefield have, for some considerable time, faced an impossible situation in attempting to meet growing demands with resources that have not only failed to match that growth but been skewed by deliberate Government policy away from the areas of greatest need.

In previous debates, I have drawn attention to the fact that Wakefield health authority is the biggest loser in the whole of the Northern and Yorkshire region of the NHS as a consequence of the changed national funding formula being introduced in the current financial year, under which it is regarded as some £4.5 million overfunded.

According to a letter that I have received this week from the chair of the Wakefield health authority, Mrs. Ann Bolter, the health authority is facing a projected deficit of £2,225,000 based on the estimated expenditure for the year compared with budgets. I am told that the underlying projected deficit for the authority for 1996-97 is £1.7 million and that, in preparing the budget, the health authority agreed to overcommit resources by £3.3 million to cope with increasing demands and pressure from the trusts locally for more resources.

Therefore, there is a total over-commitment of £5 million and Mrs. Bolter states in her letter that the authority will have to look for further funding in 1997-98 in addition to identifying further savings from reduced management costs and the reconfiguration of services. I shall come to what is called the reconfiguration of services, but the Minister should be aware that overall funding is not the only problem.

The Prime Minister's assertion that money is particularly off target in Wakefield. Fundholding has created serious financial problems for the hospitals and a clear two-tier system of local treatment, to which I have referred on several occasions previously. I did a calculation in the last financial year based on the figures of fundholding surpluses supplied to me by the Wakefield health authority, which showed an interesting correlation between those surpluses in general practice and local hospital deficits. Therefore, the Wakefield health authority has an over-commitment of £5 million and the main provider hospital for my constituents and some of those of my hon. Friends who represent other constituencies in the Wakefield metropolitan district, Pinderfields, faced a deficit in the last financial year of £3.16 million.

"is being allocated to where it should go"—[Official Report, 5 November 1996; Vol. 284, c. 1031.]

The Minister has, I know, seen the letter sent to me and my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) on 16 July by Dr. R. L. Smith, the medical secretary of the Wakefield local medical committee regarding the seriousness of the situation facing Pinderfields hospital in particular. I remind him that the letter stated:

"We can no longer deliver a 'safe' service for your constituents with the cake you give to the NHS."

As the chair of the Wakefield health authority has admitted, what is termed a reconfiguration of services is seen as perhaps the only way of substantially addressing those serious problems. My particular concern is that the supposed public consultation process being undertaken on the proposed merger of the two acute trusts in Wakefield metropolitan district is fundamentally dishonest in not explaining to local people the real agenda of service reconfiguration that is being considered at present.

On Tuesday, during Health questions, the Minister referred to the fact that I was personally critical of the original establishment of three separate and competing third wave trusts within the Wakefield metropolitan district. I made it clear at the time that I believed that a health market would undermine strategic planning in health care and be wasteful of scarce resources. As the consultation document on the proposed merger makes clear, all my fears have, sadly, materialised and, if anything, the situation has become even worse than I originally envisaged.

The dishonesty of the consultation document relates to its avoidance of the key question of what the service reconfiguration will mean to my constituents and those of my hon. Friends representing the users of Pinderfields hospital, Wakefield, and Pontefract general infirmary. Page 8 of the consultation document states that the merger proposal and consultation processes

"do not relate to any proposal to relocate services across the district."

It goes on to say

"such proposals would be the responsibility of Wakefield Health Authority to develop and consult upon."

The Minister is well aware that, several weeks ago, the consultation process being undertaken by the two acute trusts concerned with the merger was stopped and passed to the health authority to continue. No one has offered me a formal explanation for that. The Minister did not answer the point on Tuesday when I questioned him at Question Time, but I expect a full explanation from him tonight.

Regardless of the reasons for that development, as the matter is now formally in the hands of the health authority, in accordance with what is said in the consultation document, my constituents and those of my hon. Friends and yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, now expect to be informed exactly what is proposed in relation to the relocation of services. The original excuse of this being a matter for the health authority will not wash, as the consultation process is now being handled by the health authority itself.

The Minister will recall that, in my contribution during the previous debate on the subject, in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth and in meetings and in correspondence that my hon. Friends, including yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I have had with the Secretary of State, we have consistently pressed for a wider review of health care in Wakefield prior to any decision being made on a trust merger.

Our central criticism of the current proposal, apart from the attempt to camouflage a rationalisation agenda, is that it is a piecemeal, panic measure, designed temporarily to stem the tide of huge funding problems, which does not look any further at key questions of direct relevance to Wakefield's problems. It does not touch on the enormous implications of radical changes being introduced in the operation of general practice in our area, which will clearly impact upon acute provision, and it in no way anticipates the likely changes in primary and community care. The four Members of Parliament for the area were astonished to learn from the community trust's chief executive and chair that they had not even been consulted before the formulation of merger proposals by the two acute trusts.

Bearing in mind those points and the fact that the Wakefield health authority is now responsible for the remainder of the merger consultation process, I found it interesting, to say the least, to learn this week that, in the agenda for its monthly meeting, the Wakefield health authority was considering a paper proposing

"an urgent review of acute service provision within the district."

The authority's report says:

"This work is likely to take at least six months to complete, and will be a completely separate exercise to the consultation process on Trust mergers . . . The process will enable a thorough consideration of strategic options for the future provision of acute services and in particular will take account of the drive towards a primary care led NHS."

We are promised yet another so-called public consultation process in the summer of 1997.

The Minister must accept that proceeding with merger proposals prior to such a review of acute services is putting the cart before the horse in a highly irresponsible way. I suspect that key personnel at Wakefield health authority, some of whom I know reasonably well and respect, know that to be the case, but they have been told to get the merger out of the way by the Northern and Yorkshire region. That is not good enough, and the Minister knows it. I want him to give a clear undertaking to block further progress on the merger proposals, and to tie them in with the wider review of acute provision that will be held in the new year.

I also want the Minister to give me a detailed explanation of the reasons for the resignation last week of Mr. Roy Cusworth, the chair of the Pinderfields trust. I wrote to the chair of the Northern and Yorkshire region, Mr. John Greetham, asking for an explanation. His reply of 1 November states:

"Roy Cusworth did not offer his resignation but decided for personal and business reasons that he did not wish to offer himself for re-appointment."

I believe that Mr. Cusworth was forced to resign, and we have a right to know why. The Minister must understand that the removal of the chair of the trust in that way has created considerable tensions at Pinderfields hospital. The consultants at that hospital met on Monday night, and have advised me through the chair of the hospital medical committee, Mr. Oliver Fenton, of their serious concern about yet another upheaval at Pinderfields, the purpose of which no one can understand. As the Minister will probably know, representatives of the Pinderfields consultants are to see the chief executive of the Northern and Yorkshire region next week to seek urgent reassurances on the position of Pinderfields, especially in the context of the proposed merger.

I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have serious anxieties about the future of Pontefract general infirmary if the merger goes through. I share your concerns and determination to defend the interests of the users of that hospital. In the light of recent events, I have fears for the future of Pinderfields.

Following the transfer of regional neurosurgery provision from Pinderfields to Leeds, I strongly fear that it will lose other regional specialisms, such as plastic burns and spinal injuries. It is common knowledge that certain senior consultants at Pinderfields are being head-hunted by the Leeds trusts, and that St. James's, with a deficit of £8 million, and Leeds general infirmary, with a deficit of £7 million, are desperate for the additional revenue that further regional specialisms would attract.

Clearly, the situation in Leeds and the outcome of the recent health review have an important bearing on health provision, especially regional specialisms, in other parts of west Yorkshire. I fear that, particularly since the demise of the Yorkshire regional health authority, there has been little, if any, attempt to interfere with the operation of naked market forces and the obvious ambitions of the Leeds trusts. I assume that that approach has the Government's blessing, but the logical consequence will be the reduction of Pinderfields hospital and Pontefract general infirmary to the status of cottage hospitals, as all the key specialisms would be concentrated in Leeds.

A merged acute trust in Wakefield may offer a much-needed short-term financial fix, but without the wider strategic review for which my hon. Friends and I have persistently pressed, the future direction of health care in Wakefield metropolitan district will be uncertain, leaving our services wide open to predators. The health authority recognised that fact, and the acute review proposed this week makes obvious sense, but beyond keeping the lid on things until the general election, it makes no sense for regional officials to insist on the separation of this process from the merger debate. I hope that the Minister has listened carefully to the points that I have made, and that he will respond positively to them.

Mr. Jon Trickett (Hemsworth): I wish to associate myself with the remarks that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) made about you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and about the high quality of the staff—clinicians and managers—employed in the health service in the Wakefield area.

Until recently, I was a publicly elected representative in a major city—Leeds. I was closely involved with the Leeds health service for a considerable time. We had two relatively robust general hospitals, albeit within a flawed health care structure. Since being elected to represent Hemsworth, I have been dismayed to discover the fragile state of the health service in our district.

My constituents come within the catchment areas of Pontefract and Pinderfields hospitals. I can therefore express an overall view of the services provided right across the district. The NHS provision in the area suffers from a series of structural problems, which, taken together, produce a service in serious crisis. In no particular order, I shall identify seven structural problems.

First, the continued underfunding of the service in our area has been compounded by the recent changes to the funding formula. That means that our district is to lose several millions of pounds a year, and is certainly the worst loser in the region. Secondly, there is a lack of recognition in the funding formula of the problems that arise from trying to apply a uniform health service across such a heterogeneous set of communities as there is in our district.

The third structural problem is the acute fragmentation—almost a disintegration—of the health institutions in our district. There is clear evidence of a breakdown of confidence between the health providers: the two acute trusts and the community health trust. As Members of Parliament for the district, my hon. Friends and I have been informed of the extraordinary allegations that have been made by people in one or other of those organisations against their colleagues.

Fourthly, that fragmentation has been seriously exacerbated by the effects of the internal market. There is evidence of what can only be regarded as irresponsible poaching by each of the trusts from the others, and by trusts outside the district. More serious still is the impact of the extension of GP fundholding in the Wakefield district, to a point where every practice is part of the fundholding system, thereby achieving twice the national average level of GP fundholding. The impact of that extension of fundholding is not yet fully understood, but it is already having a serious effect on the acute trusts.

In my constituency, at least two practices have constructed, without proper planning, what can only be described as mini-hospitals, which are taking services away from the existing acute trusts. It is widely believed that services are being purchased by GP fundholders in our district from hospitals as far away as Manchester and Glasgow. I have been informed of patients being sent by taxi to hospitals in Manchester for minor ophthalmic operations. I have been told of one patient who was taken by taxi to Manchester airport and flown to Glasgow for a relatively minor operation that was paid for by a local GP fundholder.

The fifth problem is that the health service in the area suffers to a degree from regional imbalances. The presence of big neighbours, such as Leeds, inevitably causes problems for smaller hospital trusts. The sixth problem is the general morale in the district, which, as in the rest of the country, is now poor. Hospital trusts are suffering from major problems of recruitment and retention of key staff.

The seventh problem is the lack of leadership among those who have been appointed to give directions to the health service in our area. In Pinderfields, both the chief executive and, now, the chair of the trust appear to have been removed without adequate public explanation, and with no private explanation to any of us who represent the area. I am led to believe by a senior individual in the Pontefract region that the chair of the trust there is likely to be reappointed only for a single year. Can anyone—such as the Minister—explain why such action is being taken? Why was the Pinderfields chair removed recently, and why was the chief executive removed? We have been given no explanations about that, or about why the unusual procedure of establishing a single-year appointment has apparently been adopted.

My exposition of those seven structural problems may not constitute a comprehensive description of all the difficulties facing our area's health service, and not everyone may share my analysis; but it is clear that nearly everyone who is interested in the health service in our area believes that the service faces serious difficulties. Anyone who doubts that should read this week's edition of The Independent on Sunday, which draws attention to the extraordinary fact that a whole ward of nurses has been privatised. It is understood that this is the first time that nursing for a whole ward has been put out to tender. That must be regarded as a step towards privatisation of the health service, either by stealth or, possibly, by incompetence.

The answer from those responsible for the health service in the area has been wholly inadequate. They have been unequal to the task, tackling only one symptom of the problem rather than the multiple causes. To suggest that we can solve all the problems to which I have alluded, and others as well, simply by merging two acute trusts is a grotesquely inadequate response that fails to recognise the scale of the crisis. Indeed, such a response does not address one of the structural problems that I have described. It disappoints by its lack of ambition; it was also badly bungled, and the manner in which it was executed was arguably illegal, or at least outside the law. If it was not illegal, it was certainly unethical.

How could anyone seriously believe that the public consultation could be conducted properly and transparently by individuals who not only were the authors of the merger proposals but were actively advocating the cause of the merger during that consultation—and, moreover, appeared likely to benefit from the merger? No one could have confidence in a public consultation exercise undertaken in such a way.

Particularly extraordinary is the fact that, when the views of local residents and health care users were supposedly being obtained at public meetings, members of the project team did not merely attend those meetings to provide information but advocated the proposals—and then commented on and participated in a debate that was taking place, supposedly, among health care users. Even more extraordinary, they then proceeded to vote.

At a meeting in Upton, in my constituency, an extraordinary event took place. Every member of the public who was present voted against the merger; every one of the seven votes in favour came from one of those who had been brought along by, or were apparently connected in some way with, the project team who had been charged with consulting the public. It is bizarre, surely, that one of the principal architects of the proposal for a merger, a senior executive on one of the trusts and a member of the board, was actually found to be voting in favour of a merger about which he was supposedly consulting the public.

Will the Minister now tell the House why the public consultation exercise was aborted—why it was handed over to the district health authority, and removed from the project team? I have received no explanation; indeed, I have received no information that such a change has taken place. I understand that no other local Member of Parliament has been told that a new round of public consultation has been taking place. I consider that a fundamental error. Perhaps it will be explored in other places.

Public consultation about the merger has produced overwhelming hostility from the people of the area. Other than those with vested interests in the outcome of the proposal, no significant represented body or elected individual throughout the Wakefield district—as far as I am aware—has been found to favour it. The proposal was cooked up behind closed doors, and no one has yet made an admission to Members of Parliament representing the district about who first came up with the idea.

What we do know about the mystery is that primary care providers were certainly not consulted at the time. Surely it is outrageous that the community health trust in particular—on which the merger will have a direct bearing—was not consulted when the proposal was being drafted. It is also apparent from first-hand accounts given to me—and others—by local general practitioners that they were not consulted, either. Moreover, we know that the district health authority was not directly involved in the drafting of the proposal. Finally, it appears that the consultants were not involved in the conceptual stages, either individually or as a body.

Who sponsored the original suggestion, if it was not the clinicians and those responsible for the direct provision of care? It seems that the whole train of events was concocted by Department of Health officials, whose primary motivations were financial and administrative rather than clinical. There is also evidence that those same administrators had been conducting discussions with developers about a private finance initiative in relation to the district hospitals, concurrently with preparations to seek the trust merger. Indeed, one of the chairs of the hospital trusts let the cat out of the bag to local Members of Parliament when he informed us that a named private sector developer—we know the name—had requested that the discussions about the PFI in the Wakefield area in relation to the hospitals be put on ice until the proposal had been agreed.

The Secretary of State had suggested to the district Members of Parliament that he would judge any merger proposal on the basis of improvement in clinical care; yet we know that the basis of the merger document about which we are now being consulted was financial and administrative rather than clinical. Indeed, the whole thrust of the document is based on non-clinical considerations. It could not be otherwise, given the way in which the merger proposal itself originated.

Hon. Members will search the document in vain for any detailed proposal about clinical changes. A reading of the document, taken together with discussions with practising hospital clinicians, leads to the conclusion that the reconfiguration of clinical services that is implied—but not made explicit—in the merger document will be revealed only subsequent to any decision to merge. That is clearly putting the cart before the horse. Changes in the structure of the NHS should follow clinical change, not vice versa.

A reconfiguration of the services is inevitable if a merger takes place, as we all know; yet the public have no idea what the new configuration will look like. Notwithstanding that, they are still being required to express their views during the current flawed public consultation exercise.

Although those who manage the health service in the district have not been prepared to come clean about the new configuration, I think that it is possible to guess its likely shape. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, here is my own educated guess about the likely shape of the health service in the district within a few years, given that the merger proceeds and assuming the continuation of the financing regime of the current Conservative Government.

I guess that a single privately owned acute hospital—possibly on neither of the two existing sites, and clearly geographically and clinically remote from the communities that I represent—will have emerged. Statutory ratios will have changed, and the terms and conditions of staff employment contracts will have been renegotiated. Indeed, secret discussions with the trade unions are already taking place on those matters.

The clinical services will have been transferred—sometimes out of the district entirely—and frequently devolved to fundholding practices. Already existing tensions with other health providers will be exacerbated and the community health trust's future will be placed in jeopardy. Heaven knows what will happen in the case of statutory duties of care that are owed to certain vulnerable groups. I understand that, in some cases, those duties have already been transferred out of the district to other providers.

That is not the right outcome for our district. I do not accept that the current modus operandi in relation to the consultations is valid in determining the district's needs. What is required is a halt to the merger proposal until such time as a major review, of the type described by my hon. Friend, takes into account both health needs and the district's institutional structures, dealing with, among other points, the seven problems that I outlined.

I hope that the Minister will deal with our request for an overall review and, even at this late stage, put on ice the merger discussions until we can identify the long-term future of health care, which all our citizens would dearly love to be of the best.

7.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). I congratulate him on again securing time to debate a subject that is linked to health services in Wakefield—in this case, the proposed merger between Pinderfields hospital and Pontefract general infirmary trusts. He said that this is the sixth time during this Parliament that he has raised a Wakefield health services matter in an Adjournment debate. Indeed, it is better than that. It is the fourth time since January 1995, which must be a record. I also note the interest of the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett) in the subject. I associate myself with the tribute that the hon. Member for Wakefield paid to the front-line staff in Wakefield, who, I have every evidence, do a first-class job on behalf of the people in the Wakefield region.

I listened to the concerns of the hon. Member for Wakefield and his case in favour of halting the trust merger consultation. He may be trying, however, to link two separate issues: the management of the acute trusts at Pontefract and Pinderfields and delivery of services. The proposal under discussion in Wakefield and in Pontefract is to merge two trusts or, to be more exact, to dissolve two trusts and create a new one. That proposal is to change the management structure of national health service trusts in Wakefield. It is not, I repeat, a proposal to change services.

I am told that the proposal has strong clinical involvement, and there is said to be clinical support for it. Separately, Wakefield health authority has recently announced that it will shortly reconsider its health strategy and will hold separate public consultation at the appropriate time next year.

Mr. Hinchliffe: The Minister has listened to my explanation, and to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett), of the acute financial difficulties facing health care providers in Wakefield. Does he accept that it is a complete waste of scarce public resources to have, yet again, a public consultation, when that consultation will deal with exactly the issues about which we are concerned in the current consultation on merger?

Mr. Horam: That is a matter for the local health authority. Clearly I am in the position, in effect, of an independent person waiting to adjudicate on these matters, when and if they come to me.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I apologise for intervening again.

My intelligence on this issue is that Wakefield health authority will be happy to conduct the public consultation on the merger alongside this wider review, but it has been prevented from having the review of acute services by the regional executive of the NHS. Common sense would suggest that the health authority would want to do that, so the Government are stepping in to prevent it from proceeding in that direction.

Mr. Horam: That is not my information, which is, as the hon. Gentleman knows, that a separate consultation is taking place on the merger and that, recently—certainly well after the consultation on the merger began—the health authority said that it wished to reconsider the acute side of its health strategy. That is the chronological order in which things have happened. Therefore, it would be strange for the health authority to merge the two things, having separated them to begin with. I am surprised at what the hon. Gentleman says.

Mr. Trickett: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: The hon. Gentleman will know that this is the debate of the hon. Member for Wakefield, and I want to continue a little further.

Separately, as I have said, Wakefield health authority has recently announced that it will shortly reconsider the acute side of its health strategy consultation and will hold separate public consultation at the appropriate time next year. If I can come to the point raised by the hon. Members for Hemsworth and for Wakefield, it is set out in law that the Secretary of State for Health is required to consult on proposals to establish a new NHS trust. The trust project team asked for local views with the intention of passing them to the Secretary of State. The process began in July and lasted until 22 October. It was soon realised, however, that more was needed to fulfil statutory consultation requirements. That is why the health authority decided to extend the consultation.

The health authority was asked to consult on behalf of the Secretary of State and the consultation period was therefore extended. That has meant that consultation will take longer than it might otherwise have done. The extra consultation period, however, will not be wasted. All the views expressed during both consultation periods will be passed to the NHS executive and, ultimately, to Ministers. The extension has also allowed more time for local people to advance their views—in fact, it has almost doubled the time, as I told the hon. Member for Wakefield earlier this week at Question Time.

After the consultation period has ended in January, the decision whether to merge the two trusts will be taken by Ministers. As I have emphasised, at this stage we must take an independent view of all the proposals that are referred to us. Many factors need to be taken into account when considering such a proposal. We will consider carefully both the adequacy of the consultation process and local people's views, which the hon. Member for Wakefield has stressed are so important. We will also consider the likely impact on the effectiveness, efficiency and accessibility of the potential creation of a new trust. Accessibility was referred to particularly by the hon. Member for Hemsworth, whose constituency adjoins Wakefield.

Any potential economies of scale will have to be balanced against any possible loss of patient choice. Ministers are rightly enjoined to take into account that mixture of considerations when considering the results of consultation. Until all the facts are before us, clearly we cannot comment, beyond saying that we will take it all into the account.

I understand that the hon. Member for Wakefield believes that the consultation on a proposed trust merger is already, in effect, a fait accompli. I assure him that that is absolutely not true. We have a statutory responsibility to consult publicly. Ministers need sufficient information to be able to judge the proposed merger for the value it may or may not have, and the adequacy of the consultation process that has taken place.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the "resignation" of the chairman of the Pinderfields trust, Mr. Roy Cusworth. It is more accurate to say that his period of office as trust chairman ended on 31 October, as the hon. Gentleman knows. Mr. Cusworth did not seek renewal of his appointment. He has, as the hon. Gentleman knows, other business commitments to pursue.

It should be said on Mr. Cusworth's behalf that he leaves behind an able acting chairman and a trust that has recruited 25 new consultants since 1993. The trust has transformed the quality of its treatment for elderly people and has developed a centre for enhanced eye surgery, and Pinderfields and Pontefract hospitals are already co-operating with Dewsbury district hospital to provide an integrated clinical haematology service locally and for a wider population. That is a considerable achievement under Mr. Cusworth's chairmanship, and we should give him due credit for that.

At Health questions earlier this week, the hon. Gentleman and I talked about the "Cook" test, after the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). The test was: will organisational change lead to better service? I have no doubt that it has led to better services in Wakefield.

The hon. Member for Hemsworth criticised the agency nurses who had possibly been brought to man a ward, but surely he agrees that it is a flexible way of manning a new ward when an extra ward is needed. We are talking about an extra facility for elderly people so that the local trust can manage resources effectively during the coming winter and have additional facilities available for elderly people. We are talking about additional facilities. Surely the hon. Gentleman is not against that.

I recognise that Pinderfields hospital trust is facing a complex set of interdependent issues. The ultimate goal is to ensure that sustainable high-quality and cost-effective clinical services are provided in modern facilities. Although the consultation on the proposed merger of the two trusts and, separately, the configuration of health services will take time, those processes should ensure that whatever solution emerges is based on informed debate among the public and the professions.

The hon. Member for Wakefield suggested that the merger proposals should be stopped or combined with a review of health services in Wakefield. In view of his great knowledge of and interest in the matter, he will recall that not long ago Wakefield health authority undertook a detailed consultation on its five-year health strategy. In fact, it was in 1994, and the health strategy was published as recently as March last year. The document covers the needs of everyone in the Wakefield metropolitan district council area. More than 1,000 copies of the full document were issued locally and regionally. A further 125,000 copies of the summary were printed, most of which were issued through the free press. The remainder were handed out at various local events throughout the district.

Representatives of Wakefield health authority also spoke about the strategy to a large number of local groups, as well as holding meetings with the three local national health service trusts and the two community health councils in Wakefield and Pontefract. Those meetings certainly included one with local Members of Parliament. It is worth stressing that Wakefield's health strategy discussed how health services in Wakefield will be shaped over the next five years. It also examined the need for a strategic shift to primary care. Local general practitioners were closely involved in the process.

We are talking about a considered, strategic examination of the health needs of the people of Wakefield. Nevertheless, the health authority plans to revisit and review that part of its health strategy relating to acute health services. I welcome the fact that the hon. Gentleman said that it was sensible to do that. There are plans to take that forward in the near future. The process is likely to take about six months, and I am assured that it will involve detailed discussions with clinicians and general practitioners and active participation by the two community health councils. Public consultation will follow later in 1997. Judging by the number of debates that we have had—and your own interest, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I have no doubt that local Members of Parliament will be fully and actively involved in the process.

I am grateful for having had this opportunity to respond to the debate. We share the determination of the hon. Member for Wakefield to ensure that high-quality treatment and care continue to be available to people in the Wakefield area. I am absolutely sure that Wakefield health authority, as well as the trusts in the Wakefield and Pontefract area, shares that commitment. Whether a merger of the two trusts in Wakefield will assist in that process is a matter on which I shall keep an open mind until the statutory consultation is completed in January, and the results are known.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-eight minutes to Eight o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent report by Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary on the specialist operations department of the Metropolitan police. [229]

Mr. Maclean: Yes. I have today placed in the Library a note of the recommendations from the report, together with the Commissioner's responses and the police authority responses, which take into account the advice my right hon. and learned Friend and I have received from the Metropolitan police committee.

Immigration Laws

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the outcome of the programme of work arising from the scrutiny of enforcement of immigration laws which he announced on 18 July 1996. [230]

Miss Widdecombe: The programme of work announced by my right hon. and learned Friend in July 1995 was designed to implement the findings of an efficiency scrutiny which examined ways in which the Government as a whole could work more effectively to strengthen immigration control and to prevent those temporarily or illegally in this country from receiving state benefits to which they should not be entitled.

I am pleased to say that the scrutiny process is now complete. It has successfully:

- created a coherent legal framework which bars immigration offenders and temporary visitors from access to important and expensive benefits such as child benefit, family credit and publicly subsidised housing assistance;
- made it an offence under the immigration laws for temporary visitors to have unauthorised recourse to public funds;
- established a general policy on the identification of persons subject to immigration control who claim benefits or services to which they are not entitled through the revision of departmental instructions, the production of a guidance booklet and the opening of the immigration and nationality directorate's status inquiry service to more registered users;
- strengthened the arrangements, within existing data protection legislation, for the exchange of information between Government Departments, agencies and local authorities in order more effectively to administer benefits policy and more quickly to identify and locate immigration offenders. A copy of a circular about the exchange of information with IND issued to local authorities has been placed in the Library.

Exchanges of information with IND are all conducted within the provisions of the data protection laws. The Commission for Racial Equality has been consulted about proposals on which its advice was important to ensure the maintenance of good race relations in this country. The measures taken have laid the basis for anticipated public expenditure savings of over £100 million in the next three years. They will strengthen our immigration control and will greatly reduce the incentives for those seeking to enter or remain unlawfully in the United Kingdom.

Some of the work is incomplete because it will necessarily stretch beyond the normal time limits of the scrutiny process. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is considering linking eligibility for both student awards and home fee status classification to those who are lawfully settled in the United Kingdom under the immigration laws. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is considering better ways to identify those persons from abroad who are not eligible for free medical treatment. Such work will be taken forward by the Departments concerned.

The Government believe that it is wrong that people who are admitted to this country on the basis that they can provide for themselves or who are here illegally should receive benefits paid for by the taxes of lawful residents. The measures we have now taken and the work currently in hand will see that they do not.

ENVIRONMENT

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the Building Research Establishment. [388]

Mr. Gummer: On 2 October, the Construction Industry Council sent to me the business plan developed by the construction industry for a national centre for construction, thus meeting the deadline I set out in my reply of 2 April to a question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones). I am grateful for the work the industry's representatives have put into the preparation of this plan which I have considered very carefully, but I have concluded that it does not provide a satisfactory basis on which to enter a single tender negotiation to transfer BRE to the private sector. As I advised the House of 2 April, my next option is to privatise BRE through a competitive sale. I am therefore putting in hand at once the action necessary to seek tenders.

Petrol Vapour Recovery

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in implementing in the United Kingdom the European Commission stage 1 petrol vapour recovery directive. [652]

Mr. Clappison: We are laying regulations in Parliament today, under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, to implement the EC directive (94/63/EC) on the control of volatile organic compound emissions resulting from the storage of petrol and its distribution from terminals to service stations. These are important measures which aim to reduce emissions of the volatile organic compounds which contribute to the formation of ground level ozone.

The directive requires the fitting and use of equipment, in the distribution and storage of petrol, which is designed to capture and recover petrol vapours rather than venting them into the air as at present. The provisions of the directive will be implemented in a phased programme running through to 2004.

The Government have decided to apply a derogation in the directive which exempts from its provisions small service stations in areas where emissions are unlikely to contribute significantly to environmental or health problems.

The regulations laid today include a map showing the areas in which the derogation will apply to new small service stations. These are in rural areas in the northern half of Scotland where petrol vapour emissions do not contribute significantly to ozone formation and ground level ozone is not itself a problem. The directive applied immediately to any proposals for new service stations which are not eligible for the derogation.

The provisions of the directive do not apply to existing small service stations until 2004. The areas in which the derogation will be applied to these stations will be defined closer to that date, using the best scientific information then available.

Legislation to implement the directive with regard to petrol tankers was introduced in August in amendments to the Carriage of Dangerous Goods Regulations.

Direct Labour and Direct Service Organisations

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further action he proposes to take against those local authorities whose direct labour and direct service organisations failed to meet their statutory financial objectives in 1994–95. [653]

Sir Paul Beresford: On 30 July this year, 22 statutory notices were served on 17 local authorities concerning the failure of their direct labour and service organisations to meet the required financial objectives in 1994–95, and one notice was served on an authority for submitting a qualified account for work which it was carrying out. My right hon. Friend has now considered the responses to those notices, and has decided to give 16 directions to 12 local authorities.

The directions take the following forms:

Restricting the type of work the authority can carry out, and preventing the authority from carrying out any part of the wor', if it fails to meet the financial objective in 1996–97 or 1997–98:

The London borough of Brent (building maintenance).

Preventing the authority from carrying out the work if it fails to meet the financial objective in 1997–98 or 1998–99:

Great Yarmouth borough council (grounds maintenance).

Preventing the authority from carrying out the work if it fails to submit unqualified accounts in 1995–96 or 1996–97:

Mid Devon district council (building maintenance).

Requiring authorities to retender the work and to seek the consent of the Secretary of State if proposing to award the work in-house:

Amber Valley district council (refuse collection), Harborough district council (grounds maintenance), Stockton on Tees borough council (vehicle maintenance).

Requiring authorities to retender work if they fail to meet the financial objective in specified years, and to seek the Secretary of State's consent where the work has to be retendered and where the authority subsequently wish to award work in-house:

1996–97 and 1997–98: Knowlsey MBC (highways and sewers), Rossendale borough council (highways and sewers), The London borough of Tower Hamlets (building maintenance).

1997–98 and 1998–99: Rotherham MBC (grounds maintenance).

The Secretary of State has also decided to take no further statutory action in respect of financial failure in 1994–95 by:

Bedfordshire county council (vehicle maintenance), Cambridge city council (building cleaning, refuse collection, other cleaning), Chorley borough council (highways and sewers), Halton borough council (vehicle maintenance) and North East Derbyshire district council (refuse collection).

To date, 67 notices have been served by the Department on 47 local authorities for losses incurred by their DLOs/DSOs in 1994–95, and one notice served on an authority for producing qualified accounts. Today's decisions follow those announced on 13 May and 20 June this year, and complete the programme of financial failure action in relation to 1994–95 accounts.

This action demonstrates our commitment to protect the interests of local taxpayers, and ensure that they receive value for money services from their local authorities. Where authorities' in-house teams have failed to achieve their financial targets, and where they do not seem to have taken the steps necessary to bring about an improvement in their performance, we will not hesitate to take statutory action.

Environment Council

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council on 15 October. [654]

Mr. Clappison: Together with my noble friend the Earl of Lindsay I represented the UK at the Environment Council in Luxembourg on 15 October.

Policy debates were held on the review of the fifth environment action programme and on the proposals to revise directive 90/219 on the contained use of genetically modified micro-organisms. In each case, the Council is expected to reach agreement in December. There were also useful discussions on the "auto-oil" proposals, the proposals for a revision of the drinking water directive and on the review of the Community waste management strategy.

The Council agreed conclusions on the EU position for the third conference of the parties to the convention on biological diversity. The Council noted a report from the presidency on the progress which is being made on the negotiation of a protocol to the UN framework convention on climate change and on a framework agreement on humane trapping standards.

TREASURY

Economic and Finance Ministers Council

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the recent Council meeting of the Economic and Finance Ministers of the European Union. [190]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I represented the UK at the Economic and Finance Council—ECOFIN—of the European Union in Brussels on 14 October.

The Council considered a Commission report on guarantee arrangements for lending outside the Union by the European investment bank. The main issues discussed were the coverage and level of the guarantees on EIB lending provided by the loan guarantee fund and the proportion of lending on which the EIB should find third party guarantees—that is, guarantees which do not fall on the EU budget or member states. No final agreement was reached, and this item will be taken again at a future ECOFIN meeting.

Over lunch, EU Finance Ministers met EFTA Finance Ministers to discuss employment policy. A joint communique was issued which emphasised the need for macro-economic frameworks to support strong and sustainable economic growth, prudent budget policies and joint efforts further to implement the single market.

Commissioner Monti presented the Commission's work programme on VAT. Over the period to 2000, the Commission plans to bring forward a series of proposals to overhaul the current EC VAT arrangements to allow tax authorities to collect revenue and tackle tax avoidance with greater certainty. There was no discussion of this item.

The Council noted the report of the high-level working group on trans-European networks. This report rules out extra funding for TENs by a revision to the financial perspective and instead concludes that every effort should be made to remove all non-financial delaying factors.

Labour Market Statistics

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes to labour market statistics the director of the Office for National Statistics will introduce following the Steel report; and if he will make a statement. [191]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The director of the Office for National Statistics has conducted wide-ranging consultation on the Steel report both inside and outside Government. This showed some support for monthly publication of employment and unemployment and estimates from the labour force survey, but also doubts about whether the additional £7 million to £8 million annual cost of redesigned and enlarged survey represented value for money. An alternative option, costing an additional sum of around £200,000 a year, was also considered based on monthly publication of three–month rolling average estimates from the existing quarterly survey. The benefits of this in terms of informing macro-economic debate could, however, be diminished by potential problems of misunderstanding estimates which related not to individual months but to rolling three–month periods.

Accordingly, ONS will retain the current quarterly frequency of publication for the LFS. The Government have, however, accepted the recommendation, in the Employment Select Committee's report on unemployment and employment, that greater prominence should be given to the results from the existing quarterly LFS. ONS will be developing proposals for enhancing the dissemination strategy used for the survey in order to achieve this aim.

Further details are set out in the Government's response to the Employment Committee's report sent earlier to its successor, the Education and Employment Committee.

Share Trading (Stamp Duty)

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the progress of his proposals for stamp duty on share trading. [192]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I announced on 24 July 1996 that I intended to replace the current stamp duty on exemptions for market makers and broker dealers on the London stock exchange with a new relief for purchases made on any UK recognised investment exchange or European Economic Area regulated market by any firm fulfilling the role of intermediary on that exchange. The new regime would apply to all UK shares on which stamp duty is levied. Following detailed consultation by the Treasury over the last three months, I have now decided that it is not necessary to confine the relief available to intermediaries to purchases which are offset by sales within a given period. The introduction of such a time limit would impose additional compliance costs on firms; it would encourage a new type of tax-driven trading; and it would do little, if anything, to protect the revenue from stamp duty on shares.

My central expectation is that the proposed new regime, without a time limit, should deliver broadly the same yield from stamp duty on shares as the current regime. However, in order to guard against any potentially significant losses in revenue which may emerge on the introduction of the new tax regime and the stock exchange's new trading system, I propose to take reserve powers to impose a non-zero rate of stamp duty on share purchases and other defined classes of transactions by intermediaries. These powers could be activated to prevent against loss of revenue arising from abuse of the extended relief for intermediaries' transactions.

As well as replacing the current reliefs for stock exchange market makers and broker dealers, the proposed regime would also replace the existing stamp duty reliefs for market makers and principal traders on the London International Financial Futures and Options Exchange. Stamp duty relief would be available to LIFFE equity options intermediaries for equity purchases on other exchanges of the stocks in which LIFFE trades an option and the purchase is made on a recognised investment exchange or an EEA regulated market. LIFFE intermediaries would not necessarily have to become intermediaries on other exchanges in order to gain relief.

Detailed provisions, reflecting these proposals, will be brought forward for the 1997 Finance Bill, with a view to implementing the new regime as soon as is practicable during 1997–98.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Discrimination Act 1995

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made to establish a Disability Discrimination Act telephone information line. [84]

Mr. Burt: I am pleased to announce that following a successful tender exercise, the contract to run the Disability Discrimination Act information line has been awarded to Merit Direct Ltd. The line will be operational by 2 December 1996. Literature and fact sheets on the employment rights and the rights of access to goods, facilities and services will be available through an operator, by textphone, and on the Internet. Additionally, the fact sheets will be available by fax. Initially an automated service may be used for re-ordering literature.

DEFENCE

Reserve Forces Act 1996

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress to complete the work on the secondary legislation for the Reserve Forces Act 1996. [82]

Mr. Soames: Work to develop the necessary secondary legislation to enable the Act's new powers to operate is proceeding well. Both new regulations and amendments to existing ones will be necessary, with some requiring formal public consultation before they are made.

That process of consultation has now begun. On 18 October we published a consultative document on schemes for exempting reservists from call-out and recall, and for financial assistance for reservists and their employers, provided under part VIII of the Act. The document is available in the Library of the House. As required by the Act, copies have been sent to representatives of employers, employees, the self-employed, and to the Council of Territorial, Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations. Copies have also been sent to those who responded to the last consultation exercise on the draft Reserve Forces Bill, and to selected reserve units. The consultation period finishes on 29 November and I would encourage all those that the regulations affect or who have an interest in them to read the document carefully and to send in their comments.

I consider it most important to allow adequate time for interested parties to respond to our proposals, and for a measured assessment of those comments. I have therefore decided that the regulations, and the Act as a whole, should take effect from 1 April 1997 rather than 1 January 1997, the original target date for implementation.

Challenger 2 Programme

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current status of the Army's Challenger 2 programme; and if he will make a statement. [194]

Mr. Portillo: The Challenger 2 development programme was successfully completed, with all reliability targets achieved on development tanks. Following a series of trials on early production tanks we identified a need to improve the reliability of some of the elements of production vehicles to meet the very high standards set. An agreed programme to achieve this is being undertaken by the contractor, Vickers plc, at no additional cost to my Department. Central to the programme is a sequence of production reliability growth trials with agreed technical milestones.

The company has met the requirements set in the first of those trials, which was held in July. Challenger 2 has already demonstrated an impressive capability. I am confident that Challenger 2 will fully meet all our technical and reliability requirements in 1997. In order to ensure that the comprehensive logistic support arrangements that we require are properly established, I have agreed that the in-service date for Challenger 2 will be June 1998.

HEALTH

Social Services Conference

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library copies of his speech to the social services conference in Edinburgh on 18 October and of the two documents whose publication he announced on that occasion; and if he will make a statement. [83]

Mr. Burns: In his speech on 18 October, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced the publication of a consultation document on setting the standards of conduct and practice for social services staff, entitled "The Obligations of Care". Copies are being sent out to interested parties this week. Comments have been requested by 28 February 1997.

My right hon. Friend also announced the publication of Tom Burgner's report on his review of the regulation and inspection of social services, and gave the Government's initial response to it. Copies are being sent to interested parties this week. The Government intend to publish a White Paper on social services in January next year, and some more detailed responses to the Burgner recommendations will be given then. Meanwhile, we shall be initiating the necessary further consultations on particular issues with the relevant interests, whom we shall be approaching direct in due course.

Copies of both documents and of the speech have been placed in the Library.

Long-term Care

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he proposes to establish a partnership scheme for long-term care. [389]

Mr. Dorrell: The Government remain committed to the proposals for a partnership scheme set out in the consultation paper "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age", copies of which are available in the Library. In the light of responses to the consultation paper, they also intend to legislate to allow residents in care homes to "top up" the care arranged by their local authorities.

The Government intend to introduce a Bill as soon as legislative time is available. In the meantime, they are discussing the details of legislation with the financial services industry, representatives of local authorities, and other interested parties. They will publish a draft Bill, and a statement of their policy in the light of comments on the consultation paper, in the new year.

TRANSPORT

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to proceed with the privatisation of National Air Traffic Services. [954]

Sir George Young: Air traffic control services provide a vital cover for the growing air transportation industry. Their standards are, and must be, of the highest. The national air traffic services face continuing demands for additional investment in the latest and most sophisticated equipment. The Government believe that these demands can most effectively be met in the private sector, freed from the constraints of public expenditure controls.

The Government therefore intends to bring forward legislation to privatise NATS early in a new Parliament. To this end, we will be developing proposals, taking account of work done previously, in consultation with the Civil Aviation Authority and other interested parties, with a view to publishing a draft bill as soon as possible in 1997.

Air Bags

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has undertaken into dangers to children arising from air bags fitted to cars. [22]

Mr. Bowis: None. This Department is already fully aware of the danger posed by air bags to children in rear-facing child seats.

Heavy Goods Vehicles (Safety)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has carried out on products that ensure that wheels do not come off heavy goods vehicles. [60]

Mr. Bowis: None.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Watercourse Management Division

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in establishing the watercourse management division of the Department of Agriculture as a next steps agency. [1057]

Mr. Ancram: The watercourse management division of the Department of Agriculture has been established as an executive agency from 1 October 1996. It will be known as the Rivers Agency.

I have set a number of key performance targets for the agency to achieve in its first six months. These are as follows:

To construct or refurbish 1.4 km of urban flood defences.

To increase the length of designated sea defences having appropriate standards of protection to 27 per cent.

To accommodate increased storm run-off from 448 hectares of development land.

To replace/refurbish 38 per cent. of dangerous culverts identified at 1 October 1996.

To complete maintenance works on 330 km of urban watercourses and 1,020 km of rural watercourses.

To extend or provide new water recreation facilities at 17 sites throughout Northern Ireland.

To issue substantive replies to 75 per cent. of written enquiries within 15 working days of receipt.

To respond to 100 per cent. of schedule 6 applications within three months.

To aim to have all navigation locks operable for at least 90 per cent. of the period.

To maintain expenditure within allocated cash limits.

To achieve at least 4 per cent. efficiency savings in the 1996–97 financial year.

To commission a scoping study on the feasibility of introducing private finance in capital works.

To implement phase 1 of the development of management information systems and databases to establish unit costs for protecting land from flooding and maintaining drainage benefit to agricultural land.

Copies of the framework document which sets out the terms within which the agency will operate, will be placed in the Library, along with its first corporate and business plan.

WALES

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action has been taken to implement the conclusions and recommendations of the 1994 financial management and policy review report of the Cardiff Bay development corporation. [1008]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Department and the corporation have jointly considered the conclusions and recommendations of the report. Action taken in response to the report has brought about improvements in the running and administration of the corporation, clarified its accountability and improved the working relationship between the Department and the corporation.

Copies of the formal account of the action taken in response to each conclusion and recommendation, have been placed in the Library of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Low Level Offenders

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses he has received commenting on the consultation paper "Alternative Penalties for Fine Defaulters and Low Level Offenders". [957]

Mr. Howard: Of the 31 responses to the paper, 30 were from organisations and individuals with a direct interest in the criminal justice system.

There was overall support for the wider use of community penalties as proposed in the consultation paper. Seventy-seven per cent. of respondents supported community service and 58 per cent. supported curfew orders for fine default. Sixty-one per cent. supported community service and 51 per cent. curfew orders for persistent low level offenders.

I have considered the responses carefully in finalising the details of the proposals which are included in the Crime (Sentences) Bill, published today.

"Protecting the Public"

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses he has received commenting on the sentencing proposals set out in the White Paper "Protecting the Public". [958]

Mr. Howard: We have received responses from 189 members of the public and from 90 organisations and other individuals with a direct interest in the criminal justice system. The sentencing proposals were widely welcomed by the public. Overall, 139 responses from the public, 74 per cent., expressed full support and a further 13, 7 per cent., qualified support. A range of views were expressed by those other individuals and organisations who commented on the proposals. There was support from police associations. There was criticism from the judiciary about the principle of mandatory sentences in particular, and a number of responses expressed concern about how the proposals would operate in practice.

I have considered the responses carefully in finalising the details of the proposals which are included in the Crime (Sentences) Bill, published today.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses he has received commenting on the proposals set out in the consultation paper "Mentally Disordered Offenders: Sentencing and Discharge Arrangements". [955]

Mr. Howard: We have received 182 responses to the consultation paper, many of which expressed the views of organisations rather than individuals.

One hundred and two respondents, 56 per cent., expressed support for the principle of the proposal to introduce a hospital direction disposal for mentally disordered offenders. Twenty-four of these wished the power to be available only to those diagnosed as suffering from psychopathic disorder.

The responses revealed strong support for the proposal to extend the maximum duration of the interim hospital order. There was broad support for our proposals in relation to discharge and subsequent supervision of mentally disordered offenders.

I have considered the responses carefully in finalising the detail of the proposals which are included in the Crime (Sentences) Bill, published today.

Sex Offenders

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses he has received commenting on the proposals in the consultation paper "Sentencing and Supervision of Sex Offenders". [956]

Mr. Howard: We have received 238 formal responses to the consultation paper. In general, there was strong support for all the proposals canvassed. Not all respondents commented on all five proposals outlined in the consultation paper. Of those who did, 94 per cent. were in favour of extended supervision for convicted sex offenders released from prison; 82 per cent. were in favour of DNA testing of convicted sex offenders still serving a prison sentence who have not already been DNA tested; 87 per cent. supported a requirement for convicted sex offenders to notify the police of their address and any subsequent change thereto; 87 per cent. also supported the proposal to make it an offence for convicted sex offenders who seek employment with children; and 91 per cent. supported the proposal for a supervised access regime for victim statements and photographs in sex cases.

I have considered all these responses carefully. The Crime (Sentences) Bill, published today, contains provision for the extended supervision of sex offenders after their release from custody. I will also be bringing forward proposals to require paedophiles and other serious sex offenders to notify changes of address to the police.

Other proposals for legislation will be brought forward when suitable opportunities arise.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when he expects to reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham North's letter of 17 October on the sale of drugs by Nottingham bouncers. [403]

Mr. Maclean: A reply will be sent shortly.

DEFENCE

Army Technical Support Agency

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the planned collocation of the Army Technical Support Agency. [848]

Mr. Soames: I have decided, in the light of the Government's determination to exploit fully the potential offered by the private finance initiative, that the collocation of the Army Technical Support Agency should be taken forward as a PFI project.

On 4 June, Official Report, column 388, I described the further work to be undertaken following the responses to the earlier consultation document. This has included a further investment appraisal—including the Andover, Ludgershall and Chilwell options—and the production of a new business case.

The work has shown that Andover is the preferred location for ATSA because of its proximity to the agency's main customers, principally the Director General Equipment Support (Army) and his staff who are already based at Andover. I am arranging for copies of the investment appraisal and business case to be placed in the Library of the House.

Andover will therefore be the public comparator in the PFI exercise and the Andover north site will be available to bidders if required. Bidders will be able to put forward alternative options, including existing ATSA sites, so long as these satisfy ATSA's business needs and the PFI requirements for risk transfer and value for money. We shall shortly be seeking expressions of interest and I would expect to be in a position to decide on the preferred option by the middle of 1998, allowing collocation to be achieved around the end of 1999.

A formal period of consultation is not required until either a PFI solution is identified or we decide to follow a conventional public sector delivery route. I should, nevertheless, be very pleased to receive any further representations from hon. Members, ATSA staff and other interested parties at this stage.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EU Research Council

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Research Council on 7 October. [872]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Council had a first exchange of views on priorities for the fifth framework programme for research and technological development, in responses to the European Commission's initial strategy document "Inventing tomorrow". The UK stressed the need for the fifth programme to address the medium-term needs of EU industry and to support EU policies more broadly, including those designed to bring about improvements in the quality of life. It considered that the programme needed to be more sharply targeted than hitherto on clear objectives responding to user priorities and to give the users of research a stronger voice.

The Council had a short discussion on EU-funded research into bovine spongiform encephalopathy and related diseases. It approved conclusions calling for enhanced co-operation among EU members states in research into BSE and related diseases and for strengthened support for such research in the fourth framework programme. The conclusions also invite the Commission to report again to the Council in December, following the report of the group of experts chaired by Professor Charles Weismann.

The Council considered the question of supplementary funding for the fourth framework programme. It took note of the Commission's intention to clarify the funding available within category 3 of the current financial perspectives, and agreed to return to the matter at its next meeting in December.

Institute of Food Research

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the prior options review of the Institute of Food Research sponsored by the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council. [873]

Mr. Ian Tayor: The Government announced on 29 September 1995 that all public sector research establishments would be subject to prior options reviews. I announced on 24 November 1995 reviews of BBSRC-sponsored institutes concerned with agriculture and plant sciences, and on 22 February 1996 reviews of BBSRC–sponsored institutes concerned with animal sciences.

A review has now begun of the BBSRC's arrangements for sponsoring the Institute of Food Research. The review was advertised in the September issue of Government Opportunities. This review is taking place alongside those of establishments parented or sponsored by other Government Departments which are carrying out work in similar or related fields and will build on any relevant recent studies.

Information Technology

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to monitor and assess the United Kingdom's progress towards the information society relative to other countries. [870]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Department of Trade and Industry commissioned Spectrum Strategy Consultants, as part of the information society initiative, to undertake a pilot exercise to determine how to measure the UK's progress towards the information society. The aims of the study were to examine a range of possible indicators, to determine their significance and provisionally to measure the performance of nine countries—UK, Germany, France, Sweden, USA, Canada, Australia, Japan and Singapore. A report, "The Development of the Information Society: an International Analysis", was published on 28 August 1996 by HMSO, ISBN 0-11-515424-8. An executive summary was also produced and is available on the Internet (http//:www.isi.gov.uk/dotis/index.htm/) or by ringing the ISI info line (0345 15 2000), or by e-mail (info@isi.gov.uk).

I have placed copies of the report and the executive summary in the Library of the House.

EU Telecommunications Council

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Telecommunications Council on 27 September 1996. [875]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I represented the UK at the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on 27 September.

The Council reached political agreement on a common position on a directive on licensing in telecommunications. Greece announced its intention of voting against the common position. In addition, the Council reached unanimous political agreement on a common position on a decision for EU action on the introduction of satellite personal communications services.

Following an informal lunchtime discussion on a draft directive on postal services, it was agreed that this proposal should be referred back to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further discussion with a view to reaching political agreement on a common position at the 28 November Telecommunications Council.

Following a debate on measures to combat the dissemination of paedophile images and information via networks of the Internet type, the Council agreed unanimous conclusions on the creation of a working party to present proposals to combat illegal use of the Internet or similar networks—taking account of UK measures in this area—in time for the 28 November Telecommunications Council.

There was also a Commission presentation on a directive on the application of open network provision to voice telephony in a competitive environment.

EU Industry Council

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU industry council on 8 October. [874]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The UK deputy permanent representative to the European Union represented the UK at the Industry Council held in Luxembourg on 8 October.

The Council reached unanimous political agreement on a resolution on new political priorities for the information society. The Council also reached unanimous political agreement on a decision to promote linguistic diversity in the information society.

The Commission made presentations on recent Commission communications in the information society field—"The Information Society: From Corfu to Dublin/The new emerging priorities", "The implication of the Information Society for European Union policies: Preparing the next steps", "Standardisation and the global information society: The European approach" and "Living and working in the information society: People first"—and on a proposal for a directive concerning regulatory transparency in the field of information society services.

As part of the arrangements for a structured dialogue with applicants for membership of the EU, representatives of the 10 associate member countries of central and eastern Europe were invited to participate in an exchange of views of the information society.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the international convention on nuclear safety will enter into force. [871]

Mr. Page: The convention on nuclear safety entered into force yesterday, 24 October, just over two years after being opened for signature at the International Atomic Energy Agency general conference in September 1994. The principal objective of the convention is to encourage best practice in the safe regulation, design and operation of civil nuclear power plants. States party to the convention will submit national reports, for discussion at periodic review meetings, on how they meet safety obligations established in the convention.

The United Kingdom ratified the convention on 17 January this year. Seventeen nuclear states and eight states without civil nuclear power plants have now ratified the convention. The speed of entry into force of the convention is a considerable achievement by the international community. It demonstrates the importance, underlined in the declaration of the Moscow summit in April this year, that many states attach to achieving high standards of nuclear safety worldwide.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Aid Projects

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are taken by the Overseas Development Administration to ensure that all aid projects are assessed for their environmental sustainability. [739]

Dr. Liam Fox: All projects are subject to environmental assessment according to the guidelines and procedures set out in the manual of environmental appraisal. ODA has recently revised and updated the manual. It is accompanied by guidance on the major international environmental agreements and their implications for both aid donors and recipients. Copies of both documents have been placed in the Library of the House.

UN World Hunger Conference

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's Government intend to place before the UN world hunger conference to be held in Rome in November; and if he will make a statement. [483]

Dr. Liam Fox: The Government's principal objective for the world food summit is to work for international consensus on the future action needed to reduce hunger and malnutrition in the world. To help achieve this objective, we propose to present to the summit a paper on policy towards food security. In preparing this paper, we have consulted extensively among interested groups in the United Kingdom.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Mahmood Hussein Mattam

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received relating to the conviction for murder and subsequent hanging in Cardiff in 1952 of Mahmood Hussein Mattam; and if he will now refer the matter to the Court of Appeal. [777]

Mr. Kirkhope: On 10 October 1996, solicitors acting on behalf of Mr. Mattam's family submitted a substantial dossier in this case. My right hon. and learned Friend will decide as soon as possible whether any action on his part would be appropriate.

Police Equipment

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the items of new equipment authorised by his Department for use by (a) the Metropolitan police and (b) other police forces in England and Wales in the last two years; how much training is required by his Department (i) initially and (ii) annually for each piece of equipment; and what assessment he has made of the impact of the introduction of each piece of equipment on the time available to police officers on active duty. [75]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend gave his consent to the following in the Metropolitan police district, in accordance with the Metropolitan Police Town Clauses Act 1829:

(i) on 23 November 1994, 24 in and 26 in straight batons;

(ii) on 28 June 1995, expandable three-piece friction lock batons.

In addition, between 1 March and 31 August 1996, Metropolitan police officers participated in operational trials of CS aerosol sprays with my right hon. and learned Friend's consent. His consent is not required to the introduction of police equipment in other forces.

Training in the use of equipment is a matter for individual chief officers. An assessment was made of the effect of the introduction of expandable side-handled batons on working days lost by injury to police officers. No conclusions could be drawn because it coincided with a period in which there was a large fall in the number of officers on long-term sick leave.

Omanga Mangwete

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to his Department of the custody of Omanga Mangwete in the UK prior to his removal to Canada. [165]

Mr. Kirkhope: The cost of detaining Mr. Mangwete in the United Kingdom prior to his removal was £21,521.17.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of asylum seekers whose application has been rejected but remain in Britain awaiting appeal. [669]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 30 September 1996, an estimated 20,100 refused asylum seekers, excluding dependants, were pursuing appeals.

Micrea Ilin

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost of the custody of Micrea Ilin prior to his release from prison; and what was the cost to his Department of their actions on his case. [164]

Mr. Kirkhope: The cost of detaining Mr. Ilin was about £6,630. The cost to the Home Department of our actions in this case could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

ENVIRONMENT

Construction Industry (Recycling)

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in increasing the use of recycled material in the construction industry. [202]

Mr. Clappison: There is increasing interest in the use of recycled materials for construction in order to conserve primary aggregates. This has been further encouraged by the introduction of the landfill tax. Reliable data on the extent of usage of recycled materials are not presently available.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the administrative cost of implementation of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 by English local authorities. [668]

Sir Paul Beresford: Information about such costs is not available centrally, but I would expect any administrative costs to local authorities of implementing the housing provisions of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 to have been offset by savings arising from the changes, introduced by the Act, to the duties owed by authorities to asylum seekers under the homelessness legislation.

Planning Application (Wallsend)

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call in for determination planning application NT/0925/96 DM made to North Tyneside council for residential development at the Northern Electric sportsground, Wallsend. [782]

Sir Paul Beresford: If it is minded to approve this planning application, North Tyneside council will refer it to the Secretary of State for the Environment as a departure from the development plan, and he will then consider whether to call it in. I have asked the Government office for the north-east to write and let the hon. Member know his decision.

Stockport Unitary Development Plan

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the inspectors' report into Stockport UDP to be published. [73]

Sir Paul Beresford: The inspectors' report on objections to the Stockport unitary development plan is expected to be delivered to the council at the end of December this year. It will then be for the council to decide when to publish the report. I have asked the Planning Inspectorate's chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. Greenfield to Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, dated 25 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for the Environment has asked me to reply to your question about the Inspector's report from the public inquiry into the Stockport Unitary Development Plan.

The report is expected to be issued to the Council at the end of December. It will then be for the Council to decide when to publish it.

Planning Appeal (Stockport)

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects a decision to be taken into the appeal by Gladmen Homes to build a nursing home on land at Lisgard lane, Stockport. [74]

Sir Paul Beresford: The provision of information on planning appeals is the responsibility of the Planning Inspectorate. In the absence of the inspectorate's chief executive, Mr. Chris Shepley, I have asked the deputy chief executive, Mr. James Greenfield, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. Greenfield to Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, dated 25 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question asking when a decision is expected on the planning appeal by Gladman Homes for the erection of a nursing home on land at Donelons Yard, Lingard Lane, Bredbury.

The appeal has now been decided, and I enclose a copy of the inspector's decision letter.

Footpaths

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to place a duty on local authorities to adopt footpaths. [783]

Mr. Clappison: We have no plans to do so.

Liverpool Airport

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make a decision on proposals to expand Liverpool airport; and if he will make a statement. [493]

Sir Paul Beresford: A decision will be taken as soon as possible on the planning applications made by Liverpool Airport plc for the phased development of Liverpool airport. These were called in for the Secretary of State's determination in June 1994 and a public local inquiry was held from 4 April 1995 to 30 June 1995. The report of the inquiry inspector, which was submitted on 25 July 1996, is being considered.

It remains our intention, if feasible, to announce decisions simultaneously on the applications for the phased development of Liverpool airport and for a second runway at Manchester airport.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the net carbon dioxide emissions from Britain (a) in each year since 1990 and (b) in each year up to 2010. [154]

Mr. Clappison: Emissions of carbon dioxide, net of the increase in carbon stored in forests and wood products, for the UK are estimated to have been:

	Million tonnes CO^2
1990	574
1991	579
1992	563
1993	549
1994	546

Projected emissions are subject to greater uncertainty. They are currently estimated to be:

2000: 545

2010: 591

Waste Disposal

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the proportion of discarded (a) glass, (b) paper, (c) plastic, and (d) biodegradables which have been (i) recycled and (ii) composted in each of the past five years, the current year, and each of the next five. [156]

Mr. Clappison: It is not possible to provide information in the form requested. Information on plastic recycling and composting of biodegradables is not held centrally.

The Department does obtain information from trade associations on the amounts of glass and paper recycled as a proportion of glass and paper consumption in the UK. Figures for the years 1989–1994 are given in the table.

Glass and paper recycling as a proportion of the consumption of these materials in the UK

Year	Glass recycling (per cent.)	Paper recycling per cent.)
1989	17	28
1990	21	32
1991	21	34
1992	26	34
1993	29	32
1994	28	33

The Department has not made projections of these figures.

Housing Rents

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average rent paid by (a) council tenants and (b) housing association and housing trust tenants in each year since 1990. [158]

Mr. Clappison: Average weekly rents for council and housing association tenants in England are set out in the table:

	(a) Council tenants[1] £	(b) HA tenants[2] £
1990	23.74	n/a
1991	27.29	n/a
1992	30.57	29.62
1993	33.62	34.03
1994	35.68	37.56
1995	38.31	40.60

Global Temperature Changes

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment from what sources he draws his evidence of global temperature changes; and on whom he relies for the evaluation of this information. [495]

Mr. Clappison: The Hadley centre, Bracknell, complies global temperature data and analyses them for indications of change. The result of the Hadley centre's work are published in scientific journals and hence subject to peer review. These results, with the work of other investigators around the world, have been assessed by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change—IPCC—and reported in the IPCC's most recent report, the second assessment of climate change 1995.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Goods (Environmental Claims)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take following the publication of the National Consumer Council report on environmental claims on goods. [240]

Mr. John M. Taylor: My Department is currently working with the Department of the Environment to draw up, in consultation with industry and consumer interests, a code of practice for the making of environmental claims.

R. R. Donnelley (UK) Ltd.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what (a) grants and (b) other assistance have been given by his Department to R. R. Donnelley (UK) Ltd. in the last five years. [176]

Mr. Page: There is no record of any assistance having been given by this Department to R. R. Donnelley's York plant within the past five years.

However, R. R. Donnelley's Gateshead plant has received business support assistance through its local training and enterprise council. The total value of this assistance is approximately £21,000.

Departmental Investigations

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his Department began its investigation into the activities and conduct of (a) Butte Mining, (b) Richmond Oil and Gas plc and (c) the Robertson Group; when the investigations were completed; what action was taken; and which Minister dealt with the matter. [785]

Mr. Lang: It is not my Department's practice to comment on the affairs of individual companies.

DEFENCE

Porton Down

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason the file with the classmark WO 32/20843 recorded at the Public Record Office relating to experiments at the chemical and biological defence establishment is currently retained by his Department; and if he will open it. [724]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Arrangements are being made to review WO 32/20843 to see whether release into the public domain is now possible. I will write to the hon. Member on completion of the review process.

Beef Consumption

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if British beef is purchased by the armed forces for their own consumption in the United Kingdom. [198]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The procurement of food for the armed forces is contracted to the Navy, Army and Air Force Institutes—NAAFI. My Department does not specify the source of origin from which the NAAFI should obtain beef—or any other meat—but expects it to seek the best market price for the product. There are no constraints on the choice of British meat products, which are considered equally with meat products sourced generally in the open market. The majority of our requirements are, however, for frozen beef which is not readily available from the British market and I understand that on cost grounds the majority of beef joints have been sourced from South America, predominantly Brazil and Uruguay, although a range of beef products including sirloin, forerибs, minced and diced beef are normally procured in the UK along with other meat and poultry produce.

Mine Clearance (Former Yugoslavia)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of mine clearance and detection vehicles and equipment in service with British forces in operations under the NATO, UN and implementation force—IFOR—programmes in former Yugoslavia. [397]

Mr. Soames: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Married Quarters Estate

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received opposing the sale of military married quarters to a Japanese-led consortium; what plans he has to review the sale; and if he will make a statement. [484]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department has received a number of letters expressing views on the future ownership of the married quarters estate. The sale is proceeding satisfactorily, with exchange of contracts having taken place on 24 September and completion scheduled for 5 November. A copy of my Department's press release announcing the exchange of contracts was placed in the Library of the House.

Tornado Crash (Blackpool)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the nine F3 Tornados referred to in his answer of 16 October, Official Report, column 1094, had been refurbished by British Aerospace, Warton, Lancashire, by means of (a) fitting a new mid-section fuselage taken from an F2 Tornado and (b) making good directly the previously damaged fuselage mid-section. [786]

Mr. Arbuthnot: All nine of the Tornado aircraft to which I referred in my answer of 16 October were refurbished by means of fitting centre fuselage sections taken from Tornado F2 aircraft held in store.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the same-day authorisation to fly the F3 Tornado that crashed at Blackpool on 28 September constituted the full normal manufacturers' certificate of airworthiness. [780]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The full and normal certification was provided by British Aerospace as contractor in respect of this aircraft, concurrently with the Ministry of Defence authorisation provided by my Department's principal quality assurance officer at British Aerospace, Warton, where the aircraft was being refurbished.

Future Large Aircraft

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his German counterpart concerning the future large aircraft programme. [247]

Mr. Arbuthnot: When I met State Secretary Simon on Tuesday 3 September, the future large aircraft programme was among the subjects we discussed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has not recently discussed the future large aircraft programme with his German counterpart.

Operation Joint Endeavour

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the aims of Operation Joint Endeavour; what part will be played by British military forces; and if he will make a statement. [485]

Mr. Soames: Operation Joint Endeavour is the NATO-led implementation force—IFOR—operation in Bosnia. Its primary aim is to implement the military aspects of the Dayton peace agreement. The operation has been conspicuously successful and all the key military objectives have been achieved. Britain is making a major contribution to IFOR through our leadership and status as framework nation for headquarters Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps, which commands the land operation, our command of one of the three multinational divisions and a troop contribution which is second only to that of America.

Departmental Headquarters Refurbishment

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his plans for refurbishing his Department's main building headquarters using the private finance initiative. [246]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Main building was constructed in the 1950s. Many of its key services are now in urgent need of replacement and the accommodation falls far short of meeting today's needs. To correct these deficiencies requires a major programme of work that will provide a modern working environment, maximum utilisation of space and flexibility for the future.

The Department intends to examine private finance options for the redevelopment and subsequent operation of the building. In due course, we would expect to be inviting ideas for the scheme from potential private sector partners. I hope to be able to make an announcement on the way ahead within the next few weeks.

Nicola Goode

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to complete his official investigation into the case of Nicola Goode, 2 Victoria heights, Dartmouth who suffered an injury on 2 February 1996 at RAF Halton; and will he make a statement. [257]

Mr. Soames: I will shortly write to the hon. Member in respect of his constituent in this case.

SCOTLAND

Andover Primary School, Brechin

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will announce a decision on the compulsory purchase order regarding land or the proposed replacement building for Andover primary school, Brechin; and when he received the application for this compulsory purchase order. [248]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: A decision on this order, which was submitted for confirmation in March 1995, will be made shortly.

SOCIAL SECURITY

War Widows

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's policy in respect of the pensions of war widows whose husbands' deaths are assessed to be related to smoking while in prisoner of war camps during the second world war; and if he will make a statement. [498]

Mr. Heald: A war widow's pension may be awarded where the late husband's death was due to, or was substantially hastened by, any service in the armed forces. There is no automatic entitlement to a war widow's pension simply because the late husband was a war pensioner.

The war pensions scheme has never been intended to compensate for the effects of a personal habit such as smoking. Policy on this has not changed. Over more than 40 years, that has been the general policy of successive Governments; it has applied to all those who served including those who were prisoners of war.

The law does, however, provide for awards in respect of smoking-related conditions where there is a severely disabling mental condition—itself attributable to service and assessed for war pension purposes at a minimum of 50 per cent.—which rendered the individual incapable of exercising personal choice and prevented him from giving up the habit.

Income Support

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) of those of adult working age and (b) pensioners are currently in receipt of income support; and if he will list separately the estimated number whose income is less than (i) £6,000 annually and (ii) £5,000 in each group. [223]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table:

	Millions
Number of income support claimants of adult working age	4.080
Number of pensioner income support claimants	1.588

Source:

Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry November 1995.

Notes:

1. Adult working age is between 16 and 60 years for females and up to 65 years for males.

2. Sample size 5 per cent.

3. Numbers are rounded to the nearest thousand.

4. Numbers include all income support recipients of working age irrespective of their circumstances.

State Pension

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what increase could be paid to recipients of a state pension if it had been consistently uprated in line with earnings since 1980; and what would be the gross cost of this in the current financial year and the cost net of taxation and losses of other benefit entitlement. [159]

Mr. Heald: If the basic state retirement pension had been increased in line with average earnings since 1980, the standard rate of basic pension would be increased by £19.10 a week. The gross cost of such an increase is estimated at £8.8 billion in 1996–97. After taking account of the effect on income-related benefits and taxation, the net cost is estimated at £5.5 billion.

Sources:

1. Estimates of gross costs provided by Government Actuary Department.

2. Net costs estimated using standard offset ratios from the Policy Simulation Model 1996–97, which is based upon data from the family expenditure surveys 1991, 1992 and 1993.

3. Estimates of changes to income tax revenue provided by the Inland Revenue, using a provisional projection of FES 1994–95 data to 1996–97.

4. Average earnings index, all employees, taken from the new earnings survey for each year.

Notes:

1. All estimates are in 1996–97 prices, rounded to the nearest £100 million.

2. This reply refers to increases in basic retirement pension only.

Pensions

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many full-time employees are currently estimated to have no arrangements for pension purposes outside the state pension; and what percentage of the work force this amounts to. [155]

Mr. Heald: We estimate that in 1994 approximately 2.8 million full-time employees had no current additional pension arrangement other than the state earnings-related pension; this represents about 17 per cent. of all full-time employees.

1994 general household survey and labour force surveys.

This information refers to current membership of schemes, it does not include employees who have preserved rights from previous membership of an occupational scheme.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of those claimants of incapacity benefit who failed the all work test were also refused unemployment benefit due to failing to meet the availability for work criteria. [224]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table:

	Number
Number of claims for unemployment benefits by former incapacity benefit claimants.	72,564
Number disallowed unemployment benefits because not available for work or unreasonable restriction placed on availability for work.	208
Number disallowed unemployment benefits because not actively seeking work.	40

Child Support Agency

Sir Roger Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what reports he has received recently concerning the performance of the Child Support Agency. [1095]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recently received two reports, both of which are being placed in the Library today. These are the annual report for 1995–96 from the chief child support officer and the mid-year report of the Child Support Agency.

The CSA's mid-year report shows that by the end of September maintenance totalling more than £183 million had been collected or arranged by the agency and that it was clearly on course to meet the target of £380 million to £400 million for the year. In September, 80 per cent. of assessments were correct to the nearest penny and 98 per cent. of payments received from absent parents were paid over to the parent with care within 10 working days. In addition, the report shows the agency's commitment to prompt enforcement action by issuing over 25,000 deductions from earnings orders and applying for over 1,000 liability orders against non-compliant absent parents.

The CCSO's report for 1995–96 shows continued improvement over the standards of adjudication for the first two years of the agency's operation. The CCSO, who is independent of the CSA and Ministers, acknowledges the progress made and the dedication of agency staff at all levels towards securing better standards of adjudication. He also points out that the agency's assessment of accuracy and the assessment of his own monitors are now broadly in line.

Both reports clearly indicate that the CSA has turned the corner in terms of its performance over the last 18 months and that it continues to make very encouraging progress, with substantial improvements in many areas. We shall be looking to the agency to continue this much-needed improvement, meet its end-of year targets and deliver an ever-improving and more efficient service.

WALES

BSE

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the impact of BSE on staffing levels in his Department as at 1 April, 1 October and prospectively for 1 April 1997. [778]

Mr. Hague: My Department continually keeps under review its staffing requirements for each area of business. Priorities have been established which will enable the BSE work to be taken forward.

Cattle Farming (Assistance)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to assist farmers, unable to have their cattle culled as a result of the culling backlog, with the cost of winter feed; and if he will make a statement. [71]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Government have made a further £29 million available to assist beef farmers and are consulting the industry on how this can be most effectively allocated. The Government have committed a total of £2.5 billion to supporting the agriculture industry.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of agricultural holdings and the hectarage of agricultural land in each county in Wales in the year (i) 1994, (ii) 1995 and (iii) 1996. [772]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information requested is shown in the following table. Data for 1996 are not yet available.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Illegal Drugs

32. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Lord President of the Council what progress has been made in respect of the use of illegal drugs since the publication of "Tackling Drugs Together". [600]

Mr. Newton: Since there are as yet no data beyond 1995, the year in which "Tackling Drugs Together" was published, it is too early to make such an assessment. However, good progress has been made in carrying forward all elements in the strategy which the White Paper set out.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries have so far failed to sign the comprehensive test ban treaty; when he expects the ban to become international law; and if he will make a statement. [490]

Mr. David Davis: The following countries had not signed the CTBT by 28 October:

Afghanistan, Antigua and Barbuda, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Bhutan, Botswana, Brunei, Burma, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Czech Republic, Dominica, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, The Gambia, Guatemala, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, India, Iraq, Jamaica, Kenya, Kiribati, Korea (North), Laos, Lebanon, Libya, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritius, Moldova, Nauru, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Palau, Rwanda, St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Vincent, Saudi Arabia, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Surinam, Syria, Tanzania, Thailand, Tonga, Trinidad and Tobago, Tuvalu, Uganda, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

According to article XIV of the treaty, the CTBT will enter into force 180 days after the date of deposit of the instruments of ratification by the 44 states listed in annexe 2 of the treaty, but in no case earlier than two years after its opening for signature.

Antarctic Treaty

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Government of Japan concerning ratification of the Antarctic treaty; and if he will make a statement. [671]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I refer the hon. member to the answer that I gave him on 22 July, Official Report, columns 39–40, since when there has been further correspondence between British and Japanese officials on detailed technical issues relating to the environmental protocol and we have against urged Japan to ratify the protocol as soon as possible.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in discussions with fellow signatories to the Antarctic treaty on the establishment of a secretariat; and if he will make a statement. [672]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave on 22 July, Official Report, columns 39–40. There has been no recent discussion.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total budget spent in each of the last three years on (a) Britain's responsibility on Antarctica through the Antarctic treaty and (b) grant to the British Antarctic Survey. [225]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Our only financial responsibility in relation to the Antarctic treaty is contributions to the Commission for the Conservation of Antarctic Marine Living Resources. FCO contributions for the last three years were as follows:

1995–96: £32,700

The Natural Environment Research Council is responsible for funding the British Antarctic Survey. The council provided the following information on the NERC grant to the survey in each of the last three years:

1993–94: £21,436,000

1995–96: £26,380,000

Romania (Human Rights)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Romania concerning human rights; and if he will make a statement. [670]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We monitor closely the human rights situation in Romania, as we do in other countries. When appropriate, we raise concerns bilaterally or in company with our EU partners.

Argentina

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list by date the discussions he has held with representatives of the Argentine Government since January 1991. [674]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary met his Argentine counterpart on the following dates:

26 July 1995

27 September 1995

15 December 1995

30 January 1996

28 February 1996

13 April 1996

10 June 1996

25 September 1996

27 September 1996

His predecessor met the Argentine Foreign Minister on the following dates:

10 December 1990

26 September 1991

23 February 1992

24 February 1992

22 September 1992

1 November 1993

3 March 1994

10 May 1994

5 October 1994

8 June 1995

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what review of the Government's arms policy with regard to Argentina has taken place since January 1991; what factors underlay the review; what classes of equipment were released from embargo as a consequence of the review; what quantities of such equipment have been sold since January 1991; and what information was released to (a) Parliament and (b) industry by his Department in respect of the review. [677]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary's remarks in the House on 24 October 1996, Official Report, column 141.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made clear, there has been no relaxation of the embargo and no goods have consequently been released from embargo. However, there have been exceptions allowed under the embargo in specific cases. I also refer the hon. Member to the written answer given to the hon. member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 13 June 1996, Official Report, column 263.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with representatives of the Argentine Government since January 1991, in respect of relaxing the arms embargo. [675]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Argentine representatives have raised their desire to have the arms embargo relaxed on several occasions. I have nothing further to add to the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on 24 October, Official Report, column 141.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the British Government's policy on the export of arms and military equipment to Argentina. [676]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I refer the hon. Member to the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on 24 October, Official Report, column 141.

Helms-Burton Act

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the United States ambassador in respect of the Helms-Burton Act; and if he will make a statement. [481]

Mr. David Davis: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has discussed the Helms-Burton Act with the United States ambassador and the US Secretary of State, Warren Christopher.

We consider that this legislation sets a dangerous and unwelcome precedent. It is against the spirit, if not the letter, of international trade law. While we agree with the US objective to promote democracy in Cuba, we disagree fundamentally on the means to achieve this. US sanctions against British companies are not the way forward. We have put firmly on record with the US Administration and Congress bilaterally, and also collectively with our EU partners, our views and our objections to the legislation. The EU has requested World Trade Organisation disputes panel to rule on the issue. Countermeasures are under consideration in Brussels. The Government are determined to do everything possible to protect our legitimate business interests and the law-based international trading system.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Drug Abuse Resistance Education

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) on what occasions she has visited the Nottinghamshire DARE programme; and if she will make a statement. [400]

(2) what estimates she has made of the cost of ensuring all nine-year-olds undertook a 17-week DARE course on social skills. [401]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend has not visited the Nottinghamshire drug abuse resistance education—DARE—programme, but officials of the Department maintain regular contact with DARE representatives and monitor its progress closely.

No estimates of requiring the DARE programme to be implemented nationwide have been made. While we encourage inter-agency drug education initiatives, it is for individual schools to decide which approach best suits their needs and circumstances. DARE is one of a number of possible programmes.

Down's Syndrome Children

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children with Down's syndrome are being educated (a) in mainstream schools and (b) in special schools in each local education authority; and if she will make a statement. [784]

Mrs. Gillan: This information is not collected centrally. Local education authorities are under a duty to educate children with special education needs in mainstream schools, provided this accords with parents' wishes and is compatible with the child receiving appropriate special educational provision, the provision of efficient education for other children and the efficient use of resources.

Physical Education Teachers

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many physical education teachers are employed in local education authority schools; and what has been the percentage change since 1979. [502]

Mr. Forth: In 1992, there were 24,400 full-time teachers in maintained, including grant-maintained, secondary schools in England who were teaching at least one lesson of physical education—PE—a week. Comparable figures are not available for later years. This represents a decrease of 36 per cent. since 1984, the earliest year for which comparable figures are available.

Most teachers in maintained primary schools teach some PE.

Children (Employment)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the educational effects of (a) children in registered work and (b) children working illegally; and if she will make a statement. [174]

Mrs. Gillan: Employers must register any children they employ with the local education authority—LEA. If the LEA considers that such employment is affecting a child's fitness to obtain full benefit from his or her education, it is for the authority to prohibit or restrict the child's employment with that employer.

The Government deplore any illegal employment of schoolchildren. The provisions of the legislation, which among other things forbid a child to work during school hours, or for more than one hour beforehand, are designed to avoid any adverse effect upon his or her education. They should be enforced rigorously.

R. R. Donnelley (UK) Ltd.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of Sate for Education and Employment what (a) grants and (b) other assistance have been given by her Department to R. R. Donnelley (UK) Ltd. in the past five years. [175]

Mr. Paice: R. R. Donnelley (UK) Ltd. has used recruitment services provided by the Employment Service and a variety of training and enterprise council services which will have been funded either wholly or in part by the DFEE. There is no record of any direct grant by the Department to R. R. Donnelley (UK) Ltd. in the last five years.

Vocational Qualifications

Mr Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people have been awarded each vocational qualification. [781]

Mr. Paice: The number of national vocational qualifications, NVQs, Scottish vocational qualifications, SVQs, general national vocational qualifications, GNVQs, general Scottish vocational qualifications, GSVQs, and other vocational qualifications awarded for the last three years are set out in the following table:

Year	NVQs/SVQs	GNVQs/GSVQs	Other VQs	Total
1992–93	194,000	—	781,000	975,000
1993–94	240,000	19,000	773,000	1,032,000
1994–95	277,000	48,000	613,000	938,000

Infant School Class Sizes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her estimate of the cost of reducing to a maximum of 30 all maintained infant school classes for pupils of five, six and seven years of age. [170]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department's statisticians estimate that it would have cost between £120 million and £250 million to reduce to a maximum of 30 pupils all single-teacher classes in years 1, 2, and 3 in January 1996. The exact cost will depend on the extent to which children in larger classes could be accommodated in existing smaller classes or grouped together in new classes. The estimated costs are for extra teachers only.

HEALTH

Cervical Cancer Screening

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidance he has issued as to the acceptance by NHS pathologists as adequate of cervical cancer screening test record cards that do not confirm that visual inspection has taken place; [457]

(2) if he will place in the Library copies of the guidance he has issued about the adequacy and competence of cervical cancer screening tests; [393]

(3) what representations he has received as to the adequacy of cervical cancer screening tests where no visual inspection of the cervix has taken place. [494]

Mr. Horam: In October 1995, a working party of the Royal College of Pathologists, the British Society for Clinical Cytology and the national health service cervical screening programme produced guidelines entitled "Achievable Standards, Benchmarks for Reporting and Criteria for Evaluating Cervical Cytopathology". These guidelines were launched by the chief medical officer in March this year, together with two further sets of guidelines relating to cervical screening: "Quality Assurance Guidelines for the Cervical Screening Programme" and "Standards and Quality in Colposcopy", and issued to the NHS. No specific representations have been received as to the adequacy of cervical screening where no visual inspection has taken place. However, the importance of visual inspection is emphasised in the British Society for Clinical Cytology's training video and booklet for smear takers "Taking Cervical Smears", which was promulgated to the NHS under cover of EL(94)33. Copies of all guidance documents relating to cervical screening are available in the Library.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cervical cancer screening tests were carried out in each health authority area since 1990, indicating in each case the percentage of cases requiring follow-up. [501]

Mr. Horam: Information on cervical screening tests is collected from pathology laboratories and is not held at district health authority level. The number of adequate smears examined by pathology laboratories in England in the years 1990–91 to 1994–95 is shown by region in the table. Questions relating to cervical screening in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Hospital Information Support System

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to seek compensation in respect of the NHS HISS. [452]

Mr. Horam: There is no such thing as a national health service hospital information support system—HISS. In 1989, the NHS executive established a HISS initiative to test out the means of purchasing and implementing hospital-wide integrated computer systems. The 25 NHS trusts sponsored by this initiative demonstrated a number of options for achieving this goal. These were pilot projects and have provided the basis of lessons learned for the future. The National Audit Office report on the HISS initiative published on 17 April 1996 makes no suggestion of waste of money. On the contrary, it recommends further work by the NHS executive to increase the value for money already obtained.

NHS Trusts (Bed Closures)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds in NHS trusts have been closed since 1 April with resource problems cited as the cause. [445]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not available centrally. Information on the average daily number of available beds in each national health service trust is published annually in "Bed availability for England", copies of which are available in the Library. Data for the 1995–96 financial year will be available shortly.

Long Term Care Report

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends publishing the Government's response to the Health Committee's report "Long Term Care: Future Provision and Funding", HC59 of Session 1995–96. [1082]

Mr. Burns: We have published the Government's response to [illegible]y. Copies are available in the Library.

NHS Funding (Charities)

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what account his Department takes of the quantity of funding received by the health service from charities in determining public expenditure in this area; [491]

(2) to what extent Government financial policy on the NHS assumes a continued level of charitable contributions to keep the service functioning. [488]

Mr. Horam: None.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is Government policy to substitute NHS equipment facilities funding in the service with charitable donations. [489]

Mr. Horam: No.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will indicate the levels of money raised in the past three years via charitable donations to supplement funding of the NHS. [487]

Mr. Horam: The table shows the total income of funds held on trust by the national health service in England.

1992–93	256,012
1993–94	245,032
1994-95	255,702

Nurses

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses were in NHS hospitals in April 1992; and how many are currently employed. [492]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health's non–medical work force census collects the number of hospital and community health services nursing and midwifery staff as at 30 September each year. Individual hospital units cannot be separately identified in the census, but up until September 1994 nursing and midwifery staff could be sub–divided between those working in hospitals and those working in the community on the basis of their area of work. Areas of work were determined by a combination of the pay scales nurses and midwives were paid on and their occupation codes. Data for September 1992 are available in the Library from the Department of Health's publications: "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for England", 1995 edition. The sub–division of nursing and midwifery staff between hospital and community areas of work is not possible for the 1995 non–medical work force census—the latest available—and future censuses because of the introduction of new occupation codes.

Head Lice (Organophosphates)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to prevent the use of organophosphates in the treatment of head lice among children. [76]

Mr. Horam: Malathion is the only organophosphate authorised for the treatment of head lice. There is no evidence to suggest that malathion is dangerous when used for this purpose. Like all marketed medicines, products containing malathion are continually monitored for safety.

Computerised Tomography Scanners

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is his Department's policy that a CT scanner is a necessary piece of equipment for a district general hospital. [486]

Mr. Horam: It is not the Department's policy for every district general hospital to have a computerised tomography scanner as a necessary piece of equipment. It is for the purchasers of health care to ensure that they have access to those services necessary to meet the needs of their patients.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what pay increases for (a) nursing and (b) ancillary grades has been agreed for the current financial year in the NHS; and what proportion of it has been funded by his Department. [167]

Mr. Malone: As recommended by the nursing pay review body, nurses on national terms of service received a 2 per cent. national increase from 1 April 1996, with local negotiations for further increases. Ancillary grade staff on national terms also received a 2 per cent. national increase, with local negotiations. For staff on national health service trust terms and conditions, pay increases are a matter for local negotiation. Pay costs are funded within overall NHS resources.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data he collates concerning the pay increases for (a) nursing and (b) ancillary grades by each English NHS trust. [166]

Mr. Malone: Executive letter EL(96)63 sets out the information which is collected centrally from trusts about annual pay settlements reached for nursing and ancillary staff on national terms and conditions. Copies of EL(96)63 will be placed in the Library.

Children (Employment)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with representatives of local government concerning the employment of children; and if he will make a statement. [172]

Mr. Burns: Officials are in regular contact with their counterparts in local government regarding the employment of children.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning the employment of children in the United Kingdom. [173]

Mr. Burns: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 21 February 1996, Official Report, columns 163–64.

Child Care (Vetting)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the modus operandi of the list held in his Department of individuals deemed unsuitable to work with children; which other agencies have the right to consult that list in their vetting procedures; how frequently the list has been consulted in each of the last five years; and what consultations he has undertaken recently to extend its coverage and use. [779]

Mr. Burns: The operation of the consultancy service index, which is the list to which the hon. Member refers, is described in annexe C to circular LAC 93(17), copies of which have been placed in the Library. The service is currently subject to review and consultations have taken place with the Home Office, Department for Education and Employment and other interested bodies.

Approximately 55,000 checks against the index are made each year.

Housing (Refugees)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the housing of refugee families since August 1996 by English local authorities within the terms of the Children Act 1989. [667]

Mr. Burns: Special grant report No. 22 (HC 16) relating to the persons from abroad children's grant was laid before the House on the 23 October. The purpose of this grant is to compensate social services departments for the additional expenditure they incur under the Children Act as a consequence of changes in social security entitlement and local authorities' housing duties towards certain asylum seekers.

TRANSPORT

North West Regional Railways

19. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure the final version of the North West Regional Railways Ltd. passenger service requirement issued by the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising maintains the current timetable. [581]

Mr. Watts: No.

Motor Car Commuting

21. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he plans to deter commuting by motor car. [570]

Mr. Watts: The Green Paper stresses the benefits of companies drawing up commuting plans to reduce car dependency. Improved rail services by private operators and better promotion of bus travel will encourage a switch to public transport.

Helicopters

23. Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to meet the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss helicopter use. [572]

Sir George Young: None.

Rail Privatisation

24. Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date the decision was made not to pursue proposals for profit participation or revenue risk sharing with bidders for rail franchises. [573]

Mr. Watts: The decision not to pursue proposals for profit participation was taken prior to the publication of invitations to tender for the first three rail franchises in May 1995. The decision not to pursue revenue risk sharing was taken in October 1995, after the receipt of indicative bids for those three franchises.

A2 (Bexley)

25. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the A2 road through the London borough of Bexley. [574]

Mr. Bowis: I have received representations about a number of issues on the A2 in Bexley.

Scottish Air Traffic Control Centre

26. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects National Air Traffic Services to announce the successful bid for the building and operation of the new Scottish air traffic control centre; and if he will make a statement. [575]

Sir George Young: The original timetable for this project assumed an announcement in February 1997. I understand that, in the light of the current Civil Aviation Authority review of the two-centre strategy, a paper will be presented to the CAA board in November on the tenders for the new Scottish centre.

Public Transport (Disabled Access)

27. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to support those agencies planning to provide travel training for the people with mobility impairments who might wish to transfer to forms of public transport recently made accessible. [576]

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to support those agencies planning to provide travel training for people with mobility impairments who might wish to transfer to forms of public transport recently made accessible; and if he will make a statement. [398]

Mr. Bowis: The Department of Transport works closely with transport operators and with disability organisations on this and many other issues arising from the growing move towards fully accessible public transport.

The importance of travel training will also be highlighted in guidance issued by the Department in parallel with regulations under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 which will set standards to ensure that future public transport is accessible.

A30

28. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress on upgrading the A30 across Goss moor. [577]

Mr. Watts: The main road programme includes a scheme to improve the A30 from Bodmin to Indian Queens across Goss moor. The scheme will be brought forward when funds allow.

Fenchurch Street Rail Service

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received on the Fenchurch Street line service. [579]

Mr. Watts: I have received two letters this year.

Cycling Safety

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve cycling safety. [571]

Mr. Bowis: Providing a safer environment for cyclists, as well as more convenient one, will be important for achieving national targets for increasing cycling set out in the national cycling strategy, which was launched in July. The Government will play their part towards achieving this: for example, through our education, publicity and research programmes; through advice to local authorities, and funding for their transport packages and local safety schemes; and through our involvement in the National Cycling Forum, the first meeting of which I am chairing next month.

Vehicle Parts

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if German type approval of vehicle parts is sufficient basis for them to conform to British standards. [13]

Mr. Bowis: In Britain, most vehicle components are type approved in accordance with the appropriate European standards. Components approved to those standards in Germany are acceptable in Britain.

Road Signs

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's policy on road signs announcing distances in miles/yards and kilometres/metres. [203]

Mr. Watts: The current Traffic Signs Regulations specify that all distances must be shown in miles and yards. I have no plans to change that.

Watford Junction (Rail Incident)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the scheduled departure time for Euston of the train which overshot Watford Junction station on Wednesday 10 July. [122]

Mr. Watts: The scheduled departure time from Euston was 08.00.

Departmental Car Parking Spaces

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of car parking spaces at his Department's building on the basis of equivalent central London charges. [769]

Mr. Bowis: There is provision for 23 car parking spaces in the Department's headquarters building, Great Minster house, which houses approximately 1,100 staff. On the basis of equivalent local commercial rates, these would cost some £69,000 per annum.

Passenger Rail Services

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what plans he has to extend passenger rail services from Matlock to Buxton; and what finance he proposes to make available for this project; [162]

(2) what plans he has to re-introduce passenger traffic on the Bletchley to Bicester line; what assessment he has made of the quality of the track; and if he will make a statement; [160]

(3) what plans he has to reintroduce passenger services on the Aylesbury to Bletchley to Bicester line; and if he will make a statement. [161]

Mr. Watts: None.

Noise (Vehicle Sound Systems)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what are the operational needs of the police to enable them to combat excessive noise emitted from stereo systems in motor vehicles; [221]

(2) what representations he has received from environmental and enforcement bodies (a) on the scale of the problem of excessive noise emitted from stereo systems in motor vehicles and (b) the most effective way for dealing with it; [222]

(3) what existing powers and practices exist to enable environmental health officers to combat excessive noise emitted from stereo systems in motor vehicles. [220]

Mr. Bowis: Following the failure of a prosecution under regulation 97 of the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986, which relates to excessive noise from vehicles, the Metropolitan police have suggested that the regulation be amended so as specifically to include noise from car accessories, such as stereo systems or radios. This would enable the police to continue to issue fixed penalty notices to offenders.

In response, I have sought comments from bodies representing environmental, local authority, police and motoring interests to ascertain their views on the scale of the problem and the adequacy or otherwise of existing powers to deal with it. I am currently considering these comments.

Local authority environmental health officers have powers under part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 as amended by the Noise and Statutory Nuisance Act 1993 to deal with noise of all types from vehicles parked on premises and in the street. I understand that a number of local authorities have also recently brought successful prosecutions for noise from car stereos under the loudspeaker provisions of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Concessionary Travel (London)

Mr. Bendall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has had from users and service providers of the London concessionary fares and taxicard schemes regarding the proposals recommended in a review of the operation of those schemes carried out for the London committee on accessible transport; and if he will make it his policy that the present administration of these schemes will not be impaired. [496]

Mr. Bowis: I have received representations from the company which is contracted to provide the London taxicard scheme.

These are matters for the London boroughs and my Department is not able to intervene.

Passengers Charter

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the proportion and absolute number of rail journeys which failed to achieve the required passengers charter performance standards, with regard to reliability, for all routes monitored by the Central Rail Users Consultative Committee, for each year since 1993; [219]

(2) if he will list the proportion and absolute number of rail journeys which failed to achieve the required passengers charter performance standards, with regard to punctuality, for all routes monitored by the Central Rail Users Consultative Committee, for each year since 1993. [218]

Mr. Watts: The information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Information regarding the punctuality and reliability of train operating companies are provided in the British Railways Board annual report and accounts 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Humber Bridge

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he plans to announce how much Humber bridge debt the Government will write off under the Humber Bridge (Debts) Act 1996. [568]

Mr. Watts: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 8 July, Official Report, column 65. When the Secretary of State has received, and reached a decision on, the inspector's report into the recent tolls inquiry, he will consider proposals for an order under the Humber Bridge (Debts) Act 1996.

London Underground

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to improve the London Underground network. [566]

Mr. Bowis: London Transport is investing over £1.1 billion in the current year. This is four times as much in real terms as was spent in 1979.

With substantial support from Government, both through public funding and the private finance initiative, London Underground is undertaking a comprehensive programme of investment both in modernising its existing infrastructure and rolling stock and in constructing the Jubilee line extension.

Consultants

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all consultants, outside individuals and organisations employed by his Department over the previous 12 months, the nature of their employment, the duration of their employment, and the total cost of their employment to his Department. [1052]

Mr. Bowis: I shall write to the hon. Member with details and place a copy in the Library.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Questions

33. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will review the arrangements for the answering of parliamentary questions by Ministers. [601]

Mr. Newton: I have no plans to do so. The arrangements for the answering of parliamentary questions fall within the remit of the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the length of time devoted to questions to the House of Commons Commission; and if he will make a statement. [593]

Mr. Newton: The time devoted to questions to the Commission appears to me to be adequate, but I will of course look with care at any representations my hon. Friend may wish to make to me.

Parliamentary Calender

34. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council what plans he has to review the parliamentary calendar. [602]

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the speech given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 26 June, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Oral Questions

35. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will assess the advantages of moving oral questions to Ministers to the morning. [603]

Mr. Newton: No. The Select Committee on Sittings of the House considered this possibility and rejected it.

Private Motions

36. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Lord President of the Council what proposals he has for enabling hon. Members to move private motions in the current Session. [604]

Mr. Newton: None.

State Opening

37. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Lord President of the Council how much time he had to devote to preparing for the state opening of Parliament. [605]

Mr. Newton: Apart from work as chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Future Legislation, the amount of time required to change from one suit into another.

Loyal Address Debates

38. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Lord President of the Council what consultations he has had to facilitate the choice of dates and subjects for debates on the Loyal Address. [607]

Mr. Newton: The subjects for debate on the Loyal Address and the days on which they are debated are by tradition chosen by the main Opposition party. I refer the hon. Gentleman to page 234 of the 21st edition of Erskine May's "Parliamentary Practice."

Child Care Facilities

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what progress has been made concerning the provision of creche facilities and nursery vouchers for hon. Members and their staff. [591]

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I have nothing to add to the oral reply given by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), representing the House of Commons Commission, on 8 July, Official Report, columns 15–16.

Catering Staff (Pay)

Mr. Janner: To ask the right hon. member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make a statement on the pay of House of Commons catering staff. [594]

Mr Beith: Until this year, the pay rates for staff in the Refreshment Department—RD—catering grades were linked to the rates negotiated between the Treasury and the National Union of Civil and Public Servants, now Public Services, Tax and Commerce. With the introduction of "delegated pay", the Treasury no longer negotiates national pay agreements and the House now has direct responsibility for negotiating the pay rates of all staff, subject to the statutory requirement to keep the pay and conditions of service broadly in line with the civil service.

A pay increase of 3 per cent. has been negotiated with the unions representing staff of the House in grade 8 and below, to take effect from 1 April 1996. An offer of a 4 per cent. increase in basic pay rates, with no change in the rates paid for overtime, has been put to the unions representing the RD catering grades. Bearing in mind the retention of the existing rates of pay for overtime, this pay offer is very close to the 3 per cent. increase already paid to other staff of the House and is broadly in line with this year's pay settlements in the civil service.

Access (Constituents)

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he will make a statement on the arrangements for constituents to lobby their hon. Members. [606]

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I am satisfied with the usual arrangement whereby constituents lobby hon. Members in the Central Lobby. The well-established arrangements for more constituents than can be immediately accommodated in the Central Lobby to lobby hon. Members are set out in the leaflet "Mass Lobbies". I have asked the Serjeant at Arms to send a copy of the leaflet to my hon. Friend.

Access (Wheelchair Users)

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he will introduce arrangements to remove the requirement to be met by a parliamentary passholder in respect of wheelchair users who wish to attend meetings in Committee Rooms in the Palace of Westminster. [1012]

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I have asked the Serjeant at Arms to look into the matter and to write to my hon. Friend.

Thomas Paine

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will list the locations of pictures and other representations of Thomas Paine in the Palace of Westminster. [402]

Sir Raymond Powell: No pictures or representations of Thomas Paine are on display in the Palace. I understand that an engraving was purchased by the Works of Art Committee in March 1996 and is currently in store awaiting conservation prior to display.

Parliamentary Works

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what is the estimated cost of building and decorating work carried out to the Palace of Westminster during the summer recess. [595]

Sir Raymond Powell: About £17 million-worth of work was carried out on the parliamentary estate during the summer recess.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what works have been completed in the parliamentary estate during the summer recess. [592]

Sir Raymond Powell: During the 12 weeks of the summer recess a large programme of works was undertaken on the parliamentary estate including installation of the parliamentary data and video network at Star Chamber Court and Norman Shaw North, the next phase of the Refreshment Department modernisation programme at Members' and Strangers' Cafeteria as well as automatic fire detection, new telephone wiring, new electrical wiring, lift modernisation including facilities for the disabled, lavatory refurbishment, essential maintenance such as heating modernisation and other minor works.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef Imports

Sir Jim Lester: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what tonnage of beef has been imported since March 1996; and what were the figures for the comparable period in 1995. [197]

Mr. Baldry: Imports of beef[1] into the United Kingdom for the periods April to June 1995 and 1996, as recorded in the overseas trade statistics, are as follows:

1995: 69,000 tonnes

1996: 60,000 tonnes

These figures are provisional.

Branch C, Statistics (Commodities and Food) Division, Economics and Statistics Group.

[1]Beef includes the following; beef carcase meat; bovine offal; and beef meat and bovine offal preparations.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspectors his Department sent to those countries importing beef into the United Kingdom to examine their farms and slaughterhouses in order to assess their compliance with EU regulations. [258]

Mrs. Browning: None. The import of beef into the United Kingdom is subject to harmonised Community rules. For intra–Community trade, responsibility for ensuring premises comply with those rules lies with the competent authority in the member state of origin. Responsibility for auditing member states' controls, and for inspecting red meat premises in third countries approved to export beef to the Community, currently rests with the Office of Veterinary and Phytosanitary Inspection and Control of the European Commission.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which countries outside the EU exported beef to the United Kingdom in each of the last three years; and in what quantities. [255]

Mr. Baldry: Imports of beef[1] into the United Kingdom from countries outside the EU in each of the last three years, as recorded in the overseas trade statistics, are as follows:

Thousands of tonnes

Area Payments Scheme

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many agricultural holdings and what area of agricultural land in hectares came within the area payments scheme in each county in England in (i) 1995 and (ii) 1996; [776]

(2) if he will set out by county a breakdown of the 1994 arable area payments scheme. [774]

Mr. Baldry: The table gives the county breakdown of claims under the arable area payments scheme in 1994 and 1995. A single claim may cover more than one holding where the holdings form part of one business. Equivalent figures for 1996 are not yet available.

Organophosphates

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to prevent the use of dangerous organophosphates in veterinary products. [77]

Mrs. Browning: No veterinary medicine is authorised unless it meets statutory criteria of safety, quality and efficacy. The Government are advised on this by the independent scientific Veterinary Products Committee, VPC. The suspected adverse reactions surveillance scheme monitors trends in adverse reactions, which are reported regularly to the VPC. The continued use of organophosphorus—OP—sheep dips is kept under review by the VPC. OP sheep dips are important in the control of serious, sometimes fatal, sheep diseases. The committee has advised that, on the basis of current scientific evidence, there is no reason to ban OP dips but that it is essential that they are used properly and in accordance with manufacturers' instructions.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to complete his review of the impact of organophosphate sheep dips on the health of farmers and farm workers. [78]

Mrs. Browning: The Veterinary Products Committee, which gives independent scientific advice to the Government on issues concerning veterinary medicines, has completed its most recent review of organophosphate sheep dips, and Ministers expect to receive advice in the near future. An announcement will be made as soon as possible thereafter.

The Government-funded epidemiological research project to examine the possible long-term human health effects of organophosphate sheep dips commenced earlier this year and is expected to be completed by April 1999.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to monitor the investigation of Gulf war syndrome to establish lessons for the examination of the health side effects of exposure to organophosphate sheep dips among farmers and farm workers. [79]

Mrs. Browning: Officials of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate are in regular contact on this matter with the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Health.

EU Fishing Rights (West Africa)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what rights exist for EU countries to fish off the west African coast: which countries enjoy such rights; and what sums have been paid to African Governments by the EU in order to facilitate these concessions. [253]

Mr. Baldry: Details of the fisheries agreements between the European Community and west African countries are shown in the table.

Common Fisheries Policy

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Department has made of (a) the advantages and (b) disadvantages of the United Kingdom not re-negotiating the common fisheries policy when it next falls for renewal. [254]

Mr. Baldry: It is for the Council of Ministers to decide before 31 December 2002 on any necessary changes to the common fisheries policy. The only realistic course for the United Kingdom is to continue to play a full role in negotiating improvements to the CFP in the run-up to its renewal.

Thirty-month Scheme

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide advance payment to those farmers wishing to send their 30-month-old cattle to slaughter but who are unable to do so due to insufficient capacity at slaughterhouses and renderers. [259]

Mr. Baldry: We have no plans to do so. The weekly slaughter rate has been more than doubled, to over 50,000 animals, through the injection of an additional £16.6 million for extra cold storage and changes in rendering practice. As from 4 November, priority will be given to animals over 30 months old awaiting slaughter which have been registered with the Intervention Board under the registration system announced on 21 October.

Beef Overproduction

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his Department's estimate of the current extent of overproduction of beef in the United Kingdom. [252]

Mr. Baldry: The table gives figures for UK beef and veal production as a percentage of new supplies.

Sea Defences

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of (a) changes in sea levels around the coast of the United Kingdom over the next (i) five, (ii) 10 and (iii) 15 years, (b) the likely levels of flooding that could result and (c) the costs of improving sea defences to prevent that flooding. [153]

Mr. Boswell: The Ministry's current guidance to operating authorities recommends them to make allowances for sea level rise and predicted vertical land movements of between 4 mm and 6 mm a year when assessing the need for coastal defence measures.

Virtually all land and property which would be at risk from sea level rise is dependent on existing defences for protection. Operating authorities are expected to consider potential increases in the risk of flooding at individual locations and all recent flood defence works take account of the predicted rise.

The total cost of allowing for sea level change is not available.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Risks

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the research he has evaluated to show that, among the elderly, fear of crime by the elderly is greater than the reality of crime. [145]

Mr. Maclean: The latest—1996—British crime survey, which is conducted by the Home Office, shows that the risks of crime for the elderly are considerably lower than for younger age groups.

The elderly tend to rate their chances of victimisation in line with younger age groups, and they are as worried about falling victim to specific crimes. They also exhibit greater anxiety about being out alone after dark.

Fear of crime is about not just the chances of victimisation but the perceived consequences. Greater anxiety on the part of the elderly about their safety on the streets may be because they see the physical, emotional and financial consequences of victimisation as greater than do the young.

Mr. Solely: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he has evaluated to show the relative risk to (a) young people and (b) senior citizens from (i) violent street crime and (ii) crimes committed by people gaining entry to their homes. [146]

Mr. Maclean: According to the latest—1996—British crime survey, which is conducted by the Home Office, a young person aged 16 to 29 is 18 times more likely to be a victim of violence in a street location than a person aged 60 or over.

The relative risk to young households—head aged 16 to 29—of burglary, which covers offences in which there is actual or attempted trespass with the intention of theft, assault or criminal damage, is 2.6 times that for households whose head is aged 60 or over.

Police Training

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the length of time devoted to dedicated police training for a new constable. [142]

Mr. Maclean: Under the police probationer foundation training programme, recruits to the police service in England and Wales, other than the Metropolitan police, spend a total of 15 weeks undergoing formal training at police training centres. In addition, they undergo a further 15 weeks training in their forces which is divided between formal classroom training, operational experience and development under the supervision of experienced tutor constables. During the remainder of their probation period, constables may be required to attend a minimum of 30 days' further training at their force training school.

Recruits to the Metropolitan police service spend an initial 18 weeks at the Metropolitan police training school at Hendon, followed by 10 weeks on division undergoing street duty training under the supervision of an experienced officer. During the remainder of the two years' probation, they are required to attend training courses at area training units for a further 28 days.

Police Constables

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average annual cost of employing a police constable in England. [93]

Mr. Maclean: Data on the average annual cost of employing a police constable are not collected centrally. However, the cost of employing a probationer constable in 1996–97 is estimated to be £19,738 outside London and £22,320 in London.

Drug Abuse Resistance Education

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set up an inquiry into the desirability of extending the DARE programme to all United Kingdom police forces. [765]

Mr. Maclean: No. It is a matter for individual chief officers to decide how to assist schools in drugs prevention work, taking local needs and circumstances into account. Drug abuse resistance education is one of a number of initiatives undertaken by police forces in this field.

Drug Dealers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to ensure the maximum recovery of funds from convicted drug dealers. [245]

Mr. MacLean: As recommended by the Home Affairs Committee last year, the working group on confiscation legislation which brings together Government Departments and enforcement agencies has been given the task of examining recovery rates from confiscation orders made against drug traffickers and other criminals, and to make recommendations for improvement. It is expected to report by March 1997.

PCL Group

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to recover fees from the PCL group after the decision to terminate the contract for transferring pre-1981 criminal records to the national computer's Phoenix database. [861]

Mr. Maclean: The contract between the Home Office and PCL was ended by mutual consent. Since then, no sums have been due from PCL.

Suspects (Interrogation)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will identify the research referred to in his speech to the Conservative party conference which indicates that the number of suspects refusing to answer questions has nearly halved; and if he will place a copy of the research in the Library. [904]

Mr. Maclean: The research to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred is emerging findings from a wider study by the Home Office research and statistics directorate which looked at the implementation of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. Data collected from a sample of cases from eight police stations around the country found that during interview suspects responded to questions from the police as follows:

Per cent.

	1993–94	1995–96
All questions answered	75	84
Some questions answered	14	10
No questions answered	11	6

A report of this study has not yet been published but is currently being prepared with a view to publication next spring, when a copy will be placed in the Library.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Witnesses (Payments)

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he proposes to take to prevent payments to witnesses being made in judicial proceedings. [1428]

Mr. Streeter: The Government have today published a consultation paper, "Payments to Witnesses," which invites comments on the proposal that payments to witnesses by the media, as well as offers of payment and requests for payment, should be prohibited. The Government consider that such payments can constitute a real risk to the administration of justice and that their prevalence justifies serious consideration of what action should be taken. We do not believe that the law in this area is clear or that the matter can be left to media self-regulation alone.

The paper seeks views, by 31 December 1996, on the proposal that payments, offers of payment and requests for payment should be prohibited, and on specific questions relating to:

- whether the prohibition should take the form of a contempt of court or a criminal offence;
- whether a risk of prejudice to the proceedings need be proved;
- whether an intention to interfere with the course of justice need be proved;
- at what stage the prohibition should begin;
- whether the prohibition should cease at the end of the trial;
- whether there should be any defences.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Quasi-legislative Material

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to introduce new Crown copyright licensing arrangements for the electronic reproduction of quasi-legislative material. [1496]

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to announce that from 1 November a new generic licence called QLM/3 will be available on a non-exclusive basis to cover the commercial reproduction in electronic and microform formats of Crown copyright quasi-legislative material—material which forms or explains the framework within which legislative provisions are administered and the regulatory practices followed by public servants within that framework. I am placing copies of the licence in the Libraries of the House today.

These new arrangements will make it significantly easier for publishers to gain rights to reproduce quasi-legislative Crown material in their electronic publications. Holders of the licence, which is renewable after seven years, will be able to reproduce material without seeking prior permission from the Crown and at a standardised royalty rate.

The Government are the largest producers of information in the country and this licence offers great benefits to the electronic publishing industry—in particular, the legal publishing sector. It will help to create a climate conducive to the growth of commercial electronic information services, both on open and closed networks. This accords both with the Government's aims of increasing the competitiveness of the UK information industry and with its open government objectives of encouraging the widest possible dissemination of official material.

Special Advisers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what exceptions there are to the normal arrangements relating to the pay of special advisers. [1497]

Mr. Freeman: Yes. Special advisers are normally paid on the salary spine ranging from £20,631 to £71,517. Mr. Norman Blackwell, the head of the Prime Minister's policy unit, is an exception. When he was appointed, he was given the rank of second permanent secretary, according to established precedent.

Furthermore, Dr. Alan Kemp, special adviser to the Deputy Prime Minister, although paid at the top of the special adviser's spine also receives a payment of 15.9 per cent. of salary in lieu of superannuation.

These salary arrangements were announced at the time the appointments were made.

TREASURY

Agency Co-operation

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made on co-operation between the Inland Revenue, the Contributions Agency and Customs and Excise since 5 February. [97]

Mr. Jack: Progress on closer working between the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Contributions Agency has far exceeded expectations. The wide-ranging programme of practical measures is now delivering real benefits to business. There are currently over 30 projects in hand. Recent measures include:

- on 7 October 1996 a national employers' telephone helpline opened. It gives general advice, at local call rates, on pay-as-you-earn and national insurance issues, along with advice on VAT registration;
- joint information and advice pages are available on the Internet (www.open.gov.uk/dssca/jw/jw.htm);
- a single notification form and leaflet was introduced in April 1996, which allows new businesses to notify all three Departments that they have started up in business.

Landfill

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the environmental bodies which have made representations regarding enrolment as appropriate bodies to receive donations from landfill operators; [109]

(2) how many landfill operators in each Customs and Excise region had registered their liability as landfill operators on 1 September; [111]

(3) if he will list the landfill operators in the South Yorkshire region who had registered their liability for landfill tax on 1 September; [110]

(4) if appointments to the regulatory body set up to oversee the operation of the landfill tax will be made by open competition; [108]

(5) if he will list the members of the regulatory body set up to oversee the operation of the landfill tax already appointed. [112]

Mr. Oppenheim: I refer the hon. Lady to the letter I sent her on 25 October in reply to questions she tabled at the end of the 1995–96 Session. I have placed a copy of my letter in the Members' Library.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average per capita sum of inheritance tax collected in each of the regions of England. [92]

Mr. Jack: I regret that information at regional level is not available centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. It is provisionally estimated that in 1995–96 the average inheritance tax liability for taxpaying death estates in the United Kingdom was £73,000.

Inland Revenue (Audits)

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many joint audit visits for large employers and single audit visits pay-as-you-earn and national insurance contributions have been conducted since 6 April. [96]

Mr. Jack: Between 6 April and 30 September 1996 the Inland Revenue has conducted 31 joint visits to large employers and 18,083 single visits to check compliance with the regulations relating to PAYE and NICs.

Shipping (Tax Incentives)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce improved tax incentives for United Kingdom ship owners to invest in new tonnage; and if he will make a statement. [68]

Mr. Jack: We have introduced valuable tax measures to promote investment in new tonnage in the form of roll-over relief for capital allowances balancing charges on the sale and purchase of ships. This was extended to groups of companies in last year's Budget and has been warmly welcomed by the UK shipping industry.

The Government are of course, always willing to consider representations from the shipping industry about any particular difficulties it faces.

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the amount of tax revenue which has been lost as a result of the introduction of tax relief for profit-related pay in the years 1990 to 1996. [862]

Mr. Jack: Estimates of the cost of income tax relief for profit-related pay schemes in 1995–96 and 1996–97 are published in table 1.6 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1996", a copy of which is in the Library. Estimates for other years can be found in earlier editions.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the estimate contained in his answer to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) of 16 October 1995, Official Report, column 7, relating to the savings which will accrue as the result of the contract awarded to EDS Ltd. to provide information technology services for the Inland Revenue. [975]

Mr. Jack: At the time of signature of the contract with EDS for the provision of IT services—May 1994—the Inland Revenue estimated that the Department would save £225 million, compared with continuing in-house costs, over the 10 years of the contract. This was based on transfer of work to EDS in two phases in July 1994 and January 1996.

The latest estimate shows that total savings to the Department are still expected to be of a very similar order—in the range £220 million to £225 million—though precise figures of savings will always still depend on the future level of the Department's information technology requirements.

Ministerial Visit (China)

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the purpose of the Economic Secretary's recent visit to China. [1181]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The principal purpose of the visit was to sign the memorandum of understanding on the exchange of information and mutual assistance in securities and futures matters between the Treasury, the Securities and Investments Board and the China Securities Regulatory Commission. I also took the opportunity to call on the state organisations which are at the forefront in China's economic reform. I was accompanied by Sir

Andrew Large, chairman of the SIB, co-signatory to the MOU, Ian Salter, the deputy chairman of the London stock exchange and a delegation of senior executives from the financial services sector.

The memorandum of understanding is a landmark agreement between the United Kingdom and Chinese authorities and is the result of two years' intensive negotiation by the Treasury, the SIB and the London stock exchange. It is of immense importance to our financial services industry in opening the gates to allow it to participate in and contribute to the rapid development of China's financial services sector. In particular, it will allow Chinese companies to list on the London stock exchange. The Chinese authorities have formally recognised London's status as the international financial centre. We are the first European country to receive official Chinese recognition and the first European stock exchange to be selected for listing. The MOU signing ceremony received considerable Chinese press and media coverage.

We were welcomed extremely warmly by all our Chinese hosts and I have no doubt that this historic agreement will strengthen the increasingly close wider relations between our Government and China. My task in the financial services area was considerably eased by the successful recent visits by the Deputy Prime Minister, the President of the Board of Trade, the Minister for Trade and the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

The memorandum of understanding also has provisions for technical co-operation. My Chinese hosts impressed on me how much they can learn from London, both from a regulatory perspective and from our privatisation experience. The signing of the memorandum will therefore involve us closely in China's future economic development as the development of China's capital markets will play a key role in its economic reforms. The Chinese stressed their specialist training and educational needs and we have considerable expertise in this area.

In addition to my hosts at the CSRC, I also called on Vice-Minister Wang Chunzheng of the State Planning Commission, Assistant Minister Gao Qiang of the Ministry of Finance, Mr. Zhou Zhengqing, the Deputy Secretary General of the State Council, Deputy Governor Chen Yuan of the People's Bank of China and Vice-Minister Wu Jie of the State Commission for Restructuring Economic Systems. I took the opportunity at these meetings to emphasise London's international importance as a financial centre and the range and depth of our expertise to assist with China's economic reforms. I also took the opportunity to lobby on behalf of British banks—more branches and Reminbi (RMB) banking—and insurance companies seeking licences. On the banking front, it now seems certain that a British bank will be able to participate in local Reminbi banking which is a major step forward. The Chinese repeated their assurances that British companies would receive insurance licences in the near future.

This was a very successful delegation which I believe marks a significant step forward in our relations with China, both on financial services and more widely. We now need to maintain and build on these opportunities.

Copies of the memorandum of understanding are available in the Libraries of the House.

School Fee Payment Plans

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the tax position of investors in school fee payment plans with education trusts whose charitable status has recently been under review. [1185]

Mr. Jack: The Inland Revenue has decided that, because of advice it gave in the past about the tax treatment of investors in these plans, it will not collect tax on payments made under plans in existence on 20 June 1996. This is subject to the proviso that plans are not changed to increase the benefits which would be payable or replaced by new plans,for example, to provide benefits for a different child.

In principle, investors will be liable to tax on a proportion of any profits made from the school fee payment schemes. However, the educational trusts aim to eliminate any tax charge by ensuring that any profits are donated to charity. If a tax charge were to arise, tax legislation gives investors the right to recover any tax payable from the scheme.

This means that the position of people who have invested in these schemes in the past will be safeguarded and they should not be faced with unexpected tax liabilities. I welcome the Revenue's decision and am satisfied with the protection it provides for existing investors.

UK Tax Havens

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the loss to the Revenue as a result of the residence of (a) United Kingdom citizens and (b) companies in (i) Jersey, (ii) Guernsey and (iii) the Isle of Man. [157]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The information on which to base such an estimate is not available.

ENVIRONMENT

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further deregulation proposals he has in respect of the Health and Safety Executive. [655]

Sir Paul Beresford: In May 1994, the Health and Safety Commission published a report entitled "Review of Health and Safety Regulation". The review was the most cmprehensive examination of health and safety legislation for 20 years. The Government welcomed and accepted in full its recommendations to modernise and simplify health and safety law and to make other changes designed to reduce administrative burdens on business without lowering necessary standards of protection.

The HSC is now over halfway through its programme of work to implement the recommendations of the report. Details of the activity to be carried out in the present year are set out in the HSC plan of work 1996–97 published last May.

Water Leaks

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the Health and Safety Executive and the water companies to assess the need for risk assessment on the likelihood of water leaks from company pipes destabilising ground and producing accidents; and if he will make a statement. [443]

Sir Paul Beresford: None. Works concerned with the repair of leaking pipes are covered by current health and safety legislation which protects the company employees and members of the public. The likelihood of a leaking pipe destabilising the surrounding ground depends on a number of factors, including topography, ground conditions and the force of the leak. The main occurrences are as a result of bursts in mains pipes which are readily visible and are quickly repaired with the necessary safety precautions. All companies have introduced programmes to reduce leakage from their pipes which will also reduce the likelihood of any long-term damage to surrounding ground.

Village Pubs (Rate Relief)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will include village pubs as businesses eligible for rate relief. [894]

Sir Paul Beresford: Village pubs will be eligible for discretionary rate relief under the measures introduced in the Local Government and Rating Bill.

Waste Management

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to review the policies described in "United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste". [1182]

Mr. Clappison: The Government's policies on exports and imports of waste are set out in "United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste", which was published in 16 May 1996 following a period of public consultation in 1995 which included consultation with Community member states and the European Commission. The plan came into operation on 1 June and reflects the Government's long-standing policy of self sufficiency in waste disposal and the well-established principle of proximity—that waste should be disposed of in, or as close as possible to, the country of origin.

Since the plan was published, the Government of the Republic of Ireland, through their Department of the Environment, have made a formal request to the Government to allow the continuing export of a limited quantity of specified clinical waste until the end of 1997. This request follows the closure of all but one of the Republic's clinical waste incinerators in recent years as a result of the more demanding emission standards imposed by European legislation. The Government are minded to agree to the request from the Government of the Republic on grounds of public health and safety and in line with the proximity principle. This exemption would be in order to allow the Republic time to bring its own facilities for the environmentally sound disposal of these wastes on stream.

It has also become apparent that the plan requires clarification on one minor aspect. The plan bans most imports of waste for disposal, but exceptions are made under limited circumstances for mainly chemical wastes moving for high temperature incineration. Since publication of the plan, there have been differences in interpretation of the definition of high temperature incineration. The Government propose therefore to clarify the definition to ensure that only those wastes destined for high temperature incineration in general purpose chemical waste incinerators are permitted in the limited circumstances allowed under the plan.

My Department has therefore today published, for consultation, details of these proposed changes. Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Pensions

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to consult local government pension interests in England and Wales as part of the proposals for change initiative on new regulations governing the local government pension scheme; and if he will make a statement. [1183]

Sir Paul Beresford: In July, I announced that regulations would be prepared to give effect to the proposals for change initiative for the local government pension scheme. Today, draft regulations are being circulated for consultation with local government pension interests in England and Wales. The closing date for comments is 10 January 1997.

The scheme's provisions have been radically recast to provide new, easy-to-read regulations in a more accessible and user-friendly format. These are designed to improve the ease with which local authorities interpreted the scheme's legal provisions and to provide scheme members with a clear set of scheme rules. Many out-of-date regulations have been removed. New opportunities are included for employers to provide optional benefits for scheme members on a share cost basis. In addition, a number of other key improvements and changes are proposed, including an equalisation of future employees' contribution rates.

Existing scheme members' pension entitlements will remain statutorily protected. Eligible members would be able to benefit from any proposed changes to the scheme's provisions.

Further consultations will begin shortly covering new provisions for the investment management of local authority pension funds, revised regulations for dispute resolution within the LGPS and measures to ensure a smooth transition from the existing to the new scheme.

Several regional seminars have been arranged to explain and discuss the proposals with local government and other interested parties as an integral part of the statutory consultation exercise. I know that all LGPS interests will wish to participate fully and ensure that the new scheme regulations will provide a long-term, secure, statutory basis for the LGPS.

Subject to the outcome of these consultations, it is intended to make and lay the new scheme regulations early in 1997, with them coming into effect on 1 April 1998.

Housing

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take where a local planning authority proposes to adopt policies on affordable housing in its development plan which are inconsistent with Government guidance. [1184]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I am grateful for the opportunity to clarify the position concerning the provision of affordable housing through the planning system. The Department's policy guidance on affordable housing is set out in PPG3 revised in March 1992 and circular 13/96, published on 8 August 1996.

PPG1—planning policy guidance 1 March 1992—sets out the position, in paragraph 29, with regard to the need for development plans to avoid conflicts with national or regional policy guidance which are not justified by local circumstances. Guidance on intervention by the Department in the preparation of development plans is set out in paragraphs 4.16 to 4.17 of PPG12—February 1992—and in paragraphs 71 to 76 of the code of practice on development plans—September 1995.

Where a local planning authority has not yet adopted its local plan or unitary development plan, it will have to have regard to circular 13/96 in preparing its plan—sections 12(6), 31(6) and 36 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. However, where development plans are very close to adoption—for example, where an inquiry into proposed modifications has already been held and no further inquiry is envisaged—it may be appropriate, in order not to delay the plans, for local planning authority to adopt its plan and subsequently to prepare proposals for alterations to the plan having regard to the policy guidance in circular 13/96.

Local planning authorities should prepare such proposals for alterations expeditiously and agree timetables for alteration with the Government office for the region. In cases where local planning authorities fail to take such action promptly, the Secretary of State may well consider it appropriate to direct them to prepare alterations to their adopted development plans within a specified period—sections 21(1A)(a), 32(2)(a) and 39(1)(a) of the 1990 Act. In relation to affordable housing policies in development plans this approach will constitute a modification of the statement in the last sentence of paragraph 29 of PPG1 which reads;

"if no such intervention is made, local authorities may take it that the Secretaries of State are content with the plan at the time of adoption and will attach commensurate weight to it in decisions they make on appeals on called-in applications".

Where plans which include policies which conflict with the guidance in circular 13/96 had been adopted prior to the publication of the circular, the need to have regard to the circular should be taken into account when the plan is reviewed. All local planning authorities will have to take into account the policy guidance in the new circular in determining applications for planning permission—paragraphs 20 and 21 of PPG1.

Urban Waste Water Treatment

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of advice from the National Rivers Authority on estuary boundaries under the EC urban waste water treatment directive; and if he will make a statement. [1186]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Earlier this year, my Department asked the National Rivers Authority—now the Environment Agency—to make recommendations for reconsidering the criteria for determining estuary boundaries for the purposes of the EC urban waste water treatment directive, specifically looking at the Severn, the Humber, and Swansea bay.

Having considered the agency's recommendations, my Secretary of State, together with the Secretary of State for Wales, has decided on the following:

to draw the seaward limit of the Severn estuary at a line from Lavenock point through the Holms to Howe Rock on Brean Down; to return the seaward limit of the Parrett Estuary to the Clean Rivers (Estuaries and Tidal Waters) Act 1960 boundary, being a line drawn from Howe Rock on Brean Down to Hinckley Point; (the Parrett estuary boundary was considered during the setting of the Severn Estuary boundary in 1994 and the agency considered it appropriate to reconsider it during this exercise).

similarly, to return the seaward limits of the Humber and of Swansea Bay to the 1960 Act boundaries, being:

(a) for the Humber, a line drawn from Spurn Head to Donna Nook at TF434029971;

(b) for Swansea Bay, a line drawn from Mumbles Head to Sker Point.

These decisions will mean that all sewage discharges of a size greater than 2,000 population equivalent into these newly defined estuarine waters will be required to have secondary treatment.

The outer boundaries for all other estuaries in England and Wales are to remain the same as those used by the Environment Agency for other purposes. These are also the boundaries established by the Department for UWWTD purposes in 1994.

Global Temperatures

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates have been made by his Department for 10-year projections in global temperatures in each of the last five years. [497]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The 1995 second scientific assessment from the intergovernmental panel on climate change suggests that the underlying rise in global average temperature will be about 0.1 to 0.2 deg C over the next decade. The actual temperature changes will be strongly affected by natural variability. The comparable estimate in the first IPCC scientific assessment in 1990 was 0.3 deg C per decade; the 1995 estimate is lower because it has taken into account the cooling effect of aerosols produced by man-made sulphur dioxide emissions.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Works of Art (Export)

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when the 1995–96 report of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art will be published. [1187]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The reviewing committee's annual report, 1995–96, has been published today, and copies have been laid before Parliament.

BBC

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received about the BBC's observation of clause 4.4(e) of its agreement with her Department; and if she will make a statement. [499]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 28 October 1996]: Representations have been received from the Broadcasting Campaign for Scotland. My officials are discussing with the BBC the provision of the information required under clause 4.4(e) of the agreement to ensure that it is made available in the BBC's annual reports or elsewhere as appropriate. Meanwhile, the hon. Member will be aware that the BBC Scotland annual review 1995–96, published on 25 October, includes further information about BBC production in Scotland.

Football Trust

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the income of the Football Trust in each week since 1 November 1994 (a) in total, (b) from pool betting duty and (c) from spot the ball. [500]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 28 October 1996]: Football Trust weekly income from 1 November 1994 is set out in the table.

PRIME MINISTER

European Council (Dublin)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals were put by Her Majesty's Government to the special Heads of Government European Council meeting in Dublin on 5 October; what was the response by the other Governments; and if he will place in the Library copies of all papers discussed at the Council. [231]

The Prime Minister: The Dublin European Council on 5 October was informal. There were no papers for discussion or Council conclusions. I set out British priorities for the intergovernmental conference and my belief that the IGC must focus on essential reform to help prepare for further enlargement and to tackle other significant challenges which Europe will face over the next few years.

Internet

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to open a web site for 10 Downing street. [897]

The Prime Minister: My Office will shortly be opening a Downing street World Wide Web site.

BSE and CJD

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will establish an independent judicial inquiry into bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. [842]

The Prime Minister: The Government receive independent expert scientific advice on BSE and CJD from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee. Issues to do with BSE and CJD have recently been examined in detail by the Agriculture and Health Select Committees. I see no need for a judicial inquiry on this issue.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 29 October. [997]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 29 October. [978]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

SCOTLAND

Dance and Drama Students

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make financial assistance available to dance and drama students living in Scotland, on a similar basis to the support currently available to students living in England; and if he will make a statement. [976]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The position of Scottish domiciled students attending dance and drama courses is being kept under review as the proposals currently being discussed between the Department for Education and Employment, the Department of National Heritage and the Arts Council of England develop. The Arts Council of England scheme does not come into force until September 1997.

WALES

Tourism Industry

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what considerations underlie his policy on a minimum wage in respect of the tourism industry. [88]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The determination of pay levels in the tourism industry is not a matter for the Government: it is for the industry to decide what is fair and reasonable and can be afforded. It is our objective to see the greatest growth of the tourism industry and tourism employment, not to see workers priced out of jobs by minimum wages that cannot be afforded.

Conwy Council (Finances)

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ask the district auditor to investigate the finances of Conwy council. [215]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The district auditor has already been appointed to Conwy council and will be looking at the finances of the authority as part of the normal audit process.

DEFENCE

Spending Cuts (Jobs)

4. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the effect on the number of jobs in the defence industry of reducing United Kingdom defence spending to the European average. [351]

Mr. Portillo: A reduction in UK defence expenditure to the current NATO European average would involve cuts of more than £4.5 billion per year. This would have a devastating effect on the capability of our armed forces and on jobs in the defence industry.

Army Bands

15. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of British Army bands. [362]

Mr. Soames: Army bands make a superb contribution to sustaining the morale of service personnel. In addition to providing musical support for state, Army and other service functions, non-service functions, public relations and recruiting, they provide ready-trained in transit medical attendants in time of war.

Dartmoor National Park

16. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about his Department's environmental policy in relation to the Dartmoor national park. [363]

Mr. Soames: My Department is committed to the protection of the natural environment for all its estate, including national parks, by avoiding harm or nuisance while maintaining the operational effectiveness of our armed forces. We conduct our activities in accordance with the Government's overall environment policy.

Cadet Forces

17. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the impact of membership of three services cadet forces on the future job prospects of young people. [364]

Mr. Soames: Membership of the cadet forces brings immense benefits to the education and development of the young people of this country. I believe that when cadets finish their education and seek jobs, the qualities that they have gained in the cadet forces will be highly valued by their employers.

RAF St. Athan

18. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the future prospects for RAF St. Athan. [365]

Mr. Arbuthnot: RAF St. Athan will continue to provide vital engineering support to the front line.

Army Strength

19. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the strength of the Army in 1990; and what will be the strength of the Army under current plans by the end of the decade. [366]

Mr. Soames: The total regular strength of the Army in 1990 was 152,800. The manpower planning target for 2000 is presently 115,000. Both figures include trainees, but exclude Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service) personnel.

27. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the size of the shortfall in the strength of the Army as at 1 October. [376]

Mr. Soames: Figures for October are not yet available. The shortfall in the strength of the Army at 1 September 1996 was 5,350.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the total trained strength of the British Army in April 1997. [1061]

Mr. Soames: The estimated total trained strength of the British Army at 1 April 1997 is 101,000. This figure includes British and Gurkha trained personnel but excludes trained Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service) troops.

Junior Leaders

20. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent consultations he has had over the issue of junior leaders. [367]

Mr. Soames: The Army is considering the possibility of reintroducing some form of junior entry scheme for 16-year-olds, but we must balance the likely benefits against the costs before arriving at the decision.

Army Recruitment

21. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the target for Army recruitment for the current year. [368]

Mr. Soames: The Army's recruitment targets for 1996–97 are:

Soldiers: 15,100.

Telecommunications

22. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to announce the contract for the defence fixed telecommunications system. [369]

Mr. Soames: We currently intend to announce the preferred contractor for the defence fixed telecommunications system in the next few weeks. We expect that the contract will be let in March 1997 subject to the outcome of negotiations with the preferred contractor.

Trident Programme

23. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the progress of the Trident programme. [370]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Trident programme is proceeding to time and within budget. HMS Vanguard and HMS Victorious are operational. The third submarine of the class, Vigilant, is being commissioned early next month and will enter service in 1998. The fourth vessel, Vengeance, is under construction at VSEL, Barrow in Furness, and will enter service around the turn of the century.

Small Arms Ammunition

24. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on defence procurement policy in respect of small arms ammunition. [371]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The procurement of small arms ammunition is designed to meet the armed forces' requirements in a cost-effective manner. In seeking best value for money, competition remains the cornerstone of our policy.

Defence Spending

25. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much was spent on defence in (a) 1986 and (b) 1990; and what is the estimated amount for the current year. [372]

Mr. Soames: Defence spending was £18.4 billion in 1986–87 and £21.7 billion in 1990–91. The planned spending for the current financial year is £21.4 billion.

Recruitment (Ethnic Minorities)

26. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the United Kingdom armed forces is currently recruited from ethnic minorities. [374]

Mr. Soames: Approximately 1 per cent. of armed forces personnel are from ethnic minorities.

Army Training Regiment

28. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the present and future role of the Army training regiment. [377]

Mr. Soames: No changes are planned in respect of the role or location of the Army training regiment at Lichfield, or any of the other four ATRs, Bassingbourn, Pirbright, Winchester and Glencorse.

Low Flying

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons a military aircraft passed very low over Doncaster at 7.46 pm on 11 September. [446]

Mr. Soames: Since Doncaster is listed for avoidance by low flying military aircraft, the RAF police have been tasked to make inquiries into the alleged overflight. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member when these inquiries are complete.

Land Mines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of purchase of the US designed scatterable mine system due to enter service in 1999; and what on-going maintenance and testing costs will be associated with this system. [395]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The procurement cost of the vehicle launched scatterable anti-tank mine system due to enter service in 1999 is some £90 million. The costs of maintenance and support for its planned 20-year life is estimated at £55 million.

Procurement

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on guidelines for partnership in Ministry of Defence procurement. [199]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Following discussions between my Department and the Confederation of British Industry, a joint guidance note has been published on "Partnering between MOD and its Suppliers". A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Armed Forces

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the size of the reduction in the armed forces between 1 April 1990 and 1 April 1999 under his Department's current plans; and if he will make a statement. [503]

Mr. Soames: The total service strength of the regular armed forces at 1 April 1990 was 314,700. The estimated strength at 1 April 1999 under current plans is 213,500, representing a reduction of 32 per cent. Both figures include Gurkha strengths. The former excludes, however, the then Ulster Defence Regiment and the latter excludes the Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service) force. The figures include an element for personnel undergoing training.

Argentinian Beef

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what purchases of Argentinian beef have been made by the British Army to feed Her Majesty's forces in the last year. [788]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The procurement of food for the armed forces is contracted to the Navy, Army and Air Force Institutes. My Department does not specify the source of origin from which NAAFI should obtain beef—or any other meat—but expects it to seek the best market price for the product. The majority of our requirements are for frozen beef which is not readily available from the British market and I understand that on cost grounds the majority of beef joints have been sourced from South America, predominantly Brazil and Uruguay. NAAFI indicates that in the last year approximately 12 tonnes of frozen beef was sourced from Argentina; this represents less than 1 per cent. of the annual frozen meat requirements for the armed forces. Additionally, a range of beef products including sirloin, foreribs, minced and diced beef are normally procured in the UK along with other meat and poultry produce.

Nuclear Submarines

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made towards removing the radioactive material form the nuclear submarines currently docked at the Rosyth naval base; and if he will make a statement. [858]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Of the seven decommissioned nuclear-powered submarines stored afloat at Rosyth, four have completed their defuel, de-equip and lay-up preparation—DDLP—process, one is nearing completion, and two have yet to commence. The DDLP process includes the removal of the spent fuel.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to store decommissioned nuclear submarines in the Holy loch on the Clyde; and if he will make a statement. [859]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We have no plans to store decommissioned nuclear submarines in the Holy loch.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what plans he has for the out of service nuclear submarines currently docked at the Rosyth naval base; and if he will make a statement; [860]

(2) what assessment he has made of the sites in the United Kingdom which are appropriate for the storage of decommissioned nuclear submarines; and if he will make a statement. [857]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Government consider that it is appropriate for decommissioned nuclear-powered submarines to be stored safely afloat at the location where they are decommissioned, pending disposal. Decommissioned nuclear submarines are currently stored at Rosyth and Devonport.

Peacekeeping

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of British forces' contribution to peacekeeping operations worldwide. [979]

Mr. Soames: Our continuing contributions to peacekeeping operations around the world represent a substantial commitment, fully consistent with our position as a permanent Security Council member. Over 9,000 ground troops are serving with the NATO implementation force in Bosnia, supported by about 500 air and maritime personnel offshore and in Italy. Over 400 personnel are engaged in operations under UN command, and some 400 more in support of Security Council resolutions over Iraq.

Tanks

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the advantages of the leasing of tanks; and if he will make a statement. [1060]

Mr. Arbuthnot: No consideration has been given to the leasing of tanks under the private finance initiative. However, it is our policy that, subject to considerations of operational effectiveness and value for money, there are no "no go" areas for PFI in the MOD. PFI projects can reach close to the front line and impact directly on operational capability.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Schools Budget

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what is the current total for the national schools budget; [4]

(2) what proportion of the national schools budget is currently transmitted to schools; [7]

(3) what is the average amount currently deducted from the national schools budget by local education authorities; [6]

(4) what action she will take to reduce the amount of local education authority holdback. [5]

Mr. Robin Squire: The total amount of the general schools budget as recorded in the local management of schools budget statements produced by the local education authorities in England for 1996–97 is £15,383.6 million, exclusive of capital expenditure and capital financing costs. The proportion of this figure delegated to schools through the aggregated schools budget is 79 per cent. The 21 per cent. retained centrally by LEAs amounts to £3,226.4 million, an average of £27.1 million per LEA.

The Government's plans for requiring a further reduction in "LEA holdback" are set out in chapter 2 of the White Paper "Self-Government for Schools", Cm 3315.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people formerly in receipt of incapacity benefit who have signed on as unemployed during the year April 1995 to April 1996 have (a) been referred to placing, assessment and counselling teams, (b) taken up a place on a job club, (c) taken up a job interview guarantee, (d) taken up a place on a job plan workshop and (e) received assistance from the access to work scheme. [412]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Alan Howarth, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the number of people formerly in receipt of Incapacity Benefit who have signed on as unemployed during the year April 1995 to April 1996, and how many have subsequently been referred to various employment programmes. This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

I have set out as much of the information you requested as we have available in the attached tables. It is not, however, possible to provide the figures you request for referrals to Placing, Assessment and Counselling Teams (PACTS), as prior to the current financial year these were not counted. Instead I have provided figures for the number of assessments undertaken for people with disabilities.

It may be helpful if I explain that the purpose of assessment is to help jobseekers identify a realistic work goal, and steps to achieve their goal. Assessment can consist of interviewing and counselling, occupational inventories, work samples and psychological tests, using whatever methods are appropriate to clients' needs. Assessment is delivered by Disability Employment Advisers (DEAs), Occupational Psychologists and other internal and external specialists.

In addition, the figures for the number of people who have started on Job Interview Guarantee (JIG) in the current financial year, are included in "Numbers of Starting in Other Programmes". Access to Work starts are included in "Numbers starting on specialists programmes" in both financial year.

I hope this is helpful.

Access to Work Scheme

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her latest estimate of (a) the cost and (b) the number receiving assistance through the access to work scheme; and of these how many are (i) unemployed; (ii) employees and (iii) self-employed. [414]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Alan Howarth, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the estimated cost and numbers receiving assistance through Access to Work, and the numbers who are unemployed, employed and self-employed. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

For the period April to September 1996, £6.5m has been spent and a further £6m is already committed to be spent. During this period we helped 1,452 new beneficiaries of whom 666 were unemployed, 701 were employed and 85 were self employed. About 4,200 others continue to receive help agreed before April.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her estimate of the cost of removing the employer and self-employed contributions payable under the access to work scheme. [415]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Alan Howarth, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the estimated cost of removing the cost sharing element of Access to Work. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

It is too early to say what expenditure on Access to Work will be this year and consequently what would be the effect of returning to a situation in which the Employment Service paid all approved costs.

However, the demand for Access to Work in 1995–96 was such that, in spite of restrictions from December 1995 on the help given to employed and self-employed people, expenditure exceeded the budget by some £6 million. Growth on this scale indicated that expenditure in 1996–97 would have exceeded the budget available leading to restrictions again having to be imposed on applications. Employed and self-employed people have been eligible for help since 1 June, and the introduction of cost sharing means that this year's allocation of £19 million will ensure that help continues to be available to those who most need it.

I hope this is helpful.

Jobfinder's Grant

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her estimate of the cost of extending and jobfinder's grant to people receiving severe disablement allowance, incapacity benefit and income support at the time of their application. [413]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Alan Howarth, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the cost of extending Jobfinder's Grant to people receiving Severe Disablement Allowance, Incapacity Benefit and Income Support. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Based on client information supplied by the Benefits Agency, and assuming a similar take up to that of our current target group, the maximum additional cost would be £14.3 million.

I hope that this is helpful.

School Equipment Survey

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what reasons she has not published the results of the survey conducted by an Office for Standards in Education inspector into the link between the provision of books and equipment in schools and effective teaching; and if she will make a statement. [144]

Mr. Robin Squire: This is a matter for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, who heads the Office for Standards in Education. I have asked Mr. Chris Woodhead to write to the hon. Member.

Hampstead Garden Suburb Institute

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total payment by the Further Education Funding Council to the Hampstead Garden Suburb Institute in 1995–96; which courses were supported by the Further Education Funding Council; and what is the current estimate of likely grant by the Further Education Funding Council in 1996–97. [85]

Mr. Paice: In 1995–96 the Further Education Funding Council paid Hampstead Garden Suburb Institute recurrent funding of £125,992. The institute's recurrent funding for 1996–97 has yet to be finalised, but is likely to be around the same level as in 1995–96. Details of the courses for which the institute is funded are a matter for the FEFC. I am therefore asking the council's chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

National Curriculum

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the provision in the national curriculum which enables the teaching of (a) citizenship, (b) social skills and (c) parenting; and if she will make a statement. [399]

Mrs. Gillan: There is scope for schools to cover citizenship, social skills and parenting under section 1 of the Education Reform Act 1988.

Citizenship can also be covered in religious education, and within national curriculum subjects such as history and English; and social skills and parenthood can be covered in sex education, provision for which is enshrined in sections 352 and 403 to 405 of the Education Act 1993.

Pupils (Expenditure)

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much was spent per (a) primary and (b) secondary school pupil in each of the local education authorities in England in the most recent year for which figures are available, at constant prices. [964]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following table sets out for each local education authority in England the net institutional expenditure per pupil in LEA-maintained (a) pre-primary/primary schools and (b) secondary schools.

Higher Education Institutions

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list those higher education institutions which do not have cash reserves to cover 30 days of total expenditure. [790]

Mr. Forth: No. The information requested is commercially sensitive and, if published, could damage the financial health of individual universities and colleges.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list, by higher education institution, reductions in (a) academic and (b) non-academic staff in 1996. [791]

Mr. Forth: The higher education statistics agency collects data on academic and non-academic staff in higher education institutions. Information for 1995–96 is not yet available.

Schools (Religious Sects)

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list those independent schools run by religious sects that have applied for grant-maintained status. [792]

Mrs. Gillan: The following is a list of all the independent schools whose proposals to join the grant-maintained sector are currently under consideration:

Loreto RC grammar school, Altrincham, Cheshire;

St. Ambrose RC secondary school, Trafford;

Torah Temimah Jewish primary school, Brent;

Mount St. Mary's RC independent convent school, Exeter;

Virgo Fidelis RC convent school, Croydon;

Menorah Foundation Jewish primary school, Barnet;

John Loughborough school, Haringey (Seventh Day Adventist).

Student Governors

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list those further education colleges that have no student governor. [793]

Mr. Paice: This information is not held by the Department. It is for individual college corporations to determine whether to appoint a student governor.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sudan

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government are taking (a) directly and (b) through international agencies, to help relieve the position in the Sudan; and if he will make a statement on Government contacts with different factions in that country. [131]

Mr. Hanley: The UK has given over £100 million of humanitarian assistance to Sudan and Sudanese refugees since 1991. This aid is disbursed through non-governmental organisations and the UN's Operation Lifeline Sudan. Officials in London, Khartoum and Nairobi are in regular touch with the parties to the civil war and other Sudanese groups.

Montserrat

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in Montserrat in respect of the recent volcanic eruptions; and if he will make a statement on the Montserrat Government's advice to local inhabitants. [665]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Montserrat experienced its latest volcanic eruption on 17 and 18 September 1996 affecting most southern parts of the island, which has been evacuated since April 1996 for all but essential business. There were no injuries. Scientists have warned that there could be further explosions; however, they continue to believe that the north of Montserrat is safe from volcanic activity. We remain committed to helping the people of Montserrat, and to giving the highest priority to the safety of the islanders. The Governor, British administrators, and scientific experts continue to work closely with the Government of Montserrat on a comprehensive warning system, on the regular reviewing of areas deemed to be unsafe, and on associated contingency planning.

The Government of Montserrat have advised local inhabitants to remain alert for scientific reports which are issued twice daily and for announcements from the civilian authorities.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to require the Benefits Agency to revise the Benefits Agency code of practice regarding the structure of interviews and the range and type of questions to be put to unemployed people during interviews connected with the jobseeker's allowance. [472]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked for him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mrs. Ann Clwyd, dated 29 October 1996:

Your question to the Secretary of State for Social Security regarding the structure of interviews and the range and type of questions to be put to unemployed people under Jobseeker's Allowance has been passed to me for reply, as these are issues which are the responsibility of the Employment Service.

In response to the first part of your question, about the Benefits Agency Code of Practice (BA COP). I understand that BA have no plans to include specific guidance on interviewing unemployed people within it.

However, it may be helpful if I explain that as part of the work undertaken for the introduction of JSA, we in the Employment Service (ES) have produced a full set of procedural guidance for all our people, as they will be responsible for most of the interviewing connected with the Jobseeker's Allowance. This includes guidance on all aspects of the interviewing policy which is to be adopted. I have arranged for copies of these particular volumes to be sent to you at the House.

I hope this is helpful.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cattle Slaughter Scheme

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library a copy of the proposal by the EU Commission to reduce the payment rate for animals under the slaughter scheme which was agreed to by the beef management Committee. [193]

Mr. Baldry: Copies of the Commission regulation, EC No. 1974/96 of 15 October 1996, which will reduce the rate of payment from 1 ecu to 0.9 ecu per kg liveweight on eligible animals slaughtered under the over-30 month scheme, have been placed in the Library.

Organophosphates

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the level of use of organophosphates in (a) sheep dips and (b) farming in general in each year since 1970. [1018]

Mrs Browning: The Ministry does not hold this information for sheep dips. Figures for the use of organophosphate agricultural pesticides in Great Britain are available from 1975 but, up to 1993, only as the average of several years. The figures are:

1975 to 1979: 618 tonnes annually

1980 to 1983: 622 tonnes annually

1984 to 1989: 617 tonnes annually

1990 to 1993: 512 tonnes annually

1994: 703 tonnes

1995: 241 tonnes.

Fishing Catches

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of fish have been landed in each of the last three years in Brixham; what is the estimated value of the catch; and if he will make a statement; [1070]

Mr. Baldry: The quantity and value of recorded landings by UK registered and licensed vessels into Brixham for the last three years are:

Year	Quantity (thousand tonnes liveweight)	Value (£ million)
1993	9.0	13.8
1994	9.2	14.8
1995	10.3	17.7

Decommissioning

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) beam trawlers and (b) other fishing vessels have been decommissioned in each of the last three years (i) nationally and (ii) in Brixham, south Devon; and how many fishing vessels he expects to be decommissioned in 1997. [1069]

Mr. Baldry: A total of 436 vessels were decommissioned under the 1993, 1994 and 1995 decommissioning schemes. Eighteen of these were beam trawlers. Fourteen vessels with Brixham as their administrative port have been decommissioned, none of which was a beam trawler. Definitive results for the 1996 scheme are not yet available as applicants have until 30 November to decommission their vessels. Decommissioning is an entirely voluntary scheme and I am unable to estimate the number of vessels which might be decommissioned under the 1997 scheme.

Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) sheep and (b) pigs were rejected as unfit to travel prior to export in each of July, August and September; and if he will make a statement. [798]

Mrs. Browning: Animals rejected as unfit for transport prior to export:

	July	August	September
Sheep	379	574	607
Pigs	62	27	42

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many consignments of live lambs and sheep have been exported since 5 July to each of the following destinations as declared under the terms of the Welfare of Animals During Transport Order 1994, (a) Loker in Belgium, (b) Zuilichem in the Netherlands, (c) Elst in the Netherlands, (d) Morkhoven in Belgium and (e) Pervijze in Belgium; and how many animals in total have been exported to each of the above destinations since 5 July. [797]

Mrs. Browning: Information gathered by the Ministry's staff monitoring exports at Dover during July, August and September shows:

	Animals	Consignments
Loker	56,286	110
Zuilichem	74,172	111
Elst	5,158	8
Morkhoven	21,874	38
Pervijze	5,782	7

Fishing Methods

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to have available for publication the results of the experiment his Department is conducting into trialing old fishing methods using the restored fishing smack Excelsior; and if he will make a statement. [177]

Mr. Baldry: The Excelsior trials have been postponed because she is undergoing a refit.

Plaice Quota

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has received from his officials about the fishing industry at Lowestoft about how long the 1996 plaice quota will last; and what steps he is taking to swap quotas elsewhere for plaice quota for Lowestoft until the end of 1996. [178]

Mr. Baldry: Quota allocations for North sea plaice and other stocks are issued annually to individual groups within the fleet, including fish producers' organisations, which are responsible for managing these allocations on behalf of their members. The rate of quota uptake will vary between different groups, reflecting factors such as the availability of fish and commercial decisions by the groups and their members. As at 24 October 1996, the Lowestoft Fish Producers' Organisation had taken 87.5 per cent. of its North sea plaice allocation for 1996, compared with 80.1 per cent. for the UK as a whole. It is open to the Lowestoft PO to seek to swap quota with other groups in order to obtain additional plaice, should the PO judge this to be necessary.

Mr. Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on why 360 tonnes of North sea plaice received from Norway in September were swapped with the Netherlands for other species; what consultations were undertaken with the fishing industry; and how the swap was administered under the 1996 quota management rules. [179]

Mr. Baldry: Earlier this year, the Commission secured an extra 1,250 tonnes of North sea plaice from Norway in exchange for 10,000 tonnes of EU blue whiting from areas Vb, VI and VII. The UK share of the extra plaice was some 360 tonnes. After careful consideration, and having regard to the 1996 quota management rules, it was decided to use the additional plaice to acquire a range of other stocks from the Netherlands. Specific consultation with the fishing industry was not necessary. The stocks obtained have been distributed proportionately to industry except for North area sole which is being allocated to the under-10m fleet in order to ensure that the fishery remains open into the autumn, having been closed for the first three months of 1996.

HEALTH

Health Authority Chairmen (Credit Cards)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many chairmen of NHS health authorities have been provided with regional corporate credit cards since 1993. [444]

Mr. Malone: Three chairmen of the former regional health authorities are known to have been issued with corporate credit cards by their authorities.

NHS Dentists' Pay

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what location the administration of NHS dentists' pay is handled. [448]

Mr. Malone: National health service dentists' fees in England are administered and paid by the Dental Practice Board, Eastbourne.

Northern and Yorkshire Region

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arbitration on contracts between purchasers and providers has taken place in the Northern and Yorkshire health region since 1 April; which authorities and trusts were involved; when the arbitration guidance was issued and to which financial year it referred. [458]

Mr. Malone: One formal contract arbitration has taken place in Northern and Yorkshire region since 1 April 1996, between Leeds health authority and United Leeds Teaching Hospitals national health service trust.

For 1996–97, NHS executive Northern and Yorkshire sent guidance on contract arbitration to all health authorities and trusts in the Northern and Yorkshire region on 16 February 1996.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will amend the conditions for free prescriptions to include haemophiliacs whose spouses are in employment; and if he will make a statement. [140]

Mr. Malone: There are no plans to extend the groups entitled to free prescriptions to include any other group on the basis of either medical condition or income.

NHS Hospitality

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what authority members of NHS health authorities may provide themselves with free meals when attending meetings. [429]

Mr. Horam: National health service bodies are required to develop their own guidelines on the use of hospitality budgets, to ensure that such spending is not excessive and justifiable to the public and auditors.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will seek to persuade the Royal College of Psychiatrists to act on the recommendation of the inquiry into the care and aftercare of Miss Sharon Campbell, Cm 440, 1988, and publish a document on good practice for discharge and aftercare procedures, after seeking a consensus with bodies representing nursing, social work, general practitioners, psychology and occupational therapy. [1030]

Mr. Burns: I refer the hon. Member to the reply the then Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), gave on 11 June 1996, Official Report, columns 109–10.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of their total budget is spent on mental health by each health authority. [263]

Mr. Burns: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Arachnoiditis

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research the NHS is undertaking into the causes of arachnoiditis. [795]

Mr. Horam: No such research has been commissioned centrally.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the Arachnoiditis Trust about the difficulties that sufferers from arachnoiditis experience in seeking information about their condition from health authorities. [794]

Mr. Horam: None.

Social Workers

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many approved social workers have been registered for each of the last seven years. [260]

Mr. Burns: The information requested is not held centrally. The Department collected partial information for September 1993, which indicated there were then around 4,750 approved social workers in England. Data for England and Wales for 1994 and 1995 are given in the 1995 edition of the "Social Services Workforce Analysis" published by the Local Government Management Board on the basis of surveys it conducted. Copies of this document will be placed in the Library.

Supervised Discharges

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are on (a) supervised discharge and (b) supervision registers. [261]

Mr. Burns: Centrally held statistical returns on supervised discharge are incomplete and publication at this stage would be misleading. The number of people on supervision registers is about 3,500.

NHS Funding

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the percentage capitation target according to the weighted capitation allocation formula of each health authority. [262]

Mr. Horam: A table showing final 1996–97 health authority distance from targets in percentage terms has been placed in the Library.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the implications for his policy on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease of the latest medical findings of Professor John Collinge. [841]

Mr. Horam: There are no implications for our policy on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease in Professor Collinge's latest findings.

Professor Collinge has provided the first experimental evidence to support the view that there may be a link between bovine spongiform encephalopathy and new variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease—nvCJD. All the measures we have taken since 1989 to protect public health have been taken on the assumption that exposure to BSE could cause disease in humans and these latest findings do not change that.

Challenge Fund

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the health authorities which received challenge fund money, giving the amount. [264]

Mr. Burns: The table shows all health authorities which have been awarded funds.

Cancelled Operations

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library figures by health authority of the number of operations cancelled on the day of, or the day after, admission to hospital and the number of those patients not readmitted within a month for the first quarter of 1995–96. [265]

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations were cancelled in (a) each district health authority and (b) each region on the day of or day after admission to hospital; and how many of those patients were not readmitted within a month, for the first quarter of 1996. [981]

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations were cancelled on the day of admission or after admission to hospital by each health authority in each of the first two quarters of 1996 and in each quarter of 1995 and 1994. [1127]

Mr. Horam: The latest information has been placed in the Library.

Ian Greer Associates

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital trusts have made payments to Ian Greer Associates; and what was the value of these payments. [1121]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

TRANSPORT

Helicopter and Aircraft Noise

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the redress in law available to people who are disturbed by low-flying helicopters in the early hours of the morning when the helicopters were operating under permission issued by the Civil Aviation Authority for filming purposes. [3]

Mr. Bowis: Under section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, no action may lie in respect of trespass or nuisance because of overflight, provided that the conditions referred to in section 76(1) have been duly complied with. Subsection (2) sets out the circumstances under which damages in respect of material loss or damage may be recoverable. Legislation similar to section 76 has been in force since the early days of aviation, and comparable laws exist in other countries.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to make changes to section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. [1]

Mr. Bowis: No.

Vehicle Registration Office (Stoke-on-Trent)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications for people in north Staffordshire of the closure of the Stoke-on-Trent vehicle registration office; and if he will reconsider his decision. [43]

Mr. Bowis: The decision to close Stoke-on-Trent vehicle registration office was taken following a detailed review of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency's need for local offices. It was concluded that future needs could be met by a network of 41 offices giving customers an accessible local service within about 30 miles. This reduction will enable the agency to make significant efficiency savings on running costs.

It also takes account of a reduction in work load which will accrue from a project which enable dealers to register and licence new cars without having to visit a vehicle registration office so frequently.

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the average daily number of takeoffs and landings at Heathrow airport in the first nine months of 1996; what was the average daily number of night flights in the same period; and what were the corresponding figures for the first nine months of 1995. [87]

Mr Bowis: I understand from National Air Traffic Services that the average daily number of takeoffs and landings at Heathrow airport in the first nine months of 1996 was 1,210 (605 arrivals and departures each) compared with 1,198 (599 arrivals and departures each) in 1995. The average daily number of night flights (2300 to 0700 hours local time) in the time period was 51 (43 arrivals and eight departures) in 1996, compared with 54 (45 arrivals and nine departures) in 1995. Of these, 15 (14 arrivals and one departure) were in the night quota period (2300 to 0600), compared with 16 (15 arrivals and one departure) in 1995.

Shipping Register

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of ships on the British register for each of the last 10 years. [24]

Mr. Bowis: The number of United Kingdom registered trading vessels of 500 gross tons and over for the last 10 years are listed in table 3.5 of "Merchant Fleet Statistics 1995". The information is as follows:

United Kingdom registered trading vessels 500 gross tons or over 31 December 1986 to 31 December 1995

Tonnage in thousand

	Number	Gross tonnage	Deadweight tonnage
1986	482	7,024	10,349
1987	410	4,877	6,234
1988	375	4,532	5,619
1989	361	4,236	5,193
1990	337	3,697	4,213
1991	321	3,433	3,812
1992	291	3,329	3,749
1993	273	3,327	3,722
1994	282	3,637	3,889

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has undertaken to increase the number of ships on the British register; and if he will make a statement. [23]

Mr. Bowis: The Government have adopted a range of targeted measures to improve the attractiveness of the Red Ensign. These have included: simplification of registration and other technical procedures; provision of substantial assistance for seafarer training; liberalisation of outdated officer nationality requirements; and the introduction of roll-over tax relief for replacing aging tonnage.

Highways Agency Staff

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many senior staff in the Highways Agency have taken early retirement in each of the last five years. [58]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking how many senior staff in the Highways Agency have taken early retirement in each of the last five years.

The numbers are as follows:

1992: Nil

1993: Nil

1994: 2

1995: 7

1996: 2.

Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the original budget for the Jubilee line extension; and what is his Department's latest estimate of the cost. [201]

Mr. Bowis: In 1993, the budget for the construction of the Jubilee line extension, together with the upgrading of the existing Jubilee line, was approximately £2.1 billion at outturn prices.

I understand that London Transport now estimates that the final outturn cost will be approximately £2.6 billion.

These figures include the impact of inflation.

Driving Tests

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to reduce the waiting times for driving tests. [18]

Mr. Bowis: The Driving Standards Agency has recruited some 170 contract examiners and delayed the planned retirement of existing examiners. The agency has targeted those centres where demand is greatest and has made more tests available on Saturday and weekday evenings.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the current incidence of impersonation in respect of driving test. [17]

Mr. Bowis: Since 1 January 1996, some 150 cases of possible candidate impersonation at the practical driving test have been reported to the police, although none of these cases has yet resulted in conviction. There have been no reported cases of suspected impersonations at the driving theory test.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take further action to enforce legislation that ensures that candidates undertaking driving tests are allowed to do so only after producing a signed driving licence. [16]

Mr. Bowis: Driving test candidates are required to present their signed driving licence at the beginning of their theory or practical driving test. When the licence is unsigned, the candidate must sign it before the test starts. From 1 March 1997, candidates will be required to produce photographic identification with their licence at both theory and practical tests.

Motorways (Slow Vehicles)

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at what speed vehicles are classified as slow moving on motorways; and if he will make a statement. [835]

Mr. Watts: As there is no minimum speed limit on motorways, there is no specified speed at which vehicles are classified as slow moving. However, vehicles must be able to attain a speed of 25 mph when unladen and not drawing a trailer before being permitted to use motorways. Motorists may be prosecuted if they drive in an inconsiderate, careless or dangerous manner.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidelines he has issued to the police for cautioning drivers on motorways for travelling too slowly. [834]

Mr. Watts: None. Individual chief officers of police are responsible for the policing of motorways in their respective areas.

Rail Safety

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for transport what is his policy regarding the release of information relating to matters affecting rail safety which are of public concern. [115]

Mr. Watts: The Department of Transport, the Health and Safety Commission and the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate's policy is to make information on railway safety available, in line with the code of practice on access to Government information.

Comprehensive information on railway safety is published in Her Majesty's railway inspectorate's annual report on the safety record of the railways in Great Britain.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many railway passengers riding in (a) mark I carriages and (b) carriages of later design and manufacture were killed in train accidents as defined by Her Majesty's chief inspector of railways in 1986 and in each year since then. [762]

Mr. Watts: The number of passengers killed, in mark I rolling stock and carriages of later design, in train accidents since 1986 is set out in the following table:

	Mark I	Later design
1986	8	—
1987	3	—
1988	34	—
1989	6	—

Working Hours

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will lift the exemptions relating to transport workers to allow them to comply with EC regulations limiting the working week to 48 hours; and if he will make a statement. [21]

Mr. Watts: Article 1(3) of the working time directive states that the directive shall apply to all sectors of activity "with the exception of air, rail, road, sea, inland waterway and lake transport, sea fishing, other work at sea and the activities of doctors in training."

The European Commission is considering bringing forward proposals for working time controls in the sectors excluded from the directive. However, the Government are challenging the directive in the European Court of Justice on the ground that it is not a genuine health and safety measure and should not, therefore, have been adopted under article 118A of the treaty, and remain opposed to any extension of its provisions to the excluded sectors.

Traffic Growth

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the latest available figures for the average daily traffic flow and the annual rate of traffic growth for (a) motorways, (b) urban non-motorway trunk roads, (c) rural non-motorway trunk roads, (d) urban principal roads, (e) rural principal roads, (f) urban classified roads, (g) rural classified roads, (h) urban unclassified roads and (i) rural unclassified roads. [241]

Mr. Watts: The estimated average daily motor vehicle flow, measured in thousand vehicles per day, for Great Britain in 1995 is:

Motorway: 60 9
Trunk built-up: 19.2
Trunk non-built-up: 15.5
Principal built-up: 15.0
Principal non-built-up: 7.2
Minor: 1.4.

The estimated annual rate of traffic growth in 1995 for Great Britain by road class is:

Motorway: 6.3 per cent.
Trunk built-up: 9.5 per cent.
Trunk non-built-up: 2.5 per cent.
Principal built-up: –0.2 per cent.
Principal non-built-up: 1.9 per cent.
Minor: 1.6 per cent.

Source:
National Traffic Census.

The figures provided have been derived from the national traffic census, the results of which are published in the transport statistics report "Road Traffic Statistics Great Britain: 1996 Edition".

For the purposes of the national traffic census, the terms built-up/non-built-up are used for the urban/rural distinction. Built-up roads are defined as those with a speed limit of 40 mph or less.

Air Traffic Control

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amount spent on (a) lawyers, (b) accountants, (c) consultants and (d) other professionals in consultation relating to privatisation of National Air Traffic Services in the last three months. [12]

Mr. Bowis: The Department of Transport spent about £4,000, plus VAT, on legal fees in connection with this issue, with no expenditure under the other sub–headings. In addition, the Civil Aviation Authority spent approximately £125,000, plus VAT, on other consultants.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy in respect of a two-centre air-traffic control strategy. [59]

Mr. Bowis: In air traffic control matters, the Government are advised by the Civil Aviation Authority, which is the competent national body. The strategy of concentrating en route air traffic control services on two main centres was drawn up by National Air Traffic Services, now a wholly owned subsidiary of the CAA, early in the 1990s and the Government have supported the policy since then. The CAA is now reviewing the assumptions underlying the two–centre strategy in the light of technological and other developments and we await its recommendations.

Traffic Congestion Maps

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now update the maps of current congestion, and projection of future congestion which were placed in the Library in February and include detailed forecasts of congestion for trunk roads in London, and key links on the motorway network in and around the capital. [1072]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner), Official Report, columns 1100–101.

Trust Ports (Privatisation)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amount spent by his Department on (a) accountants, (b) consultants, (c) lawyers and (d) other professionals in relation to the privatisation of the trust ports. [69]

Mr. Bowis: Spending for the six trust ports already privatised under the Ports Act 1991 and the spending to date on the prospective privatisation of the ports of Tyne and Ipswich, are as follows:

(a) accountants	1,101,768
(b) consultants	nothing in addition to sums shown for a, c and d
(c) lawyers	8,817
(d) other professionals	38,295

Electric Power-assisted Bicycles

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he made of the impact of departmental proposals for relaxing the definitions of vehicles to exclude electric power-assisted bicycles on the figures for (a) fatalities and (b) injuries from road accidents; and what account he took of studies conducted by the Transport Research Laboratory (i) on his behalf and (ii) for any other agency or body. [1013]

Mr. Bowis: Road accidents involving electric power-assisted bicycles are currently collected in the road accident data reporting system, but are not separately identifiable from bicycles in general. Accidents involving electric power-assisted bicycles will continue to be collected even if there is a change of vehicle definition. The Department has received the Transport Research Laboratory report which is being considered by a working group of Government Department and manufacturing representatives. After consideration by the working group, any restrictions proposed will be taken into account.

Strategic Rail Network

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent his Department will be involved in future decisions about the development of the strategic rail network, with special reference to the use of the Tonbridge-Redhill-Clapham route for freight between London and the channel tunnel and the upgrading of the west coast main line to accommodate piggyback traffic. [1049]

Mr. Watts: Once Railfreight Distribution—the channel tunnel freight business—is in the private sector, the privatisation of BR's freight operations will have been completed and it will be for Railtrack, in consultation with the freight train operating companies, to weigh up the opportunities for further investment in the network. The Government will continue to consider applications for freight grants on their merits, including any related to piggyback traffic. Decisions on future investment in the network south of London to accommodate channel tunnel freight trains will be a matter for Railtrack and the new owners of RFD.

M66

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the delay in starting work on the final contract for construction of the M66 motorway resulting from the engineering difficulties encountered with building the A62 bridge. [969]

Mr. Watts: None.

M65–M6 Link

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the M65–M6 link is due to be completed; and what estimate he has made of traffic flows at Colne on completion of the link. [892]

Mr. Watts: The Blackburn southern bypass is expected to be complete in November 1997. It is expected that traffic on the M65 will rise by just over 10 per cent. when the road is complete. It is possible that this increase will extend to the east of Blackburn, but no specific estimates for traffic flows at Colne have been made.

Buses

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what current proposals from the European Commission purport to change the standards that apply to buses. [200]

Mr. Bowis: There are no current European Commission proposals affecting the standards that apply to UK buses, but we expect a Commission proposal for a type approval directive shortly.

Local Transport Capital Expenditure

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each eligible local authority in England the bids made for local transport capital expenditure approval under the categories (a) major highway schemes eligible for transport supplementary grant, (b) major highway scheme not TSG eligible, (c) structural maintenance on carriageways, (d) structural maintenance on bridges, (e) major public transport projects, (f) minor works: packages, (g) minor works: non packages, (h) minor works: local safety schemes and (i) total bids. [242]

Mr. Watts: The bids for 1997–98 are given in the table.

New En Route Centre, Swanwick

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what compensation will be payable to the Civil Aviation Authority by the NERC contractors as a result of the delays to the project to build the new en route centre at Swanwick; and if he will make a statement; [171]

(2) what is his assessment of the level of risk associated with the remedial measures proposed by the contractors on the new en route centre at Swanwick; and what are his contingency plans should the project fail. [169]

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when and at what level of functionality the Civil Aviation Authority will determine what penalties are to be levied on the NERC contractor. [250]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 28 October 1996]: I refer the hon. Members to my hon. Friend's reply of 24 June 1996, Official Report, column 29, to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody).

Mr. Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list hon. Members, senior officials and journalists who have visited the NERC in the last 18 months; and who invited them. [251]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 28 October 1996]: I have asked the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority to write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the costs of upgrading and keeping in service the London air traffic control centre, including its military cell, until the new en route centre at Swanwick becomes operational; and if these costs will be borne by the NERC contractors. [168]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 18 October 1996]: The NERC contractors are liable only for additional costs required to complete the Swanwick centre. The total cost to National Air Traffic Services of the delay in opening this centre will be in the order of £15 million; this includes the costs of upgrading the London air traffic control centre, but does not include the cost of the military cell as this is not due to move to NERC in the first phase.

Domestic Accidents

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to require local authorities to liaise with other authorities and the voluntary sector to reduce accidents in the home; and if he will make a statement. [36]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There are no plans to require local authorities to liaise with other authorities and the voluntary sector. However, my Department makes a wide range of free home safety literature available to local authorities, and now also encourages them to carry forward home safety initiatives via a newsletter outlining the Department's home safety. My Department also provides a grant in aid to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, which is used to support four regional home safety officers who work closely with accident prevention staff in local authorities.

Fireworks

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received concerning the deregulation of fireworks; and if he will make a statement. [80]

Mr. John M. Taylor: My Department receives many representations each firework season on many issues associated with fireworks including the availability of fireworks to the general public, the great variety and power of fireworks now available, the inappropriate use of fireworks and sales to the under-16s. For these reasons, I announced on 28 March 1996 that a review of the statutory and voluntary controls of fireworks would be undertaken. A discussion document was issued on 31 July and comments invited by 11 October. These are now being analysed.

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what guidance he has introduced in respect of fireworks and firework safety; and if he will make a statement. [31]

Mr. Taylor: My Department has provided 5 million safety advice leaflets aimed at those buying fireworks, distributed to the point of sale with the help of the fireworks industry, backed up by 5,000 posters at sites throughout the country. In addition, we have circulated thousands of leaflets to help display organisers and make shopkeepers aware of the law on selling fireworks. Finally, television publicity has been produced and a video on firework safety made available to primary schools on request.

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what restrictions relate to the sale of category 4 display fireworks; and if he will make a statement. [30]

Mr. Taylor: British standard 7114:1988 makes it clear that category 4 fireworks are not suitable for use by the general public and should carry a warning to that effect. The General Product Safety Regulations 1994, for which BS 7114 is a relevant standard for assessing the safety of fireworks, make it an offence to supply products, such as category 4 fireworks, to persons in whose hands they are likely to be unsafe.

Mahogany

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cubic metres of Brazilian mahogany have been imported into the United Kingdom since the listing of the product in appendix III of the convention on international trade in endangered species. [828]

Mr. Nelson: Brazilian mahogany—Swietenia macrophylla—was listed in appendix III of CITES on 16 November 1995. Between then and 25 October 1996, CITES imports permits received and verified by HM Customs and Excise indicate that 10,141 cu m have been imported into the UK.

Wirral Business Link

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the nature of the financial irregularities in respect of the sacking of the managing director of Wirral business link. [1059]

Mr. Page: Business links are independent organisations not owned by Government. The decision in relation to the dismissal of the chief executive of Wirral business link is a matter for its board of directors. I have, though, asked the board of directors to keep me closely informed of developments.

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the sacking of the managing director of Wirral business link; and what were the reasons for this action. [1058]

Mr. Page: Business links are independent organisations not owned by Government. The personnel arrangements in Wirral Business Link are a matter for the board of directors.

Coal Production

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total production of coal in the United Kingdom from (a) deep mines (b) opencast mining for each quarter since the first quarter of 1992; and what forecasts relating to production his Department has evaluated. [877]

Mr. Page: The information requested is given as follows:

The Department of Trade and Industry does not make forecasts of coal production. However, Energy Paper 65, "Energy Projections for the UK" which was published by my Department in March 1995, suggested that by the year 2000 solid fuel demand would be around half its 1990 level. Although the report did not split this demand between imports and domestic production, most of the demand is expected to be met by domestic production.

Cosmetics Testing

Mr. Morley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many representations have been received by the Minister for Consumer Affairs relating to the recent campaign by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals against cosmetics testing on animals; and if he will make a statement. [796]

Mr. John M. Taylor: So far, I have received 2,100 representations to which my officials are responding.

I have written to the RSPCA informing it that the Government are fully committed to the cessation of animal testing, and fully support the use of non-animal alternatives, wherever possible.

Fishermen (Redundancy)

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many fishermen have been made redundant in each of the last three years (a) nationally and (b) in Brixham, south Devon; and what have been the equivalent figures as a percentage of total work force in other major industrial sectors. [1068]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Statistical tables of redundancies, including by industry, are published regularly in Labour Market Trends, formerly the Employment Gazette, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. Information specific to the Brixham area is not, however, available.

Outward Investment

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the volume of United Kingdom outward investment in each year since 1979; and what percentage change this represented in each year. [479]

Mr. Greg Knight [holding answer 28 October 1996]: Information on the volume of United Kingdom outward investment is not available. The level of outward investment, by value, is given in current prices in the following table.

Defence Diversification (Scotland)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what public expenditure has been invested in defence diversification in Scotland and the United Kingdom in the current year. [373]

Mr. Greg Knight: In the UK, defence diversification is addressed specifically through the European Community initiative, Konver. One hundred and thirty-six mecu, £113 million, from the European structural funds has been allocated to the UK and Gibraltar Konver II programme, which runs until 1999, having recently been extended by two years.

Up to the end of September, some £16.6 million in structural funds grants were approved in the UK this year, of this, £4.3 million is for Scotland. This figure will be fully matched by national public expenditure.

Scientific Institutions

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on the future of United Kingdom public sector scientific institutions. [480]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The Government's policy on the future of the public sector research establishments was set out in the Government response to the multi-departmental scrutiny of public sector research establishments, Cm 2991, which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade presented to the Library of the House in September 1995. This detailed a range of measures to ensure that the research establishments are able to respond to the changing needs of their customers, and to maintain the reputation for excellence for which they are renowned.

The measures include a programme of prior options reviews of research establishments. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced the timetable for these reviews in January 1996, and the initial results in May 1996. Further announcements will be made as decisions are taken. The intention is that the major part of the work should be completed by the end of December 1996.

Defence Exports (Indonesia)

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what mechanisms the Government have put in place to ensure that defence and defence-related goods are not exported from the United Kingdom to Indonesia. [375]

Mr. Lang: The export of military, paramilitary, police and security goods is controlled under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, as amended, and as such require an export licence. Export licence applications are subject to careful scrutiny against established criteria and internationally agreed guidelines to which we are committed, together with other Government Departments.

These guidelines were placed in the Library of the House in July this year.

TREASURY

Fuel Duty

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue was raised from fuel duty in 1995–96; and how much revenue from fuel duty is estimated for each year to 2000 in (a) cash and (b) 1996–97 prices. [134]

Mr. Oppenheim: In 1995–96 the revenue raised from fuel duty was £15.7 billion. In the 1996 "Summer Economic Forecast" receipts for 1996–97 were forecast to be £17.5 billion. Forecasts for later years are not published.

Incomes

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in real personal disposable income each year since 1970 in the United Kingdom and each European Union state and in the United States of America and Japan. [1010]

Mr. Jack: The change in real personal disposal income each year since 1970 for all OECD countries can be calculated from figures available in various editions of "OECD National Accounts, Vol. II", which are available in the House of Commons Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Workplace Assaults

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people were assaulted at work, by industry, for each of the last 10 years; and what plans the Government have to improve the protection of people at work from such attacks. [761]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995, amended with effect from 1 April 1996, now require serious injuries to people caused by non-consensual physical acts of violence, and arising out of or in connection with work, to be reported. The figures for such reported incidents will not be available until next year, when they will be published by the Health and Safety Executive.

The HSE has recently published new guidance for employers on dealing with violence at work, as well as producing sector specific guidance in areas of increased risk—these include retail, the health services, the education sector and banks and building societies.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each of the last 10 years, the number of inspections carried out by Health and Safety Executive inspectors. [659]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following table shows the number of inspections carried out by Health and Safety Executive inspectors in each of the last 10 years.

Year	Inspections[1]
1987–88	159,641

[1] Inspections are planned preventive inspections by HSE's inspectorates, and site visits to monitor nuclear site licences by the nuclear safety division. They do not include reactive work such as investigation of accidents and complaints about workplace conditions.

[2] Figures for 1991–92 and beyond include inspections of the railway and offshore industries which became the responsibility of HSE on 3 December 1990 and 1 April 1991 respectively.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each of the last 10 years, the number of enforcement notices issued by (a) the Health and Safety Executive's field operations division inspectorates and (b) local authority inspectors. [470]

Sir Paul Beresford: The total number of enforcement notices issued by HSE's field operations directorate and local authority inspectors between 1986–87 and 1994–95 is as follows:

Enforcement notices issued by field operations directorate

	Number of notices issued

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each of the last 10 years, the number of field inspectors employed by the Health and Safety Executive, indicating the proportion of them with less than two years experience. [658]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information available is as follows for health and safety inspectors—factory, agricultural, quarries, mines and railways—working from area offices. Nuclear, offshore, and specialist inspectors are excluded, as are inspectors currently assigned to headquarters.

Single Regeneration Budget

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details, by region, for the amount of funding awarded for each round of SRB funding and give in each case the number of jobs created and directly funded as a result of the SRB programme; and, of those, what percentage of fixed-term contracts have waivers in place in respect of redundancy costs. [39]

Sir Paul Beresford: The SRB challenge fund provides support for between one to seven years for regeneration schemes by locally based partnerships. Funds awarded by region in the first two bidding rounds of the challenge fund and the number of jobs expected to be created or safeguarded as a result are set out in the table:

	Round 1 £ million	Round 2 £ million	Round 1 Plans: Jobs created/ safeguarded (000s)	Round 2 Plans: Jobs created/ safeguarded (000s)
London	316.7	230.0	55	39
South East	31.8	78.6	12	9
Eastern	20.7	35.3	4	9
South West	34.1	37.9	11	13
East Midlands	55.9	56.8	24	21
West Midlands	156.7	147.1	37	40
Merseyside	78.0	87.5	15	11
North West	143.3	133.2	71	22
Yorks and the Humber	202.2	152.3	62	16
North East	80.7	159.9	11	20

It is for the partnerships themselves to determine the terms and conditions of any staff they employ directly. Partnerships have, however, been advised that they should include the waivers referred to in fixed-term contracts as any redundancy costs incurred by them as a result of the absence of such waivers would not be met from the SRB challenge fund. My Department does not collect information about the number of staff directly employed by partnerships on fixed-term contracts.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the cost of rights to claims for unfair dismissal and redundancies in respect of those employed under SRB funding. [81]

Sir Paul Beresford: The SRB challenge fund provides support for between one to seven years for regeneration schemes by locally based partnerships. It is for the partnerships themselves to determine how many staff they employ and on what terms and conditions.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review his decision to require fixed-term contracts under SRB projects to contain waivers of rights to claims for unfair dismissal and redundancies; and if he will make a statement. [33]

Sir Paul Beresford: The SRB challenge fund provides support for between one to seven years for regeneration schemes by locally based partnerships. It is for the partnerships themselves to determine the terms and conditions for any staff they employ directly. However, it is Government policy that fixed-term contracts should contain waivers of right to claims for unfair dismissal and redundancy, as provided under section 197 of the Employment Rights Act 1996.

The employee's agreement to the waiver means that protection against unfair dismissal does not apply to a dismissal from employment under a contract for a fixed term of one year or more if the dismissal consists only of the expiry of that term without its being renewed. The waiver does not affect employees' rights to claim for unfair dismissal or redundancy payments in other circumstances.

Partnerships involved in SRB challenge fund schemes have been advised that any claims for unfair dismissal or redundancy costs incurred by them as the result of the absence of such waivers will not be eligible for grant assistance where staff were employed on fixed-term contracts after the advice was issued to them.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in respect of fixed-term contracts under SRB contracts. [32]

Sir Paul Beresford: Following the issue to SRB challenge fund partnerships of advice on waivers by employees on fixed-term contracts, a handful of SRB partnerships have sought further clarification of the costs which will be eligible for grant assistance from the challenge fund.

Occupational Diseases

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which occupational diseases are not required to be reported under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995; and what proportion they constitute of all incidents of occupational disease. [656]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995 require reports to be made of diseases listed in schedule 3 to the regulations when a case has been diagnosed in writing by a doctor and the person concerned is currently employed in an associated work activity. Cases not meeting these criteria are not required to be reported. Information on what proportion they constitute of all occupational disease is not available.

The most recent analysis and discussion of occupational and work-related disease statistics, including reports made under these regulations, can be found in "Health and Safety Statistics 1995/96", published by the Health and Safety Commission, on 23 October 1996, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects all the arrangements for the landfill tax and environmental trusts to be fully developed and in place. [1149]

Mr. Clappison: All the arrangements for the landfill tax and environmental trusts have been fully developed and are already in place.

The primary law on landfill tax is contained in the Finance Act 1996, which received Royal Assent on 29 April 1996. The more detailed implementation aspects of the landfill tax are set out in the Landfill Tax Regulations 1996 (SI 1996 No.1527) which came into force on 1 August 1996. In addition, the Landfill Tax (Contaminated Land) Order 1966 (SI 1996 No.1528), setting out the provisions for exempting from tax waste from clearing historically contaminated land, came into force on 1 August 1996 and the Landfill Tax (Qualifying Material) Order (SI 1996 No.1528), defining the categories of waste to which the lower rate of tax applies, came into force on 1 October 1996.

Provisions for environmental trusts are contained in the Landfill Tax (Regulations) 1996 (SI 1996 No.1527). On 15 October 1996 the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise approved the Environmental Trust Regulatory Body Limited, trading under the name "ENTRUST" to act as the regulatory body for the purposes of the environmental trust scheme. ENTRUST is responsible for enrolling and monitoring the operation of environmental trusts.

Marine Wild life and Habitats

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what biological and physiological parameters are monitored by his Department, in order to assess the cumulative impacts of discharges from offshore oil and gas installations on marine wildlife and habitats. [504]

Mr. Clappison: My Department, the Scottish Office and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food all maintain extensive programmes of marine monitoring, including the impact of human activities on the marine environment. In addition, the three country nature conservation agencies monitor the status of marine habitats and species in the United Kingdom waters. The Department of Trade and Industry is responsible for the overall regulation of the offshore oil and gas industry.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to issue a consolidation of the 1990 local authority capital finance regulations. [1737]

Mr. Curry: A draft consolidation of these regulations is being issued this week to local authorities and other interested parties. A copy is being placed in the House Library. I am inviting comments on the draft by the end of January. The new regulations will come into effect next April and will supersede the 1990 regulations.

Vacant Offices

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of his Department in respect of the future of (a) 25 Southampton buildings, (b) the Patent Office and (c) the Office of Fair Trading following vacation of these premises. [441]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

I have asked the chief executive of the Patent Office to write direct to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. C. Octon to Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours, dated 30 October 1996:

I am replying for the Patent Office in the absence of the Chief Executive to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for the Environment about 25 Southampton Buildings.

The Patent Office is only a minor user of 25 Southampton Buildings and as such has no policy responsibility for the building. That now rests with the Department of National Heritage with which we have made arrangements for the accommodation of our remaining London staff. While these arrangements are helpful the future presence of the Patent Office in London is not totally dependent upon them. If the need arose we would be able to seek appropriate alternatives.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Nursery Vouchers

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what considerations led her to decide not to make it her policy to ensure that every provider accepting Government nursery vouchers registers its under-fives provisions under the Children Act 1989 and associated guidance. [763]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Children Act 1989 requires all day care providers to register with their local authority. Maintained primary and nursery schools and independent schools have always been exempt from the registration requirement. My right hon. Friend does not consider it necessary or appropriate to remove this exemption, as these other providers are separately covered by education legislation.

Teachers

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers were (a) employed and (b) employed in grant-maintained schools in each local education authority in England in the most recent year for which figures were available; and what were the figures in the previous six years. [1027]

Mr. Forth: The information is given in the following table:

There was clear evidence that indefinite exclusion led to some pupils being left in educational limbo for long periods with nothing being done to get them back into school.

Our current legislative proposals on exclusions would:

(a) allow greater flexibility in the use of fixed-term exclusions by substituting a limit of 45 days in a school year - thereby increasing the opportunity for headteachers to make effective arrangements for the reintegration of the excluded pupil; and

(b) require that, as far as practicable, independent committees hearing appeals against permanent exclusions meet when all the parties are available to attend, that these committees have regard to the discipline policy of the excluding school, and that they take account of the interests of other pupils - thereby seeking to ensure that full and balanced consideration is given to each case.

Surplus School Places

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many surplus school places there were, and what was their cost, in each local education authority in England in the most recent year for which figures are available. [1026]

Mr. Robin Squire: For the number of surplus school places in each local education authority, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) on Tuesday 19 March 1996, Official Report, columns 113–18. At a national level, the average premises-related cost of maintaining a surplus place is estimated to be £182 a year for a primary school and £303 a year for a secondary school at 1995–96 prices. The actual cost and the scope for realising savings from the removal of surplus places in practice in each local education authority will depend on local circumstances.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people who were disqualified from unemployment benefit, and what percentage of those in dispute with the Employment Service, won the right to benefit on appeal in the last year for which figures are available. [1146]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Ian McCartney, dated 30 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the number of people who were disqualified from unemployment benefit and what percentage of these won the right to benefit on appeal, in the last year for which figures are available. This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

Unfortunately we do not hold information on the number of successful appeal outcomes. The only information held on appeals is: the number received, the number reviewed and revised by an adjudication officer and the number submitted for determination by a Social Security Appeal Tribunal.

This information, together with statistics on the number of adjudication officers's decisions, and disallowance rates, is contained in a published document entitled "Analysis of Adjudication Officers' Decisions". This provides information on all the main entitlement questions arising on claims, as well as disqualifications. Copies of this document are held in the Library of the House. The latest available information relates to the quarter year ending 30 June 1996.

I hope this is helpful.

HEALTH

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the extra cost to haemophiliacs arising from the imposition of VAT on drugs; and if he will make a statement. [141]

Mr. Horam: There is no extra cost to haemophiliac patients receiving treatment under the national health service arising from the imposition of value added tax on drugs.

Health Authority Deficits

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities and trusts had deficits approved in the financial year 1995–96. [394]

Mr. Horam: The latest year for which audited accounts are available is currently 1994–95. The audited information for 1995–96 will not be available until late November.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities and trusts have been given approval to incur deficits in the present financial year; and on what date such approvals were given. [390]

Mr. Horam: The forecast financial positions of health authorities and trusts are discussed with the national health service executive regional offices as part of a cycle of planning and regular monitoring reviews. These outturn positions are therefore subject to revision as a result of any action agreed at these reviews. The specific approval of deficits does not therefore arise.

NHS Trusts (Admissions)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those NHS trusts that on 30 September had restricted admissions for financial reasons. [473]

Mr. Horam: This information is not held centrally.

Health Authority Administrative Costs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the administrative cost of running each health authority in 1995–96; and if he will give the percentage of the total funds available that represents. [428]

Mr. Horam: The provisional 1995–96 annual accounts for health authorities are not expected to be available until the end of November. The information requested will be placed in the Library when it becomes available.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the reasons for not making the administrative costs of health authorities part of the annual review and for not reporting on such costs in the annual review letter. [427]

Mr. Horam: Regional offices determine the content of annual reviews with their health authorities in the light of the most important current issues locally and nationally. Regional offices would discuss a health authority's performance against its cost target in an annual review. Where warranted by poor performance against these targets, or where meeting the targets has significant repercussions on the provision of services, the matter would be included as an issue in the review letter. Health authority costs are published by the national health service executive annually.

Good Health Channel

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to establish a good health channel on television in co-operation with the NHS and cable companies. [738]

Mr. Horam: There are no plans at present to establish a health channel. However, the development of the NHSnet, a secure national network developed for the NHS, will offer a number of opportunities to discuss new communications techniques for disseminating information.

NHS Trusts (Bed Linen)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those NHS trusts in the south-eastern region in which relatives are required to bring in basic items of bed linen for in-patients. [449]

Mr. Horam: I am unaware of any case where a national health service trust has asked patients or their relatives to bring in bed linen during a stay in hospital. Basic items of bed linen should always be provided by the NHS for its in-patients.

Royal Oldham Hospital

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will name the companies invited by the North West regional health authority in 1992 to tender for the contract to construct a waste incinerator at the Royal Oldham hospital. [14]

Mr. Horam: This information is not held centrally.

Genetically Engineered Food

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of people in the United Kingdom who have contracted illnesses as a direct result of eating genetically engineered food in each of the last five years. [1022]

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected. However, genetically modified foods undergo rigorous safety assessments by the independent Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes and if there were any concern about possible adverse health effects, food safety clearance would not be granted.

Acute Beds

Sir George Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the number of acute beds in NHS hospitals blocked by patients awaiting discharge into retirement or nursing homes within the area of each health authority or board on the most recent date for which figures are available; [844]

(2) if he will list the number of acute beds in NHS hospitals blocked by patients awaiting discharge into retirement or nursing homes within the area of each local government social services department on the most recent date for which figures are available. [845]

Mr. Burns: This information is not available in the form requested.

TRANSPORT

MV Derbyshire

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what inquiries he has made in respect of possible financial vested interest arising from the outcome of investigations into the sinking of the MV Derbyshire; and if he will make a statement. [29]

Mr. Bowis: If the actions of any of the commercial interests associated with the MV Derbyshire were found to have resulted in the ship's loss, these could give rise to potential liabilities. The possible existence of any such liabilities has no bearing on the conduct of the current investigation into the loss of the ship.

Helicopter and Aircraft Noise

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to give the Civil Aviation Authority obligations in law to consider environmental factors in areas other than aerodrome licensing. [2]

Mr. Bowis: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for Defence have given directions to the Civil Aviation Authority under section 72(2) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. These require the CAA to collaborate in ensuring that air navigation services are, subject to securing the safe operation of aircraft, planned, provided and operated so as to take account—among other things—of the need to mitigate as far as possible the environmental impact of civil aircraft operations and, in particular, the disturbance to the public arising from aircraft noise, vibration and pollution.

Rail Services

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many levels of service were higher under British Rail than the levels which have been specified in the passenger service requirement set out by the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising. [1048]

Mr. Watts: The minimum level of service required of British Rail on any route is one train per week. In practice much more extensive services have been provided. All PSRs provide higher levels of service than the minimum required of British Rail.

A more specified answer could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Boeing 737 Aircraft

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action is being taken by his Department in response to recommendations made by the United States National Transportation Safety Board concerning the rudder and the yaw damper system on Boeing 737 aircraft. [1047]

Mr. Bowis: The US National Transportation Safety Board has made a number of recommendations to the US Federal Aviation Administration following the investigation of an accident involving a US-registered Boeing 737. The Civil Aviation Authority is monitoring the situation and will decide on what action, if any, is appropriate in the UK once the FAA has responded.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many Boeing 737 aircraft are registered in the United Kingdom; and if he will list which airlines use them. [1040]

Mr. Bowis: There are currently 109 Boeing 737 aircraft on the UK aircraft register. These aircraft are used by the following airlines:

Air UK
British Airways
British Midland Airways
Easy Jet Airline Company
GB Airways
Maersk Air
Monarch Airlines
Sabre Airways

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents involving Boeing 737 aircraft have been recorded in this country in each of the last 10 years. [1046]

Mr. Bowis: The number of accidents involving Boeing 737 aircraft in this country in each of the last 10 years is as follows:

1986: 1
1987: 0
1988: 0
1989: 2
1990: 2
1991: 1
1992: 4
1993: 7
1995: 1

These figures are based on the International Civil Aviation Organisation definition of accidents and include accidents where aircraft are damaged, or passenger or crew are injured, while aircraft are on the ground at airports. All but two of the accidents listed fall into this category.

Leyburn to Hawes Railway Service

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the feasibility of reopening the railway from Leyburn to Hawes; and if he will make a statement. [891]

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend has received no direct representations on this matter. The Department of the Environment and the Rural development Commission have received a bid from the Wensleydale Railway Association for funds to reopen part of the Wensleydale railway line—between Northallerton and Castle Bolton—under their rural challenge scheme 1996. The bid is currently under consideration. Both Leyburn and Hawes are situated on that line.

Acton Rail Stations

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies (i) he and (ii) other bodies responsible for planning of public transport made of the advantages of electrifying the half mile of railway between Acton main line station and Action Wells junction, with particular reference to (a) public transport to and from Heathrow airport, (b) orbital passenger services in London and (c) rail freight movement. [1062]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 29 October 1996]: None. The consultant engaged by the Department to carry out the London airports access study—LASAS—did, in examining various schemes to improve rail access to Heathrow, consider a rail link from Heathrow to the west coast main line, via acton Wells which would have required electrification of this part of the network. Although the WCML link was not one of the schemes shortlised by the LASAS consultants, there is nothing to prevent a promoter from pursuing the proposal if he believes that there is sufficient demand.

The electrification of this part of the network would be an operational matter for Railtrack, which, as owner of the infrastructure, is responsible for the maintenance and improvement of the rail infrastructure.

PRIME MINISTER

Parliamentary Delegations (Europe)

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Prime Minister if he has nominated a new leader of the United Kingdom delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the Assembly of Western European Union. [1489]

The Prime Minister: Following the sudden death earlier this month of Lord Finsberg, who served with great distinction as leader of the United Kingdom delegation in the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the Assembly of the Western European Union from 1987, I have today appointed the hon. Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant) as the new leader of the delegation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

European Parliament

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee if he will make it his policy that information be collected in respect of United Kingdom Members of the European Parliament with regard to (a) attendance at Parliament and Committees, (b) declarations of interests and (c) speeches in Parliament and Committees. [100]

Mr. Waller: I have no responsibilities in connection with recording the activities or interests of United Kingdom Members of the European Parliament. The Library does, however, receive documentation about the proceedings of the European Parliament and I have asked the Librarian to write to the hon. Member.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Released Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of prisoners released early from each London prison due to the Prison Service miscalculating their release dates. [148]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 30 October 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners serving consecutive sentences who were released early from each London prison following the issue of guidance on the application of remand time in sentence calculation.

The information is set out in the table below.

Establishment	Number of prisoners released
Belmarsh	2
Brixton	0
Downview	4
Feltham	11
Highdown	1
Holloway	0
Latchmere House	1
Pentonville	7
Wandsworth	12

Bouncers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to regulate or license bouncers or the security companies which employ them. [404]

Mr. Maclean: We encourage the regulation of door supervisors through local registration schemes in which training and criminal record checks on door supervisors are a condition of obtaining a local authority entertainment licence. The Government published guidance on the operation of registration schemes in January this year.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has (a) commissioned, (b) undertaken and (c) completed on possible links between doormen and bouncers and the sale of drugs to young people at pubs, clubs and fast food outlets. [406]

Mr. Sackville: No such research has been commissioned by the Home Office. But we have been informed by the police and other agencies that drug dealers often target clubs and similar venues frequented by young people and that staff, particularly those on the door, can condone or be a part of organised drug dealing carried out on the premises.

My right hon. and learned Friend announced on 8 October a proposal to make possible the revocation of public entertainment licences and closure of premises, with immediate effect, in cases where there is clear evidence of a serious problem relating to the supply or consumption of controlled drugs on or near the premises.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the subject of regulating doormen and bouncers. [405]

Mr. Maclean: Over the past 12 months, we have received a total of eight representations specifically calling for the regulation of door supervisors.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Nottinghamshire on the sale of drugs by doormen and bouncers to young people. [407]

Mr. Maclean: No. It is an operational matter for individual chief officers how they deal with such problems. Nottinghamshire constabulary, like other forces, is committed to effective action to fight drug misuse and drug-related crime.

Drug Abuse Resistance Education

Mr. Allen : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the change in the level of youth cautions in Mansfield since the introduction of the DARE–drug abuse resistance education—programme; and if he will make a statement. [764]

Mr. Maclean: The police force's area is the smallest geographical unit for statistics on cautioning available centrally. The readily available information is given in the table.

Persons aged 10 to 13 cautioned in the Nottinghamshire police force area, by type of offence, sex and period

[2] Provisional.
[3] Nottinghamshire Constabulary have been running a pilot of the drug abuse resistance education programme across all nine of its divisions since September 1995.

Hizb-ut-Tahrir

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will instruct the police to take action to limit the activities of Hizb-ut-Tahrir; [63]

(2) what action he has taken against the Hizb-ut-Tahrir organisation. [62]

Mr. Kirkhope: Enforcement of the law is an operational matter for chief officers of police. The Government have sought to ensure that the police have full powers to deal with racially motivated crime.

Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (i) the purchase cost of a closed circuit television camera, (ii) the annual cost of running it in a fully monitored system and (iii) the average amount his Department is providing in grant per camera in the current year. [143]

Mr. MacLean: The Government do not collect systematic data on the costs of closed circuit television systems or hardware. The purchase cost of CCTV cameras varies widely according to their specification and their operational requirements. Running costs also vary widely for the same reason. Most of the costs associated with CCTV systems are taken up by cabling and monitoring arrangements.

The last CCTV challenge competition disbursed £17,138,047 to 259 winning partnerships. If all the schemes go ahead as planned, this will help to fund 3,277 cameras. The total cost of all the schemes is £40,156,993. Using these figures, the cost per camera is £12,254, to which the Government have contributed £5,230 per camera.

Motor Cycle Theft

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department is taking to reduce the theft of motor cycles. [204]

Mr. Maclean: The Government are well aware of the misery suffered by the victims of motor cycle theft and is tackling this problem through a multi-agency approach as part of its overall vehicle crime reduction strategy.

One of the key ways in which the Government are trying to reduce theft is by educating motor cycle owners on the need to take practical security precautions. The Home Office security advice leaflet specifically for motor cyclists is entitled "Putting the Brakes on Bike Theft" and it offers basic security advice on locking up, parking and parts marking. We shall be revising this leaflet shortly and will be looking to the motor cycle organisations for advice on the main messages which need to be conveyed.

Advice for motor cycle owners is also included in the Home Office's crime prevention handbook "Your Practical Guide to Crime Prevention". The Home Office has received requests for over 2 million copies of this booklet.

The Home Office is represented on the Motorcycle Theft Action Group on which members of the motor cycle industry and all others with an interest in crime reduction also sit. The group's work is aimed at achieving a co-ordinated and effective approach to tackling motor cycle theft.

Home Office research into the theft of motor cycles during the 12-month period October 1994 to September 1995 was presented to the group, and the findings are being used by members to target vulnerable areas and focus initiatives where they are most needed.

Prisons (Costs)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average annual cost of keeping a person detained in prison. [15]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr Chris Davies, dated 30 October 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the average annual cost of keeping a person detained in prison.

In 1995–96 the net operating cost was £24,200 per place.

Child Murders

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of child murders by strangers in each year since 1966. [150]

Mr. Maclean: The available information was published in table 4A of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1994". A copy of this publication is in the Library.

Police Costs

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what guidelines are issued by his Department for the recovery of costs by a police force employing personnel to carry out routine checks in the area of a neighbouring police area; and if he will make a statement; [99]

(2) what (a) protocols and (b) guidelines govern the deployment of county police force resources in the area of a metropolitan police force to carry out routine checks on civilian drivers; and if he will make a statement. [98]

Mr. Maclean: Guidance on the financial arrangements for mutual aid between police forces is contained in Home Office circular No. 38/89, a copy of which is in the Library. There is no central guidance on the deployment of officers of one force to assist another. This is a matter for the chief officers concerned.

Fireworks

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were prosecuted in 1995 for offences in connection with the misuse of fireworks. [94]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not available centrally.

Prisons (Repair and Maintenance)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent circulars have been issued to prison works departments in respect of the buying in of materials for repair and maintenance work. [666]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr A. J. Beith, dated 30 October 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about whether any recent circulars have been issued to prison works departments in respect of the buying in of materials for repairs and maintenance work.

I recently issued a note to governors introducing a freeze on discretionary expenditure and stating that expenditure should only be incurred in respect of essential items of work. This included expenditure on maintenance and minor works other than work which is already contractually committed, mandatory/statutory items, health and safety items, emergency work and work to prevent loss of places or core facilities. It has been necessary to introduce this freeze on discretionary expenditure because of recent financial pressures but we will keep the position under review.

Crimes (Rehabilitation Periods)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a list of the rehabilitation periods for each criminal offence or category of offences listed in his paper "On the Record". [152]

Mr. Maclean: The White Paper "On the Record", Cm 3308, sets out the proposed new arrangements for access to criminal records. It does not list categories of criminal offences. Annexe A to the White Paper sets out the categories of occupations or posts which are exceptions to the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 and which it is intended will be eligible for full criminal record vetting checks.

It is not possible to list the rehabilitation periods for individual offences. The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 relates to sentences rather than to offences, and provides that after varying periods of time specified in the Act, offenders are regarded as having become rehabilitated and their conviction(s) spent. The key determinant of when a conviction becomes spent is the type of sentence passed in each case, not the offence itself. When a conviction becomes spent, it does not have to be disclosed other than in certain specified circumstances. Sentences of over two and half years imprisonment can never become spent.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of claims for asylum for each month in (a) 1995 and (b) in 1996. [239]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is in the table.

Prisons (Building Costs)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the projected cost through the private finance initiative of (a) building all new prisons and detention centres and (b) payments made to the private sector for all new prisons and detention centres for the first five years of their existence. [53]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Chris Davies, dated 30 October 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about projected costs of building new prisons and detention centres through the private finance initiative and payments made to the private sector for all new prisons and detention centres for the first five years of their existence.

Under the Private Finance Initiative the Prison Service will be paying for the building and operation of new prisons as a single package. The cost of the total service (net present value) over 25 years for the three new prisons either under construction or where construction is expected to commence shortly, is £643 million, comprising £247m for Fazakerley; £266m for Bridgend; and £130m for Lowdham Grange. While we are unable to provide information about building costs only, the estimated values of the contractors' overall project costs are £77m each for Fazakerley and Bridgend and £37m for Lowdham Grange.

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02
Fazakerley	1.75	24.95	25.70	26.05	26.05
Bridgend	1.75	22.75	24.95	25.65	25.65
Lowdham Grange	0.70	13.75	12.50	12.55	12.55
Total	4.20	61.45	63.15	64.25	64.25

The 1997–98 estimated payments are based on the following opening dates: Fazakerley, December 1997; Bridgend, December 1997; and Lowdham Grange, January 1998. The estimated payments for 1998–99 have been re-priced up to 2000–01. The costs stated for 2001–02 are at 2000–01 prices as the year 2001–02 is outside the PES period.

Firearms

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many notifiable offences were recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used in Wales in 1993 and 1994; and if he will make a statement. [46]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is published annually in table 3.1(A) of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary tables". A copy of this publication is in the Library.

Murders

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistics he has collated on the proportion of murders which are committed by people who are known to their victims since 1980. [147]

Mr. Maclean: Statistics on the proportion of homicide offences which are committed by people who are known to their victims are contained in the following table:

Proportion of offences currently recorded as homicide in England and Wales where a suspect has been identified who was known to the victim

Year	Percentage of all currently recorded homicides

1991	68
1992	69

1994	63

Figures as at 4 August 1995.

Home Safety

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has issued in respect of home safety work undertaken by local authorities. [35]

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office does not issue guidance on home safety work undertaken by local authorities. On fire safety, however, the Home Office works closely with fire brigades and other publicly funded bodies to promote community fire safety, and produces for their use a range of publicity and information leaflets giving specific advice on fire safety in the home. Similar advice leaflets on home security and crime prevention are also produced by the Home Office and are circulated widely.

Fire Authorities

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the standard spending assessment for each fire authority in England and the actual spend for 1995–96. [893]

Mr. Sackville: The fire standard spending assessments for 1995–96 are set out in the Local Government Finance Report (England) which was published on 30 January 1995. Particulars of actual spending in respect of each brigade for that year are not yet held centrally.

Fire Fighters

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many retained fire fighters there are in each fire authority in England; and what was the number in 1992. [895]

Mr. Sackville: Information on the position in each fire authority at 1 January 1996 has been placed in the Library. The equivalent figures for 1 January 1992 were published in the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Fire Services for England and Wales for 1991, Cm 2008—appendix 4 on page 55.

Immigration (Carriers Liability) Act

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total amount of liability incurred by all carriers under the Immigration (Carriers Liability) Act 1987: how much of that total liability has been paid; how much has been waived; and how much is outstanding. [883]

Mr. Kirkhope: A total of £97.59 million has been incurred by carriers since the Act came into force. Of that sum, £59.17 million has been paid, £20.74 million waived, and £17.68 million is currently outstanding.

Donations (Political Parties)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what restrictions are imposed by each member state of the EU on donations to political parties from foreign sources ineligible to vote in their elections. [896]

Mr. Sackville: Information on the practice in other member states of the European Union with regard to donations of this kind is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In the United Kingdom, there are no restrictions on political parties receiving such donations, but each of the major political parties has adopted a voluntary code of practice which prohibits acceptance of donations from foreign Governments or rulers.

Magic Mushrooms

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances magic mushrooms are classed as illegal drugs. [990]

Mr. Sackville: The magic mushroom—psilocybe semilanceata—is not controlled under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, but it contains the substance psilocin and its derivative psilocybin, both of which are class A controlled drugs. Under the 1971 Act, any preparation or other product containing psilocin or psilocybin is also a class A controlled drug.

Persons have been held by the courts to be in possession of controlled drugs where they have in some way altered the natural state of the mushroom—for example, by drying—so as to constitute a preparation or other product.

Blakenhurst Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with United Kingdom Detention Services concerning the contracts with Her Majesty's prison, Blakenhurst. [256]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 28 October 1996]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 30 October 1996.

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the contract held by United kingdom Detention Services (UKDS) for the operation of Blakenhurst prison.

The Prison Service has one contract with UKDS for the operation of Blakenhurst prison. As part of the ongoing management of that contract, there has been and continues to be regular contact with UKDS in discussion and correspondence on a broad range of issues.

SCOTLAND

Offshore Oil and Gas

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what biological and physiological parameters are monitored by the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department, in order for the Department of the Environment to assess the cumulative impacts of discharges from offshore oil and gas installations on marine wildlife and habitats. [505]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The Scottish Office marine laboratory in Aberdeen has a wide-ranging programme of environmental monitoring in the seas around Scotland. This includes monitoring of offshore oil and gas operations designed to establish the distribution and concentration of contaminants, mainly hydrocarbons, in sediments and water. The biological effects of operational discharges, including possible cumulative effects, are also under continuing study. The marine laboratory publishes all its findings in a series of reports. The annual review describes the full range of scientific activities of the laboratory and the recently published report on "Environmental Monitoring of the Seas around Scotland 1970–1993" contains data associated with offshore operations. I have placed copies of these documents in the House of Commons Library.

Compulsory Purchase Orders

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the minimum, maximum and average times taken to reach a decision on compulsory purchase orders during each of the past five years. [249]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 28 October 1996]: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Beef Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will implement a temporary guaranteed price system to restore confidence in the beef industry in Wales. [25]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Government have committed £2.5 billion to various measures to support the beef industry. We have no plans to introduce a price guarantee which would do nothing to support the industry in the medium to longer term.

Casualty Animals

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received relating to the reluctance of contractors to pick up bulls as casualty animals; and if he will make a statement. [467]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: None.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he will take to alleviate problems arising from casualty stock via the over-30-months scheme; and if he will make a statement. [26]

Mr. Evans: The Intervention Board executive agency has allocated additional slots at designated abattoirs for casualty animals.

Cattle Cull

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to remove the backlog in the cattle culling scheme; and if he will make a statement. [27]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Government have provided an additional £16.6 million to enable the backlog to be cleared by Christmas. We are on target for a throughput of 55,000 animals a week under the scheme.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will restore the compensation rate in the cattle culling scheme of 1 ecu/83.3p/kg. [28]

Mr. Evans: This is a matter for the EU Beef Management Committee.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all capital and current expenditure on each grant-maintained school in each year since incorporation. [213]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information is set out in the following tables.

Disabled People (Grant Aid)

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all bids made in the former county of Clwyd which received grant aid for the disabled. [217]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The support for people with disabilities grant scheme gave funding to projects supporting people with physical and sensory disabilities in 1994–95 and 1995–96. A list of all such bids approved for the former county of Clwyd under this scheme during these years has been placed in the Library of the House.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list those compliance cost assesaments published during the latest six-month period. [1738]

Mr. Freeman: Since April 1993, the Government have required Departments to prepare and publish compliance cost assessments with all proposed legislation presented to Parliament to assess the impact on business costs. This includes a special test of the impact on small businesses. Since January 1996, the responsible Minister has had to certify that he has seen the compliance cost assessment and is satisfied that the regulatory proposal strikes an appropriate balance between cost and benefit.

I have presented to Parliament today a Command Paper listing 105 CCAs published between 1 January 1996 and 30 June 1996 plus three CCAs published between 1 July 1995 and 31 December 1995 which were omitted from the previous Command Paper. Copies of the CCAs listed are available in the House Libraries. This is the fifth such Command Paper and further papers listing CCAs published in the preceding six-month period will be published at six-monthly intervals.

Government Policy

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what consultation his Department has had with Conservative central office concerning the co-ordination and presentation of Government policy. [905]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) on 21 March 1996, Official Report, column 277.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his Department's estimate of the cost to business to enable computer systems to be millennium compliant. [451]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I have made no such estimate. The figure will be more substantial the later industry leaves its remedial action plan.

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the progress report made to him in September of the joint task force referred to in his answer of 24 July 1996, Official Report, column 476, on the effect of the century date change of computer systems. [1134]

Mr. Taylor: The task force has made good progress towards its objective of achieving 100 per cent. awareness and commitment from main board level executives by end March 1997. The issue is receiving considerable attention from the news media but there is still considerable work to be done ensuring all firms check their systems and take the necessary action soon. The CBI and some trade associations are actively involved in alerting their members.

Task Force 2000

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total budget for his Department's task force 2000; what is his Department's contribution to it; and what progress has been made to date to obtain the balance from the private sector. [450]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Task force 2000 was set up by the private sector, not by the Department although with its encouragement. Its budget and funding are matters for them as it is for the private sector to address the date change problem from its own resources. The Department has offered initial funding of up to £170,000 as seed corn and task force directors are negotiating with private sector companies for further funds. The task force's objective is to raise awareness of the year 2000 problem, and has already received sponsorship for a London conference.

Wage Levels

Mr. Spearing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what statutory provisions govern the objectives of sustaining a living and just level of wages. [236]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Pay is a matter to be determined between employers and employees in light of their particular circumstances without Government intervention. Statutory wage fixing undermines competitiveness, distorts the labour market and costs jobs.

Coal-burning Power Stations

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many coal-burning power stations are operating in (a) each European Union state, (b) the United States of America and (c) Japan; and what percentage is equipped with flue gas desulphurisation. [1011]

Mr. Page: The power stations operating in each European Union state and in the United States of America and Japan, and the percentage that are equipped with flue gas desulphurisation units, are shown in the table.

Country	Total number of coal-fired units[1]	Number of units with flue gas desulphurisation[1]	Percentage with flue gas desulphurisation

Launch Aid

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total level of support paid to industry under the launch aid programme since its inception. [992]

Mr. Greg Knight: Under the Civil Aviation Act 1982, launch aid may be allocated to the UK aerospace industry for the design and development of civil aeronautics projects. Launch aid had been allocated to the industry under previous legislation. A total of £968.1 million was allocated between the 1961–62 and 1995–96 financial years. Earlier figures are not readily available.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what have been the total receipts from the launch aid programme since its inception. [993]

Mr. Knight: A total of £597.7 million was received by Government between the 1961–62 and 1995–96 financial years in repayment of launch aid for civil aeronautics projects.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the last project supported by his Department under the launch aid programme; when this took place; and what was the level of the support. [991]

Mr. Knight: In 1995–96 Short Brothers plc of Belfast was allocated launch aid of £16.4 million towards its contribution to the Learjet 45 executive jet. This project is still current and a further £1.32 million of remains to be allocated to the company.

Human Genetics Advisory Committee

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce the membership of the Human Genetics Advisory Committee. [906]

Mr. Ian Taylor: We will make an announcement as soon as possible when consents have been forthcoming from candidates.

Offshore Oil and Gas Installations

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what are the dates or estimated dates (a) on which he proposes to announce the call for nominations in relation to the blocks to be offered in the 18 offshore licensing round for UK oil and gas exploration, (b) between which he proposes to conduct the consultation for the nomination of blocks to be offered in the 18 offshore licensing round for UK oil and gas exploration, (c) on which he proposes to announce which blocks are to be offered in the 18 offshore licensing round for UK oil and gas exploration, and (d) on which he proposes to announce the winning bids in relation to the 18 offshore licensing round for UK oil and gas exploration; [514]

(2) if an environmental impact assessment will be required of applicants in relation to the 18 offshore licensing round for UK oil and gas exploration; [515]

(3) what further rounds are planned for UK offshore oil and gas exploration licensing; and over what period he intends to conduct each of those rounds. [516]

Mr. Page: No decisions have been taken about the timing and scope of the 18th round of offshore licensing nor any subsequent rounds.

I hope that it will be possible, however, to hold a round in 1997 and further rounds at regular intervals thereafter in order to ensure that the United Kingdom continental shelf remains an attractive investment location for oil and gas companies until well into the next century.

Decisions about the need for environmental impact assessments in relation to an 18th round will take account of relevant legislation, international obligations and the advice provided to me by statutory and other advisers during the consultation process preceding the offer of blocks.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action is taken by Government Departments to ensure that the level of use and discharge of chemicals in water and in drilling muds from offshore oil and gas installations remains within agreed limits for each installation. [509]

Mr. Page: The discharge of chemicals from offshore installations is currently regulated by a voluntary scheme. This scheme will be replaced by an internationally agreed mandatory scheme in the near future which will also regulate use of chemicals.

I refer the hon. Member to my previous replies to similar questions on 4 June 1996, Official Report, columns 307-8 and 3 July 1996, Official Report, column 458.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what regulatory action is undertaken by the Government to ensure that the cumulative effects of discharges to the environment from offshore oil and gas installations are maintained below levels which cause damage to marine wildlife and habitats. [508]

Mr. Page: Exemptions from the Prevention of Oil Pollution Act are given to offshore installations at levels which are agreed in international fora as not likely to cause cumulative damage to marine wildlife and habitats.

I refer the hon. Member to my previous replies to similar questions on 4 June 1996, Official Report columns 307–8 and 3 July 1996, Official Report, column 458.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements are in place for Government officials to undertake field inspections to assess the quality and quantity of polluting discharges other than oil spills and produced water from offshore oil and gas installations. [510]

Mr. Page: My officials make use of transport systems provided by the industry in order to undertake field inspections to assess the quality and quantity of polluting discharges. It is understood that this practice mirrors that undertaken in other nations.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what cumulative impacts of discharges from offshore oil and gas installations on marine wildlife and habitats are taken into account when agreeing limits for the discharge and use of chemicals for each installation. [507]

Mr. Page: My Department is advised by the Ministry of Fisheries and Food and the Scottish Office Agriculture, Environment and Fisheries Department on the impacts of discharges to the marine environment. I refer the hon. Member to the replies given today by my hon. Friends, the Parliamentary Under Secretaries at MAFF and the Scottish Office to her questions on this topic.

Arms Embargo (Argentina)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade for what reason the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), omitted the reassessments of arms embargos against Argentina since January 1991 in his answer of 13 June 1996, Official Report, column 263. [787]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 28 October 1996]: In his answer, my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley stated that the policy on the application of the embargo on defence sales is kept under regular review. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands, Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, told the House on 24 October 1996, Official Report, column 141, should the Government decide to implement any relaxation of the embargo, this will be announced to Parliament.

Enterprise Britain Initiative

Mr. Hoon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the constituencies to be visited under the enterprise Britain initiative; and what is the estimated cost of the exercise. [70]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The detailed programme is currently being arranged. The cost will depend on the number and size of the events.

Mr. Hoon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what will be the cost to those attending enterprise Britain events. [163]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 28 October 1996]: There will be no charge for those attending the events.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

British Library

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is her estimate of the proportion of internationally available scientific literature and patent collections available in conditions of open access at each of the British library's reading rooms. [459]

Mr. Sproat: The British library's science reference and information service acquires some 1 million patent specifications annually, which it estimates to constitute some 99 per cent. of the world's published output of such specifications. Sixty-one per cent. of the material held by the science reference and information service in this category is available either on open access, or is accessible to those users holding a vault pass. Of the total estimated 81,000 scientific periodicals published world-wide, the British library estimates that the science reference and information service currently receives 20,000 research titles. Material in English published during the last 10 years, and material published in other languages during the last two to three years, is held on open access, representing some 26 per cent. of the total research periodicals held by the science reference and information service. It is not possible to estimate the total number of scientific monographs published throughout the world. The science reference and information service receives some 4,500 new scientific monograph titles at research level published in the UK each year through legal deposit, and acquires foreign titles in line with the acquisition funds available.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the total value of properties which have been sold from the British library estate. [440]

Mr. Sproat: The library sold its freehold in 14 Store street, London WC1, for £5.5 million on 19 August 1991. I understand that no other property held by the British library has been sold.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what leaseback arrangements have been registered in the use of properties in the British library estate. [439]

Mr. Sproat: None.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what has been the total number of voluntary and compulsory redundancies at each of the branches of the British library in the last five years. [460]

Mr. Sproat: No British library staff have been subject to either voluntary or compulsory redundancy prior to March 1996. Forty-nine employees of the British library accepted the terms of a voluntary redundancy programme which was offered in March 1996, 13 of whom have already left the library's employment and a further 12 of whom will do so during the remainder of the present financial year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what estimates she has of the value of the two British library related assets in Tooks court, London WC2. [438]

Mr. Sproat: The premises at 25 Southampton buildings, London WC2, adjoin Tooks court, and house part of the British library's science reference and information service. The property, part of which is leased by the British library, was valued at £6 million as at 13 November 1995.

National Lottery

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if he will list the total amounts of the lottery funding awards to date in respect of each parliamentary constituency in England and Wales, indicating for each the amounts awarded in the last quarter for which figures are available and listing constituencies in descending rank order by total amounts; [519]

(2) if she will list the total amounts of the lottery funding awards to date in respect of each parliamentary constituency in Northern Ireland indicating for each the amounts awarded in the last quarter for which figures are available and listing constituencies in descending rank order by total amounts; [987]

(3) if she will list the total amounts of lottery funding awards to date in respect of each parliamentary constituency in Scotland indicating for each the amounts awarded in the last quarter for which figures are available and listing the constituencies in descending rank order by total amounts. [988]

Mr. Sproat: A full list of all awards up to 30 September, broken down by each parliamentary constituency, has been placed in the House of Commons Library today, on computer disc. The Secretary of State wrote to all members of the House on 18 October with an update of awards made in their constituencies during the last quarter. At present, the figures cannot be ranked as requested without disproportionate costs.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Council (Visit to Japan)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what factors led to the visit to Japan by members of the Northern Ireland Housing Council; what is the estimated cost of the visit; and if he will make a statement. [47]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, whose chief executive has advised me that the Northern Ireland Housing Council was represented at the International Federation for Housing and Planning congress in Japan by its chairman. The congress was a follow-up to the highly successful IFHP congress held in Belfast in September 1995 which the Housing Council was instrumental in bringing to Northern Ireland. The IFHP congress provides an opportunity for the exchange of information and experience on housing and planning issues and also the development of international housing contacts. The estimated cost of attendance is approximately £3,000.

Drumcree Incident

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the cost of the damage to property caused by the incident at Drumcree and subsequent events during July and August 1996. [139]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Compensation Agency under its chief executive, Mr Denis Stanley. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. A. Stanley to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply, on behalf of the Compensation Agency, to your recent Question regarding the estimated cost of damage to property caused by the incident at Drumcree and subsequent events during July and August 1996.

The Agency estimates that criminal damage amount to £20 million occurred throughout Northern Ireland during the period 9–14 July. Claims with an estimated value of £9 million have been received for incidents for the period of 15 July onwards. These estimates are based on the Agency's loss adjusters' current valuation of individual claims and may, of course, change as the claims proceed to settlement.

Harbours

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the last financial year what was the contribution of each of the harbours at (a) Portavogie, (b) Ardglass and (c) Kilkeel to the income of the Northern Ireland Fishery Harbour Authority; and what was the capital expenditure by the authority at each of these fishing ports in the same financial year. [45]

Mr. Ancram: The following table provides details of the authority's income and expenditure in 1995–96:

	Ardglass £	Kilkeel £	Portavogie £
Operating income	101,109	311,421	235,292
Capital works expenditure	315,692	548,111	154,526

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many claims were made for compensation as a result of (i) damage to property and (ii) injury to persons as a result of the incident at Drumcree and subsequent events in July and August 1996. [138]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Compensation Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Denis Stanley. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. A. Stanley to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply, on behalf of the Compensation Agency, to your recent Question regarding the number of claims made for compensation in respect of damage to property and injury to persons as a result of the incident at Drumcree and subsequent events during July and August 1996.

The Agency has received a total of 2,665 criminal damage claims and 2,431 criminal injury claims for incidents that occurred during the months of July and August. Prior to July, the number of criminal damage claims being received each month was around 100 and the number of criminal injury claims was around 900 each month. Therefore 2,465 additional criminal damage claims and 631 additional criminal injury claims have been received so far for the months of July and August.

Portavogie Harbour

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the production of ice at Portavogie harbour; how many reports he has received of fishing boats from Portavogie going to Ardglass harbour to get ice because of inadequate production; what plans there are to increase ice production at Portavogie harbour; and if he will make a statement. [48]

Mr. Ancram: On 19 September 1996, the compressor on the Northern Ireland Fishery Harbour Authority's main ice plant at Portavogie broke down and had to be replaced. Only a small amount of ice was available for the Portavogie fleet during the rest of that week. Two Portavogie boats obtained ice from the authority's new plant at Ardglass, and the authority organised the delivery of ice from Ardglass to the other Portavogie boats. Ice production was back to normal on 25 September. The authority has commissioned the Sea Fish Industry Authority to undertake an in-depth assessment of the ice production and storage needs at Portavogie, and to advise on the various options by which these can best be met.

Casualty Animals

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received relating to the reluctance of contractors to pick up bulls as casualty animals; and if he will make a statement. [466]

Mr. Ancram: No such representations have been received.

Children

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many children in Northern Ireland will be aged (a) three and (b) four in (i) 1996, (ii) 1997, (iii) 1998 and (iv) 1999. [1176]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Statistics and Research Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Edgar Jardine. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from E. F. Jardine to Ms Majorie Mowlam, dated 30 October 1996:

You recently tabled a parliamentary question asking the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many children in Northern Ireland will be aged (a) three and (b) four in (i) 1996, (ii) 1997, (iii) 1998 and (iv) 1999. I have been asked to reply in my capacity as Chief Executive of the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency.

Projections of the population of the constituent countries of the United Kingdom are produced by the Government Actuary's Department (London). The information requested is shown in the table below. The figures represent the projection for the age group in question at the mid-year period (30 June).

Year	3-year-olds	4-year-olds
1996	25,015	26,279
1997	24,545	25,015
1998	24,233	24,535
1999	23,884	24,219

I trust this information is sufficient and if I can be of further assistance please do not hesitate to contact me.

Social Security Agency

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for the Social Security Agency for the current financial year. [1811]

Mr. Moss: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to him on 30 April 1996, Official Report, columns 455–56. However, contrary to that answer, there is no secondary target for unemployment benefit claims clearance of 85 per cent. in 53 days, but only a single target of 75 per cent. in 12 days.

Electoral Officer's Report

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish the report of the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland of 1995–96. [1812]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The Chief Electoral Officer's annual report has been laid before Parliament today. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Survey

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to receive the results of the disability survey being carried out by his Department; and when he will publish the survey. [126]

Mr. Burt: We expect to receive the data from the disability survey in summer 1997, shortly after completion of field work. The disability survey is a follow-up to the family resources survey and analysis will require data from the two surveys to be merged; we expect to have a combined dataset by the end of 1997. Plans are currently being made for the analysis of this large and complex dataset, but no date for publication has been decided as yet. Details will be included in the Department's research programme announcement next year.

Audit Commission (Fraud Investigations)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what new powers his legislative proposals to counter fraud will provide to the Audit Commission which would avoid the use of powers specified in sections 28 and 29 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982; what legal advice he has taken concerning the use of these powers by the Audit Commission with respect to its current fraud activities; and what limitations on the commission's work in this area were indicated by that advice. [210]

Mr. Heald: We shall be bringing forward legislative proposals to counter fraud shortly.

Voluntary Unemployment Deductions

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the numbers of people who have received a voluntary unemployment deduction in the current financial year; and what is the total amount of money deducted. [416]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

As at November 1995 it is estimated that some 30,000 income support claimants had a deduction from their income support payment for voluntary unemployment. The estimated average amount being deducted was £16.08 per week which equates to £25.3 million per year.

Notes:

1. Rates of deduction for voluntary unemployment are at 20 per cent. or 40 per cent. of the personal allowance.
2. Sample size 5 per cent.
3. Numbers have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
4. The average amount deducted for voluntary unemployment was estimated using the deduction amount recorded on the income support computer system.
5. In a small number of cases, the amount to be deducted was greater than the award of income support. In such cases the latter was used as the "actual" amount deducted.
6. The total amount of money deducted was estimated by multiplying the average weekly deduction by the number of cases with a deduction by 52. This figure was then rounded to the nearest hundred thousand.

Incapacity Benefit (Medical Tests)

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish evaluation studies of the standards of medical tests conducted on claimants for incapacity benefit seen by doctors of the Benefits Agency medical service. [757]

Mr. Burt: The performance of Benefits Agency medical service doctors is continuously monitored under local management arrangements to ensure that agreed standards of medical advice are maintained. A major study looking at the consistency of application of the all work test was recently carried out, and a report is being prepared for publication.

War Pensions (Mustard Gas)

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the outcome of his Department's investigation started in 1986 into whether casualties contaminated by mustard gas at Bari harbour, Italy, in 1943 should be awarded back-dated war pensions; and if he will make a statement. [743]

Mr. Heald: This investigation was undertaken following the exceptional decision to backdate the payment of war disablement pension to an individual who had been exposed to mustard gas while serving in the Royal Navy at Bari harbour in 1943. He had claimed a war pension in 1983 and contended that he would have claimed earlier had he been aware of the precise nature of the substance with which he had been contaminated.

The purpose of the special exercise was to identify other casualties of the incident in order to establish whether similar action was appropriate in their cases. A press notice announcing the exercise was issued and as a result of this 87 new claims for war pension were received, of which 33 were successful. In addition, 97 claims which had been made previously were reviewed. In total, of the 184 claims, 105 were successful.

The exercise confirmed that all but one were aware at the time of the incident that they had been exposed to mustard gas.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what arrangements he plans to make in respect of measures to counter fraud to ensure that claimants do not suffer damage or distress as a result of the matching of personal data which (a) are inaccurate, irrelevant or out of date or (b) relate to other individuals with the same or similar names; and if he will make a statement. [208]

Mr. Heald: The Department has considerable experience in matching data held on different computer systems. The detailed criteria to be matched in each exercise are tightly defined to ensure that they are relevant to the benefit concerned and could not properly belong to more than one individual. Where anomalies are revealed, they are fully checked to eliminate inaccuracies before any further investigation is carried out. All data matching activities are conducted under secure conditions to ensure confidentiality.

Social Fund

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications to the social fund were turned down on the grounds of ability to pay in 1995–96 in (a) Great Britain, (b) east London and (c) Newham; and what percentage of the total applying this figure represented in each case. [982]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Stephen Timms, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many applications to the Social Fund were turned down on the grounds of ability to pay in 1995–96 in (a) Great Britain, (b) East London and (c) Newham; and what percentage of the total applying this figure represented in each case.

The information for East London and Newham is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

I have provided at Annex A the national information.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Annex A: number of refusals on the grounds of inability to repay and as a percentage of all applications for the period April 1995 to March 1996

	Inability to repay	Percentage of total applications
National	10,411	0.4

Figures are provisional and subject to change.

Income Support

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to align the rules for calculating earnings, provided for by the Social Security Benefit (Computation of Earnings) Regulations 1978, with the rules used to calculate earnings in the income support scheme. [1341]

Mr. Roger Evans: I have today laid the Social Security Benefit (Computation of Earnings) Regulations 1996 before Parliament. The regulations will align, as far as possible, the rules for calculating a person's earnings for the purposes of contributory benefits, non-contributory benefits, increases for dependants and benefits for industrial injuries—except industrial injuries and diseases, old cases—with the rules used in the income support scheme. The change will remove a number of inconsistencies between benefits and reduce complexity in the social security scheme. In a small number of cases the changes may result in either benefit loss or gain.

War Widows Pension

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make it his policy that widows of Japanese prisoners of war will not have their pensions reduced because their late husbands may have died from smoking-related illnesses; [907]

(2) how many widows have been affected by changes in the regulations controlling the level of pensions for widows of Japanese prisoners of war; [908]

(3) how many widows of Japanese prisoners of war are currently receiving pensions; how many are receiving pensions which (a) have and (b) have not been reduced by the change in regulations related to death due to smoking-related illnesses; and how many are receiving a reduced pension as a result of those changes. [909]

Mr. Heald: Contrary to news reports, there has been no change in rules regarding pensions for war widows whose husbands died of smoking-related diseases.

A war widow's pension may be awarded where the late husband's death was due to, or is substantially hastened by, any service in the armed forces. There is no automatic entitlement to a war widow's pension because the late husband was a war pensioner.

The war pensions scheme was never intended to compensate for the effects of a personal habit such as smoking. Policy on this has not changed. Over more than 40 years that has been the policy of successive Governments; it has applied to all those who served in the armed forces, including those who were prisoners of the Japanese during world war two.

The law does however provide for awards in respect of smoking-related conditions where there was a severely disabling mental condition—itself attributable to service and assessed for war pension purposes at a minimum of 50 per cent.—which rendered the late husband incapable of exercising personal choice and prevented him giving up the habit.

Additionally, if there was more than one cause of death, one being smoking related and the other not smoking related but still linked to service, a war widow's pension will still be payable.

Information on the numbers of war widows pensions in payment to the widows of former prisoners of the Japanese is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Female Workers

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to produce a report on female workers similar to the one entitled "Male Earnings Mobility in the Lifetime Labour Market Database". [1129]

Mr. Burt: Analyses of earnings movements among women will be undertaken as part of the Department's current programme of work from the lifetime labour market database. Analyses of female earners were previously hindered by a lack of comprehensive data identifying women who take a career break to look after children; this problem has been largely removed in the most recent version of the lifetime labour market database.

Invalidity and Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people (i) claimed and (ii) received (a) sickness benefit for each year since 1990, (b) invalidity benefit for each year since 1990, (c) incapacity benefit short-term lower rate since its introduction, (d) incapacity benefit short-term higher rate since its introduction and (e) incapacity benefit long-term rate with invalidity allowance but without additional pension since its introduction. [744]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the tables.

Table A: sickness and invalidity benefit

Date	Sickness benefit		Invalidity benefit
	Claimants	Beneficiaries	Claimants	Beneficiaries
31 March 1990	309,000	103,000	1,209,000	1,209,000

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what estimate his Department has made of the savings accruing from the abolition of the additional invalidity benefit; [732]

(2) what factors underlay the abolition of the additional invalidity benefit following the introduction of incapacity benefit in April 1995. [730]

Mr. Burt: The additional pension component of invalidity benefit was abolished because it was poorly targeted and did not represent value for money for the taxpayer. As additional pension was earnings-related, those with the highest earnings prior to receipt of benefit gained most and were also more likely to be in receipt of other income such as an occupational pension. The cost of additional pension was projected to rise to almost £2 billion by the year 2000–01.

Estimates for net savings from the abolition of AP are in the table.

Year	Net savings (£ million)
1995–96	105
1996–97	275
1997–98	425

1. Estimates are in cash terms and based on Government Actuary Department forecasts and family expenditure data.
2. Savings are net of any income-related benefit offsets.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the annual cost to his Department of incapacity benefit for each of the five years before its abolition. [731]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

£ million

Year	Expenditure
	Sickness benefit (SB)	Invalidity benefit (IVB)	Administration costs (SB and IVB)	Total
1990–91	216	4,431	208	5,071

1992–93	364	6,210	322	6,896
1993–94	365	7,068	359	7,792
1994–95	342	7,705	347	8,394

1. All figures except for sickness benefit and invalidity benefit expenditure for 1994–95 are from successive departmental reports.
2. Expenditure figures for sickness benefit and invalidity benefit in 1994–95 are from the national insurance fund accounts and supersede those in the current departmental report.
3. Sickness and invalidity benefits were replaced by incapacity benefit from 13 April 1995.

Mr. Hanley: Our language is a great national asset and we continue to encourage the use, understanding and teaching of British English abroad through the medium of British organisations, goods and services. We have first-class institutions engaged in English language teaching and training, and activities of the British Council, BBC World Service, educational institutions, publishers and suppliers all serve to promote our long-term political, economic and commercial interests worldwide. The British Council-led English 2000 project, launched last year, brings all sectors together to promote the teaching and use of English into the next century.

Mr. David Davis: The tripartite commission, at our request, has already discussed this subject: it is now being considered by the member Governments—the UK, France and the US.

Afghanistan

31. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the situation in Afghanistan. [716]

Mr. David Davis: The objectives of the European Union and the European Communities are not comparable with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The objectives of the European Union are described in the preamble to the treaty on European Union and its opening articles, in particular articles A, B and F. The objectives of the European Communities are likewise set out in the preambles to the treaties establishing them and in their opening articles, in particular articles 2 and 3 of the EC treaty, articles 2 and 3 of the European Coal and Steel Community treaty, and articles 1 and 2 of the Euratom treaty.

Northern Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit the occupied area of northern Cyprus during his forthcoming visit to the Republic of Cyprus. [962]

Mr. David Davis: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will hold talks with President Klerides and also with Mr. Denktas in his capacity as leader of the Turkish Cypriot community. Timings and venues for the talks are to be arranged.

International Criminal Court

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the preparatory committee of the United Nations General Assembly on the establishment of an international criminal court, indicating whether Her Majesty's Government will provide financial support to help to create such an institution. [963]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have participated actively in the work of the preparatory committee. While much has been achieved, an enormous amount remains to be done. We therefore supported the recommendation of the preparatory committee at its last session that up to nine more weeks were required for further preparatory work. We also believe that we should set a date in 1998 for a conference to consider the statute of such a court. At the next session of the General Assembly, we shall need to review the progress made by the preparatory committee in its sessions in 1997.

The preparatory process is founded out of the UN regular budget to which we contribute.

Turkey (Human Rights)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures his Department is taking to prevent human rights abuses against Christians in Turkey. [1097]

Mr. David Davis: We remain concerned about the human rights situation in Turkey and its effect on all people, including the Christian minorities. We will continue to raise our concerns with the Turkish authorities. Our embassy officials also pay regular visits to Christian communities in Turkey. The next visit is planned for November.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet representatives of the Government of Sri Lanka to discuss the situation of the Tamil community. [266]

Dr. Liam Fox: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has regular meetings with representatives of the Sri Lankan Government to discuss the ethnic conflict. Most recently, he saw the Sri Lanka Foreign Minister in London on 14 October.

United Nations (Payment of Dues)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by the United Kingdom Government to that of the USA concerning payment of dues to the United Nations. [702]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We firmly believe that all UN member states, including the US, must pay their UN dues promptly, in full and without conditions. We take every opportunity to urge the US to pay its UN dues, including its arrears, in accordance with its legal obligation to do so. The EU proposals for UN financial reform include penalties for member states that fail to pay their dues.

Western Sahara

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards the future role of the United Nations in the Western Sahara. [801]

Mr. Hanley: We support the UN Secretary–General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara—MINURSO—the UN operation in the region, in their efforts to bring about an end to this long–running conflict.

Sudan

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimates he has assessed relating to the numbers of Sudanese civilians that have been killed as a result of warfare since 1991, indicating where possible, the ethnic group of casualties. [678]

Mr. Hanley: No detailed figures are available. But the UN special rapporteur on human rights in Sudan suggested in his most recent report, February 1996, that 1.2 million people had died since 1983 as a result of the Sudan civil war.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth affairs what measures his Department intends to take to encourage the Government of Sudan to (a) conduct a referendum on the independence of southern Sudan and (b) bring about a ceasefire; and what discussions are planned with the Government of Sudan. [679]

Mr. Hanley: We continue to make clear to the Government of Sudan that we look to them to move towards a negotiated end to the civil war by declaring a ceasefire and that its continuing prosecution of the civil war stands in the way of an improvement in bilateral relations with the UK. The British ambassador in Khartoum sees members of the Government there frequently. The need for an end to the civil war is always high on the agenda.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of state for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures his Department intends to take to encourage the Government of Sudan to repatriate the Sudanese who have been displaced by civil war. [680]

Mr. Hanley: The return of Sudanese displaced by the civil war to their local regions is not possible while the civil war continues.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which British diplomats have visited the Nuer lands of Upper Nile state in southern Sudan since Dr. Riek Machar signed the "political charter" with the Sudan Government in April 1996 to assess popular support and the support of traditional leaders (i) for him and (ii) for his signing of the charter; and what were those assessments. [994]

Mr. Hanley: The embassy has an active programme of visits to all parts of Sudan but has not visited the Nuer lands since July 1995.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will conduct a review of British Government policy towards the Sudan. [986]

Mr. Hanley: We keep British policy towards Sudan, and, in particular, what we can usefully do to help the situation in the south, under constant review.

DEFENCE

Porton Down

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how long the chemical and biological defence establishment, Porton Down, aims to take to reply to letters from individuals who took part in the service volunteers programme at the establishment when they request details of their experiments. [741]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 30 October 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question concerning the length of time taken to respond to letters from those who took part in studies at Porton Down. The Chemical and Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

Staff at Porton Down aim to reply to all letters from former volunteers within 10 days. Where this is not possible, we seek to send an interim reply inside this timescale.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many individuals took part in the service volunteers programme at the chemical and biological defence establishment during (a) 1994 and (b) 1995. [726]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 30 October 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) which now includes the former Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment (CBDE), I have been asked to reply to your question concerning the numbers of volunteers who participated in the service volunteer programme at Porton Down in 1994 and 1995.

The volunteer records show that ninety six individuals came to Porton Down to take part in the volunteer programme in 1994 and fifty eight in 1995.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions the chemical and biological defence establishment, Porton Down, has provided relevant extracts from (a) technical reports and (b) original laboratory data to the War Pensions Agency in response to individuals making disablement claims arising out of experiments at Porton Down as indicated in his answer of 22 July, Official Report, columns 87–88. [742]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 30 October 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question concerning the provision of technical reports and original laboratory data to the War Pensions Agency when dealing with claims form former volunteers at Porton Down. The Chemical and Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

It is normal practice in dealing with requests from the War Pensions Agency for CBD Sector to provide confirmation of attendance and a short explanation of the tests undertaken. This includes details of any exposure to chemicals, the believed purpose of the study, an outline of the experimental methods used (where they are known) and any reaction of the individual to the study noted in the remaining records. Only on one occasion in recent years have additional details of a volunteer's experiences been provided through release of photocopies of the laboratory record books or copies of technical reports discussing the type of study conducted.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the chemical and biological establishment's assessment of the effect on human health in (a) the short term and (b) the long term of one-off exposure to the chemical agent CN; and what research has been done by the chemical and biological defence establishment to reach this assessment. [725]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 30 October 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question concerning Porton Down's assessment of the effects on human health of exposure to the chemical agent CN. The Chemical and Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

Short term exposure to chloroacteophenone (CN) causes a burning sensation in the throat, eyes and nose within seconds of exposure. These effects are accompanied by excessive lachrymation, a running nose and a stinging sensation of the skin. In the majority of cases these symptoms resolve themselves spontaneously within around 30 minutes of the end of the exposure.

Exposure to high concentrations can cause long term clinical effects, namely, damage to the eye and a dermatitis of the skin. This dermatitis involves reddening, swelling and in severe cases ulceration.

The eye effects were observed following studies of the exposure of experimental animals to riot control agents and further information was obtained from case reports from the United States following the widespread use of CN during Civil Rights Riots in the late 1960s. Information regarding the skin effects from exposure to CN and CS was obtained through limited volunteer studies carried out at Porton in the late 1960s. A copy of a technical report produced from these studies was sent to you with my letter of 21st October 1996.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the chemical and biological defence establishment's assessment of whether short-term exposure to mustard gas causes (a) chronic conjunctivitis or (b) pigmentation abnormalities of the skin; and what research has been carried out by the establishment at Porton Down to reach this assessment. [740]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 30 October 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question concerning Porton Down's assessment of the effects of short-term exposure to mustard gas. The Chemical and Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

2,2—(bis-chloroethyl) sulphide, commonly called mustard gas, is a member of the class of chemical warfare agents called vesicants. These agents affect the skin, lungs and eyes of individuals who are exposed to either the liquid or the vapour, although the effects are more severe from exposure to the liquid.

Chronic conjunctivitis has generally been observed to occur after exposure of the eyes to mustard vapour or liquid. It can persist for several days, depending on the dose of agent, although complete healing usually follows except where very high doses are involved, in which case scarring of the conjunctiva and permanent damage may occur.

Similarly, de-pigmentation may occur in healed skin following exposure to mustard gas agent on a sufficient scale to cause blistering.

Information on mustard agent injuries used to produce Porton Down's assessment of the effect of exposure to the agent is taken from numerous sources. The best description of the effects continue to be the first hand accounts from First World War casualties. In the 1930s and early 1940s studies were conducted at Porton Down involving animals and service volunteers which provided considerable data. This information has been subsequently updated by the observations made by medical personnel involved in the clinical management of casualties from the Iran–Iraq war who were treated in London between 1984—988.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the chemical and biological defence establishment published its annual report for 1995–96. [727]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 30 October 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question concerning the publication date of the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment's annual report.

On 1 April 1995 the former Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment became part of the new Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. The DERA annual report, which includes a section on the activities of the enlarged CBDE division, was laid before the House on 16 July 1996.

I have arranged for a copy of this year's annual report to be sent to you under separate cover which I hope you will find helpful.

Land Mines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the (a) designed maximum timed life and (b) self-destruct reliability of scatterable mine systems due to enter service with the armed forces in 1999. [392]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The designed maximum timed life of the land mines for the vehicle launched scatterable anti-tank mine system which is due to enter service with the Army in 1999 is classified. The design aim for the self destruct reliability of these anti-tank mines is 99.9 per cent. Testing to date has demonstrated that this is being met. Additionally, mine detonation relies on a short-life battery and any mine that fails to self-destruct will deactivate within a further short time.

Departmental Property

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the terms of reference for agents undertaking the sale of his Department's property. [205]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The terms of reference for agents undertaking the sale of my Department's property depend upon the particular circumstances of the sale in question. The details of the sales contract are negotiated with the relevant agent.

Pilots and Navigators

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will examine the reintroduction of senior non-commissioned officers as pilots and navigators on transport aircraft and helicopters; and if he will assess the performance of their equivalents in the Army Air Corps. [836]

Mr. Soames: The Royal Air Force has no plans to extend the role of airmen (aircrew), who are non-commissioned officers, to encompass the role of pilots or navigators.

Personnel Training (Bermuda)

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will scrap the policy of charging the Bermuda Government for the training of personnel. [838]

Mr. Soames: No. It is our policy to recover the costs of providing training for outside customers, except in cases where the benefit to the United Kingdom is such that a subsidy can be justified.

Recruitment

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect of the recruitment of British dependent territory citizens on British forces. [839]

Mr. Soames: No specific assessment of the effect of recruitment of British dependent territory citizens on British armed forces has been made.

Bermuda Regiment

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to incorporate the Bermuda Regiment into the British Army's order of battle. [840]

Mr. Soames: There are no plans to incorporate the Bermuda Regiment into the Army's order of battle.

Merchant Vessels

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of merchant vessels chartered for use in military exercises or operations involving United Kingdom forces, the flag nationality of those vessels, and the total cost of these charters, over the past five years. [1029]

Mr. Soames: During the past five years—1992 to September 1996—143 vessels have been chartered for exercise/operations. These were:

Nationality	Number
Danish	49
German	18
Norwegian	16
Swedish	12
Spanish	7
Ukrainian	6
Maltese	5
Swiss	4
Panamanian	3
Bahamian	3
Finnish	3

Nationality	Number
Italian	3
Dutch	2
Greek	2
Luxembourg	2
Polish	2
French	1
Swiss	1
Cypriot	1
Dutch	1
Liberian	1
British	1

The total cost of chartering these vessels was £43,816,794.

Pregnancy Dismissal Cases (Legal Fees)

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of legal fees incurred by Her Majesty's Government in relation to the armed services pregnancy dismissal cases defended by his Department in respect of legal advice and work, separately identifying advocacy provided by lawyers in private practice; and what was the average (a) daily and (b) hourly rate contracted for the advice and work. [851]

Mr. Soames: The total cost of legal fees to date in the armed forces pregnancy dismissal litigation, including disbursements and VAT, is £6.8 million, the majority of which—£6.3 million—has been paid to the Treasury Solicitor's Department. Barristers in private practice have been used as advocates in the 360 cases which have proceeded to an industrial tribunal—7 per cent., of all cases—but their fees cannot be separately identified in the overall figure of £1.9 million, including VAT, which the Treasury Solicitor's Department has disbursed in respect of counsel's fees. It is not possible to calculate a meaningful average daily or hourly rate for the variety of advice given and work done.

Proof and Experimental Station, Inchterf

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what future use he is considering for the former proof and experimental station at Inchterf, Auchenreoch; and if he will preclude its use as (i) a private shooting range or (ii) an explosives testing ground. [853]

Mr. Soames: The former proof and experimental station at Inchterf has been marketed on the basis of a planning brief agreed with the local authority. This does not envisage the site being used as an explosive testing ground nor as a private shooting range. We are not aware that any of those who have expressed interest in the site intend to use it for those purposes.

Air Traffic Movements (Northolt)

Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what were the number of military air traffic movements at RAF Northolt in (a) 1989 and (b) 1994; and if he will estimate the number of such movements for the year ending 31 December 1996; [855]

(2) what was the total number of civilian air traffic movements at RAF Northolt in (a) 1989 and (b) 1994; and if he will estimate the number for the year ending 31 December 1996. [854]

Mr. Soames: The following table provides the information requested on military and civilian movements at RAF Northolt. The 1996 estimate for military movements includes those by civil aircraft on Government business, such as MOD charters.

	1989	1994	1996[1]
Military	9,500	7,319	8,450
Civilian	5,600	5,425	6,450

[1] Estimate.

RAF Fast Jets (Maintenance)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to improve quality control in the maintenance of RAF fast jets by contractors. [898]

Mr. Soames: The MOD aims to place full responsibility on its contractors for the quality of the products and services which they supply. It is MOD policy to place contracts only with those suppliers who have been assessed by an accredited body to an appropriate quality management standard.

Computer Hacking, Fraud and Theft

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many cases of computer hacking, fraud and theft, including theft of computer chips, his Department has recorded in the last five years. [800]

Mr. Soames: Consolidated records of computer hacking, computer fraud and computer theft have only been maintained across the Department since 1 April 1995. Since that date 152 known cases of theft of computers or computer equipment, including two cases of chip theft, have been recorded and there have been no reported instances of computer fraud.

In respect of hacking I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 17 June 1996, Official Report, column 364.

These figures do not include cases under current active investigation or sub judice.

Computers

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many computers are held by (a) the Ministry of Defence and (b) the individual services. [799]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Beef Purchases

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how much non-United Kingdom produced beef was purchased by his Department in 1995–96; and how much has been purchased in the current financial year; [910]

(2) if he will list the countries which have supplied beef to his Department in the financial years (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1996–97 indicating the amounts and value. [911]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The procurement of food for the armed forces is contracted to the Navy, Army and Air Force Institutes NAAFI. My Department does not specify the source of origin from which NAAFI should obtain beef or any other meat, but expects them to seek the best market price for the product. The majority of our requirements are for frozen beef, which is not readily available from the British market.

In the financial year 1995–96 and in the first six months of the current financial year NAAFI purchased some 1.45M kg of non UK beef, valued at £5.2 million. This was sourced primarily from South America, New Zealand and Australia.

Argentine Destroyers

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the security threat posed by Argentine destroyers, with particular reference to those equipped with bomb-proof casing. [673]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 28 October 1996]: We continue to monitor all developments which may affect our security interests in the South Atlantic. We are satisfied that the forces we maintain there, supported as necessary by reinforcements, are capable of meeting our commitment to the security of the Falkland Islands and other dependencies.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Vessels Safety Grants Scheme

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will extend the vessel safety grants scheme to fishing boats under 12 m prior to the extension of the marine safety code to these vessels in 1997. [663]

Mr. Baldry: The Marine Safety Agency is developing a safety code for fishing vessels under 12 m and consultations with the industry on its requirements are in progress. I am informed that the MSA intends to publish the code early in 1997 and to bring it into force in 1998. But until the requirements of the code have been agreed and the costs of implementation calculated it will not be possible to reach decisions on any extension of the current safety grant scheme to fishing vessels under 12 m.

Feline Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what Government guidelines exist to assist veterinary staff and surgeons in diagnosing feline spongiform encephalopathy; and if he will make a statement. [455]

Mrs. Browning: The clinical signs and pathological lesions associated with feline spongiform encephalopathy have been published in the veterinary and scientific press in considerable detail. The first confirmation was announced in The Veterinary Record on 19 May 1990, and included details of clinical signs that would enable veterinary surgeons to identify possible cases. The signs are not dissimilar to rabies which, being a notifiable disease, veterinary surgeons would automatically report to the divisional veterinary manager. Moreover, the clinical signs of FSE are in fact similar to those seen in cattle with BSE, a condition with which most veterinary practitioners and all MAFF veterinary officers are fully familiar.

Advice was given directly to such practitioners that, subject to the elimination of rabies as a cause of disease, a free post mortem examination for FSE was available through the veterinary investigation service of MAFF. Since November 1994 the diagnosis of any transmissible spongiform encephalopathy in the laboratory, other than those produced by experimental means in the course of research, has been officially notifiable.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what Government procedures exist for (a) encouraging the reporting of and (b) collating data relating to feline spongiform encephalopathy; if he will indicate the date of inception for each procedure; and if he will list those procedures which no longer operate; and if he will make a statement. [465]

Mrs. Browning: The Spongiform Encephalopathy (Miscellaneous Amendments) Order 1994 makes suspicion of spongiform encephalopathies in species other than cattle, sheep and goats following laboratory examination notifiable. Nevertheless, from May 1990 when the first confirmation of feline spongiform encephalopathy was announced, MAFF encouraged the veterinary profession to report suspicion of any cases to the local divisional veterinary manager. This was done by publication of a letter from the Chief Veterinary Officer in The Veterinary Record, as well as by local communication between DVMs and veterinary surgeons. A free diagnostic service was offered through the veterinary investigation service where a differential diagnosis was not required. Not all presentations of cases were directly through veterinary practitioners. Some were identified after referral to university veterinary departments. While the majority of cases have subsequently confirmed by examination of brain tissue at the central veterinary laboratory, the diagnosis of veterinary pathologists with experience of FSE is usually accepted as definitive.

Following confirmation, a veterinary officer of the Ministry carries out an epidemiological investigation, where possible, involving the veterinary surgeon, the current owner, and if appropriate previous owners. As with cattle, this involves full details of the animal's medical and feeding history. Details of all confirmed cases are held centrally to allow further analysis and interpretation.

Pet Food

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what data his Department collates on the quantity of mammalian meat and bonemeal used in pet food; which manufacturers of pet food use mammalian meat and bonemeal in pet food; and if he will make a statement. [422]

Mrs. Browning: This Department does not collate data on the quantity of mammalian meat and bonemeal used in pet food, nor does it have any information on which pet food manufacturers use such material.

Bovine Livestock Feeds

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all known ingredients of (a) cattle cake and (b) bovine livestock feeds; and if he will make a statement. [474]

Mrs. Browning: It is not feasible to provide an exhaustive list of the ingredients of either cattle cake or bovine livestock feeds. However, the Feeding Stuffs Regulations 1995 list the main raw materials used in compound feeds in the European Union as well as permitted additives and protein sources. A copy of these regulations has been deposited in the House of Commons Library.

Genetic Engineering

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the percentage of the total United Kingdom quantity of (a) grains, (b) pulses and (c) vegetables grown using genetic engineering which have been exported abroad in each of the last five years. [1019]

Mrs. Browning: There have been no exports of genetically modified grains, pulses or vegetables from the United Kingdom in the last five years.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what requirements there are on (a) manufacturers and (b) retailers to indicate the use of genetically engineered ingredients on the labels of food products; and if he will make a statement. [1021]

Mrs. Browning: The need for genetically modified foods to be labelled is assessed by the Food Advisory Committee on a case by case basis as part of the approval process for their use.

In line with the latest draft of the EC Novel Foods and Novel Food Ingredients Regulation, which is expected to be adopted shortly, compulsory labelling is normally required when there is a significant difference in the composition, nutritional value or intended use of a food compared to its conventionally produced equivalent, or if it is likely to give rise to ethical concerns or contain an unexpected allergen. Labelling is also required if any live genetically modified organisms are likely to be present in the food as consumed.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the (i) quantity and (ii) percentage of (a) grains, (b) pulses and (c) vegetables grown using genetic engineering which have been imported into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years. [1023]

Mrs. Browning: The only food from a genetically modified crop imported into the United Kingdom in the past five years is a tomato paste that went on sale in February this year. A total of 900,000 cans have been imported from the USA to date.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the percentage of soya products on sale in the United Kingdom which contain genetically engineered beans in each of the last five years. [1020]

Mrs. Browning: No soya products sold in the United Kingdom in the last five years have contained genetically modified beans.

Casualty Cows (Slaughtering)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many casualty dairy cows were slaughtered in each month of 1995 and 1996. [912]

Mrs. Browning: The number of casualty cattle handled under the over thirty months scheme are as follows for each month since the scheme began on 13 May 1996:

	Number
May	3,775
June	8,749
July	13,446
August	12,658
September	15,363
October (up to 28 October)	12,793

These figures do not differentiate between dairy and beef cattle.

The Ministry does not hold central records of the number of dairy cows slaughtered as casualties.

Beef Imports

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much beef and of what value was imported into the United Kingdom in each month of 1995 and 1996 to date. [863]

Mr. Baldry: Imports of beef[1] into the United Kingdom during 1995 and 1996, as recorded in the overseas trade statistics, are as follows:

Year	Month	£ million	Tonnes (thousand)
1995	1	34	15
1995	2	35	15
1995	3	43	20
1995	4	42	17
1995	5	54	24
1995	6	68	28
1995	7	62	26
1995	8	55	22
1995	9	69	26

1996	3	34	14
1996	4	43	20

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 31 October 1996

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Incitement to Racial Hatred

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Attorney-General how many people have been prosecuted in each of the last five years for incitement to racial hatred. [61]

The Attorney-General: For the years 1992 to 1996, I have granted consent to the institution of proceedings for incitement to racial hatred against the following number of defendants:

1992: 3

1993: 2

1994: 2

1995: 7

1996: 4 (to date)

During the last five years, I have declined to give my consent in a total of two cases.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Dual Support Transfer

Sir John Hannam: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what conclusion has been reached on the review of the dual support transfer. [2111]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Following extensive consultations, the Government have decided that, to address the evident concerns of the effect of the dual support transfer on research infrastructure, the contribution to indirect costs in research council grants should be increased from 40 to 45 per cent. of approved staff costs for all grant payments on new and existing grants from 1 April 1997.

Additionally, the research councils and funding councils have been asked to identify and implement further measures by next April to ensure that the transfer achieves its original intentions. In particular, it is important that those making research grant applications include all eligible direct costs, and that the research councils meet these wherever possible.

In announcing these measures, I should like to acknowledge the considerable assistance provided by all concerned. As those consulted plainly recognise, the difficult issues raised by the review require a finely balanced judgment to be made. From the consultation, it was clear that the major concern was with departmental infrastructure associated with grant-funded research projects, and hence the Government hope that universities will deploy the increase in the indirect costs contribution to support such infrastructure.

I have asked the Government's chief scientific adviser, Sir Robert May, to keep under review these new arrangements and the health of the higher education research base through the Science and Engineering Base Co-ordinating Committee, which he chairs.

Manufacturing Jobs

Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many manufacturing jobs with foreign-owned companies operating in the United Kingdom have been lost in the past 12 months. [315]

Mr. Greg Knight: My Department does not collect such information on a systematic basis.

Outward Trade Missions

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what account he has taken of the size of the chambers of commerce and industry when setting criteria of eligibility in respect of outward trade missions; [41]

(2) if he will give for each of the last four years and for 1997–98 details of the awards given to outward trade missions; [40]

(3) what assessment he has made of the implications of the first stage announcement in respect of DTI-supported outward trade missions for north Staffordshire; and if he will make a statement. [42]

Mr. Nelson: The size of the organisation seeking support is but one factor in determining its suitability to run a mission supported by the Department. Other criteria which a chamber of commerce, trade association, business link or similar organisation must fulfil is that it is based in the United Kingdom; represents a substantial proportion of the companies in its industry and/or area, and is of good standing; it must have adequate staff and financial resources to recruit and organise an effective group promotion overseas; and show an active and continuing role in export promotion activities.

All proposals for support are considered on their merits, with account taken of various factors including, for example, the case made for support; how well the proposal meets priorities identified in the country market plan; sponsor's past record. I need also to balance demand against the budget available.

I am confident that the implications of the recent announcement of the 1997–98 stage 1 mission programme for north Staffordshire and indeed the whole of the west midlands are good. In addition to the three offers to the north Staffordshire chamber, 24 offers have been made to other chambers in the region. As participation is not restricted by membership or geographical location, north Staffordshire-based companies can apply to join any of these missions. They may also apply to join all the others which comprise the existing programme.

Trade missions are an important promotional tool. Some 151 missions were supported in 1993–94; 149 in 1994–95 and 210 in 1995–96. Support has been offered for 281 to take place in 1996–97, and a further 230 under stage 1 of the 1997–98 programme. Subject to the availability of additional funding, further offers will be announced in the new year.

Resale Price Maintenance (Medicines)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received in respect of the proposal of the Office of Fair Trading to abolish resale price maintenance on certain medicines; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement. [482]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The Director General of Fair Trading announced on 18 October that he was seeking leave of the restrictive practices court to apply for a discharge of its 1970 order in respect of resale price maintenance on certain medicines. If leave is given, it will be for the court to decide whether the 1970 order remains in the public interest. The director general is content to receive further information relevant to the preparation of the application for leave. The Secretary of State has no statutory role or discretion in relation to the director general's application nor in relation to the court's consideration of the case. In the period between the announcement and the 29 October 1996, he has received one representation on this matter, which has been passed to the director general.

Offshore Oil and Gas

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when was the last occasion that a field inspection of an offshore oil or gas installation was undertaken by a Government official in order to confirm the composition of produced water; and if he will list the number of occasions that such inspections have been undertaken in each of the last eight years; [511]

(2) when was the last occasion that a field inspection of an offshore oil or gas installation was undertaken by a Government official in order to confirm the composition of contamination on drill cuttings; and if he will list the number of occasions that such inspections have been undertaken in each of the last eight years. [512]

Mr. Page [holding answers 30 October 1996]: The last occasion that a field inspection of an offshore oil and gas installation was undertaken by a Government official in order to confirm the composition of produced water was on the 25 of October 1996.

As the hon. Member was advised earlier this year on 3 July, Official Report, column 457, inspections of offshore installations have been undertaken by the Department of Trade and Industry in each of the last eight years, although figures are not available, apart from at disproportionate cost due to the relocation of the office responsible to Aberdeen and the subsequent archiving of files.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the total volumes of unrecovered oil-based drilling muds and of water-based drilling muds that were discharged from offshore oil and gas installations on the UK continental shelf in each of the last eight years. [513]

Mr. Page [holding answer 30 October 1996]: The total volumes of unrecovered oil-based drilling muds discharged offshore oil and gas installations on the United Kingdom continental shelf for the last eight years are routinely recorded in the "Energy Report", which is published annually and is available in the Library of the House.

There is no statutory record of total water-based drilling mud discharged.

North Sea Oil Rigs

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many environmental inspections have been carried out in respect of North sea oil rigs in each year since 1980; and how many inspectors carried out this work in each of those years. [1016]

Mr. Page [holding answer 29 October 1996]: Numerous inspections of offshore installations have been undertaken by my inspector in each of the last 16 years, although figures are not available apart from at disproportionate cost due to the relocation of the office responsible to Aberdeen and the subsequent archiving of files. I refer the hon. Member to my reply given earlier this year to the hon. Member for Lewisham and Deptford (Ms Ruddock) on 3 July, Official Report, column 457.

There were two inspectors until the end of 1989, but, until 1992, 10 safety inspectors also carried out environmental checks. From 1992 to 1994, there was only one inspector but other staff visiting offshore installations carried out environmental checks. The Department now has six inspectors.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much oil was discharged in (a) the United Kingdom sector and (b) the Norwegian sector of the North sea in each year since 1980; and what the figures were for each United Kingdom offshore installation in each of these years. [1017]

Mr. Page [holding answer 29 October 1996]: The total amount of oil discharged from United Kingdom offshore installations is published annually in the "Energy Report". Copies of this are available in the Library of the House.

Available figures for discharges of oil (in tonnes) in the Norwegian sector are given below:

1981: 591

1982: 1,534

1983: 1,770

1984: 3,900

1985: 3,490

1986: 2,378

1987: 1,768

1988: 2,339

1989: 1,604

1990: 1,585.

The provision of discharge information on an installation basis for the last 16 years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Hong Kong (Power Station Explosion)

Mr. Cabom: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress his Department has made in its inquiry into (a) the cause of the explosion at Castle Peak B power station in Hong Kong in 1992 and (b) the safety of similar power stations in the United Kingdom. [983]

Mr. Page [holding answer 29 October 1996]: The safety of power stations in Hong Kong is a matter for the Hong Kong Government. However, I understand that a police inquiry being conducted in Hong Kong has not yet reached any conclusions and in view of this we cannot tell whether it may have any relevance to the question of safety at power stations.

The Health and Safety Executive consulted the electricity industry through the Electricity Association's generation safety managers group and asked what action had been taken to avoid a possible read across of the Castle Peak incident to UK power stations. A reply was received from the Electricity Association which detailed the action taken by the five companies that had or operated hydrogen generating plant. I understand that either the design and/or the operation of the plants are different from that at Castle Peak, or that any necessary modifications have been made.

Mr. Caborn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many power stations in the United Kingdom are equipped with hydrogen plants similar to the Hong Kong Castle Peak B plant which exploded; and what steps have been taken to warn them of the possibility of a similar occurrence here. [985]

Mr. Page [holding answer 29 October 1996]: Five electricity companies operate hydrogen plants in the United Kingdom. The detailed design of the plants is different to that at Castle Peak. While some plant similar to that used at Castle Peak is installed in one United Kingdom power station, detailed consideration of that plant's design by the utility and the manufacturer following the accident confirmed that the plant's design was such not to make it susceptible to the type of incident which occurred at Castle Peak.

Mr. Caborn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what account his Department's inquiry into the cause of the explosion at Castle Peak B power station in Hong Kong in 1992 has taken of (a) reports by the Hong Kong Governor's board of inquiry and (b) the investigation by the Hong Kong police into a conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. [984]

Mr. Page [holding answer 29 October 1996]: Investigations by the Hong Kong police are matters for the Hong Kong Government.

Following a request by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Health and Safety Executive consulted the electricity industry through the Electricity Association's generation safety managers group on what action had been taken to avoid a possible read across of the Castle Peak incident to United Kingdom power stations. This included forwarding to the association a copy of the technical report by the China Light and Power Company which had been prepared on the recommendation of the coroner who investigated the cause of the explosion at Castle Peak B power station.

Rough Sleepers Initiative

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many hostel places have been provided under the rough sleepers initiative; and what has been their occupancy rate during the past two years. [463]

Mr. Clappison: Since the rough sleepers initiative in central London began in 1990, my Department has provided funding for 986 places in nightshelters and hostels. Most of these places were in temporary hostels which have now closed either because the lease on the building has expired or the site has been redeveloped, in some cases to provide hostel accommodation of an improved standard. During 1996–97, my Department is funding 126 places in two nightshelters and two hostels. Occupancy rates exceed 95 per cent. in two of them and are between 85 and 90 per cent. in the other two.

Under the rough sleepers initiative, my Department also provides funding for an annual programme of winter shelters, open from December to March. In 1994–95, 331 places were provided in seven shelters, with occupancy rates of about 89 per cent. In 1995–96, 315 places were provided in seven shelters with occupancy rates in excess of 89 per cent. My Department hopes to fund an enhanced winter shelter programme in 1996–97, providing up to 450 places in central London and 36 places in Bristol, where the rough sleepers initiative also now operates.

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how he plans to respond to the findings of evaluations of the extent of rough sleeping in 23 areas identified in the Government's strategy paper "Rough Sleepers Initiative—The Next Challenge". [2112]

Mr. Curry: The success of the rough sleepers initiative has been clearly demonstrated in central London, where it has been operating since 1990. In that time, the number of people sleeping rough on any night has fallen from estimates of over 1,000 to less than 300.

On 4 March this year, I announced that the Government would be making £73 million available for a third phase of the initiative from 1996–97 to 1998–99. The interdepartmental strategy paper "Rough Sleepers Initiative—The Next Challenge" set out our plans for continuing the initiative in central London, where the problem is greatest; expanding the initiative to Bristol, where a major rough sleeping problem had been demonstrated; and assisting evaluations of the extent of rough sleeping in 23 other areas where some evidence of a rough sleeping problem existed, with a view to providing further assistance.

Evaluations of the extent of rough sleeping in 23 areas around the country, undertaken by Shelter on contract to my Department, have now been completed. In total, 375 people were found sleeping rough during single night head counts in all 23 areas. I have considered the findings, along with the range of other information collected as part of each evaluation, including the amount and availability of direct-access hostel provision, the range of existing local services providing help for people sleeping rough, and local authority policies on providing housing for people sleeping rough. From this evidence, I have decided that further assistance should fall into three main categories.

First, I have decided to create new rough sleepers initiative zones in Brighton, Kensington and Chelsea and Hammersmith and Fulham, where significant rough sleeping problems have been identified. The local authorities for these areas will be invited to form consortiums of statutory and voluntary sector agencies to develop a local strategy for tackling rough sleeping and to bid for rough sleepers initiative funding, which may be made available for capital projects—such as hostels and permanent accommodation—or revenue projects—such as outreach and resettlement work. I expect the strategies to be based closely on the findings of the evaluations in these areas. The local authorities for Kensington and Chelsea and for Hammersmith and Fulham are being invited to form a single consortium to focus resources on the areas within both boroughs where people sleep rough.

Additionally, I have decided to expand the area covered by the existing central London rough sleepers initiative zones to include parts of the W1 and W2 postal districts in Westminster. My Department will be discussing the arrangements for this expansion with Westminster city council and the chairmen of the existing central London rough sleepers initiative consortiums.

Secondly, I have decided to create a new rough sleepers revenue fund to which local voluntary sector agencies can submit applications for funding of projects, such as outreach and resettlement work. Local authorities, working in close consultation with voluntary sector agencies, will be invited to prepare joint statutory and voluntary sector local strategies for tackling rough sleeping and to identify suitable revenue projects for which applications for funding could be sought. Funding decisions will be based on the strength of the local strategies and on the value for money offered by applications. Initially, I will be inviting the local authorities for Bath, Bournemouth, Cambridge, Ealing, Exeter, Leicester, Manchester, Nottingham, Oxford and Richmond upon Thames, where rough sleeping problems have been identified, to prepare and submit such strategies. I expect the strategies to be based closely on the findings of the evaluations in these areas.

Subsequently, my Department will be publishing guidance for local authorities on evaluating the extent of rough sleeping in their areas and developing strategies for tackling any problems which exist. In the light of responses to this guidance, I will consider inviting other local authorities to prepare strategies and suggest projects which might be considered for grants from the rough sleepers revenue fund.

Up to £25 million will be available from 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1999 to fund the new rough sleepers initiative zones and the rough sleepers revenue fund.

The Department of Health will also be making available nearly £2 million over the next three years in areas which have been targeted for help under the rough sleepers initiative and the new rough sleepers revenue fund. This help is being made available through the extension of the homeless mentally ill initiative. It will be available to assist local authorities with outreach services and care costs for those people sleeping rough who have mental health problems. One of the primary aims of this additional funding will be to ensure that this vulnerable group is reintroduced to the services which comprise the spectrum of care for mentally ill people.

Thirdly, my Department will be contacting the local authorities for Barnet, Basingstoke, Birmingham, Gloucester, Norwich, Reading, Tower Hamlets, Tunbridge Wells, Waltham Forest and York to offer advice on the findings of the evaluations and action which they might consider to tackle the relatively minor problems of rough sleeping identified in those areas.

I am determined that the hard core of people who sleep rough are given every opportunity to get off the streets and into a better life. These further measures demonstrate the Government's commitment to ensuring that there is no necessity for people to sleep rough. Shelter, Homeless Network, Centrepoint, CHAR and Crisis have indicated their willingness to work nationally with Government, local authorities and other voluntary sector agencies to help make it unnecessary for people to sleep rough.

In addition to these measures to tackle rough sleeping, grants are available from my Department to voluntary sector agencies for the prevention and relief of single homelessness. Some £25 million is being made available through these grants between 1996–97 and 1998–99, under section 73 of the Housing Act 1985.

Copies of the final report on the evaluation exercise have been placed in the Libraries of the House and are available on request from my Department.

Industrial Waste

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Government's current policy on the import or export of poisonous industrial waste substances out of, or into, the United Kingdom; what are the latest trends in respect to such trade; and if he will make a statement. [130]

Mr. Clappison: The Government's policies on the import and export of hazardous wastes are set out in the United Kingdom management plan for exports and imports of waste. Under the plan, which is legally binding throughout the United Kingdom, all exports of waste for disposal are banned, as are most imports for disposal other than in exceptional cases where wider environmental considerations apply. Exports of waste for recovery to countries within the OECD may continue but, subject to limited exceptions, exports of hazardous waste for recovery to non-OECD countries are banned. Imports of waste for genuine recovery operations may continue.

The plan, which was published on 16 May 1996 and came into effect on 1 June, provides the means to implement the Government's long-standing policy of self-sufficiency in waste disposal, while preserving legitimate trade in wastes moving for recovery.

Imports of hazardous waste into the UK for disposal in the period 1988–89 to 1993–94 are as follows:

	Imports (tonnes)
1988–89	40,027
1989–90	31,918
1990–91	44,517
1991–92	46,920
1992–93	47,018
1993–94	67,993

Some 525 tonnes were exported from Northern Ireland to Finland between 1990–91 and 1991–92. No waste has been exported from the UK for disposal since 1992. More detailed information is available in my Department's digest of environmental statistics No 18 for 1996. The Department did not collect data on shipments for recovery before May 1994. Information on imports and exports of waste for recovery or disposal in more recent years is currently in preparation.

Castle Cement

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what reasons were given by Castle Cement for its decision to withdraw its appeal against the conditions imposed by the Environment Agency on the operation of the plant; [901]

(2) whether Castle Cement has undertaken to comply with the conditions set by the Environment Agency relating to the operation of the plant at Clitheroe. [902]

Mr Clappison: Castle Cement withdrew its appeal in a letter dated 11 October. I have today placed a copy of that letter in the House Library.

Also, in answer to the question of whether the company has now undertaken to comply with the conditions of authorisation, the company was, and continues to be, legally obliged to comply with any condition of authorisation pending the outcome of its appeal. Any breach of a condition is a criminal offence.

Planning Permission

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the occasions on which he has used discretionary powers to (a) revoke and (b) challenge planning permission for out-of-town or edge-of-town retail developments since 1990, giving the date in each case. [864]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: None. The revocation of any planning permission is rare. Slightly more usual is for my right hon. Friend to call in for his own determination certain planning applications which are required to be referred to him. An application cannot be called in once permission has been granted. An application for retail development in Alnwick, Northumberland, was not referred to my right hon. Friend and was granted permission in 1993. These circumstances will be examined at a local public inquiry and my right hon. Friend will then decide whether to invoke his powers.

Water Authority Debit

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the amount of regional water authorities' debt written off before privatisation. [1521]

Mr. Clappison: Debts to the Exchequer of £5,028 million were written off as part of the capital restructuring of the water industry in England and Wales for privatisation.

Coastal Zone Management

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to issue the proposed best practice guide for coastal zone management. [2185]

Mr. Clappison: The Department of the Environment has today published "Coastal Zone Management—Towards Best Practice". The guide takes a practical look at the main issues which arise in coastal management and it highlights numerous examples of good practice which are at present being used. We have arranged for copies to be placed in the Libraries of the House, and the guide will be extensively distributed to interested organisations and individuals.

World Trade Report

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Government to respond to the Environment Committee's report on world trade and the environment. [2293]

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the President of the Board of Trade, the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Minister for Overseas Development and I have today published the Government response to the Environment Committee report on world trade and the environment and have placed copies in the libraries of both Houses.

The Government wish to take the opportunity presented by the preparation of this document to set out an overview of their evolving approach to trade and the environment. This comprises part I of the response; part II contains the detailed response to the Committee's conclusions and recommendations.

The Government have always held the view that economic development makes a vital contribution to improving environmental standards. An open and non-discriminatory world trading system is crucial to future economic development throughout the world. However, to deliver high environmental standards, economic development must take place within a framework which ensures sustainable development.

There has been much debate about the impact of trade on the environment; and the impact of environmental controls on trade.

The challenge for the world community, both at the forthcoming ministerial meeting of the World Trade Organisation this December in Singapore and more widely, is to move away from the misleading rhetoric of trade versus environment to focus more closely on the principles of sustainable development. The Government are determined to ensure that the European Union takes the lead in promoting these principles.

Further work on trade and environment will be required both in the WTO and in other forums such as the United Nations Environment Programme. We have identified six topics as the focus of major international effort in the near future:

- multilateral environmental agreements—the most effective response to transboundary and global environmental problems. We support the efforts of the European Union in the WTO to clarify the relationship between trade measures in multilateral environmental agreements and GATT;
- environmental policies based on processes—a wide variety of process controls are employed as part of environmental policy. The WTO needs to consider their relationship with the product-related regime of trade agreements;
- examination of environmental effects—we should like to see more analysis by the WTO of the potential environmental effects of trade proposals as they are developed;
- spreading understanding of environmental principles—there needs to be better understanding among those concerned with trade policy of the principles and concepts underlying environmental laws and policies;
- market access for least developed countries—reinforcing and spreading the benefits of the multilateral trading system is an important way of providing the world's poorest countries with the wealth to tackle environmental issues;
- combating illegal trade in endangered species, chlorofluorocarbons and hazardous wastes.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Liddington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans there are for the sale of the Housing Corporation's loan portfolios to the private sector to proceed. [2294]

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration announced on 28 November 1995 the Government's decision in principle to sell the loans provided to housing associations by the Housing Corporation, Scottish Homes and Housing for Wales. We subsequently appointed N M Rothschild and Sons Ltd. as the Government's financial advisers for the project and asked them to evaluate the options for selling these loans to the private sector.

On the basis of Rothchild's advice, my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales and I have decided to proceed with the sale of the loans, subject to receiving satisfactory final bids at the conclusion of negotiations. We have asked Rothchilds to make the necessary arrangements for the next stage.

Due to the different nature of the loans provided by Scottish Homes, separate arrangements will be adopted for the Scottish portfolio. These will take longer than those for the English and Welsh portfolios.

Housing associations have been most successful in securing private resources to finance social housing projects. The sale of the loans portfolios will be the logical conclusion of our policy of withdrawing from a lending activity which can clearly be funded directly by the private sector. There has already been considerable interest from the private sector in acquiring the portfolios, and I expect a successful conclusion to the sale process.

DEFENCE

Land Mines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what programme of research he has commissioned into mine clearance and detection. [396]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department has commissioned work by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, including research into detection using hand-held equipment; location and destruction of mines for route clearance; and the remote detection of minefields. DERA's centre for post-conflict battle area clearance technologies and techniques is primarily concerned with work for military purposes, but also undertakes studies of mine clearance funded by other bodies such as the ODA and the EU.

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now review all parliamentary answers given in both Houses on the subject of exposure to chemicals of British service personnel serving in the Gulf during Operation Granby since March 1991, and publish correct answers where required. [196]

Mr. Soames: When new information came to light that there had been wider use of organophosphate pesticides by British troops during the Gulf war, I wrote immediately to those Members of Parliament who had tabled questions or had inquired of my Department about pesticides to correct the pubic record. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence wrote similarly to the Countess of Mar. Copies of the letters have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he was first informed that British troops and military medical staff were exposed to organophosphate pesticides during their service in Operation Granby in the Gulf war; what action he then took; and if he will place in the Library copies of all documentation on organophosphates held by his Department. [232]

Mr. Soames: I was first made aware last month that British troops had made wider use of organophosphate pesticides during the Gulf war than we had previously been led to believe. As soon as this information came to light, we commissioned a detailed comprehensive investigation into the use of organophosphate pesticides by British troops. When this investigation is complete, I will make a full report to the House.

St. Helena

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to utilize St. Helena for military exercises. [837]

Mr. Soames: There are currently no plans to utilise St. Helena for military exercises.

US Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States nuclear weapons are currently situated on the United Kingdom mainland; and if he will make a statement. [1539]

Mr. Soames: It has been the practice of successive Governments neither to confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons in specific locations at specific times. All allies remain committed to the maintenance of nuclear forces in Europe as an essential political and military link between the European and North American members of the alliance. The United Kingdom continues to make available facilities for United States' nuclear forces within the UK.

Overseas Forces

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries in which there is a United Kingdom military presence. [1478]

Mr. Soames: British service personnel are currently providing a UK military presence either on operations or at permanent bases in the following countries:

Ascension Island
Belize
Bosnia-Herzegovina
Brunei
Canada
Croatia
Cyprus
Diego Garcia
Falkland Islands
Georgia
Germany
Gibraltar
Hong Kong
Italy
Kuwait
Saudi Arabia
South Georgia
Turkey
United Kingdom

This list does not include countries where loan service personnel and training teams are based, where short-term training exercises are being conducted and where there are minor commitments involving individual service men and women.

Polaris and Trident

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total defence expenditure on (a) the Polaris and (b) the Trident programmes in 1993–94 and 1994–95. [1477]

Mr. Arbuthnot: For the years in question, expenditure, in £ million and at outturn prices was:

	1993–94	1994–95
(a) Polaris	103	65
(b) Trident	979	723

Armed Forces (Beef)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much British beef (a) in weight and (b) in value, was supplied to the British armed forces in each of the last three years. [1381]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The procurement of food for the Armed Forces is contracted to the Navy, Army and Air Force Institutes. My Department does not specify the source of origin from which NAAFI should obtain beef (or any other meat), but expects it to seek the best market price for the product. The majority of our requirements are for frozen beef which is not readily available from the British market. Records for the last three years are not available, however in the financial year 1995–96 and in the first six months of the current financial year, NAAFI purchased some 690,000 kg of UK beef, including sirloin, forerib, diced mince and a range of manufactured products; these were valued at £1.3 million.

Army Technical Services Agency

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Army Technical Services Agency at Malvern. [1380]

Mr. Soames: On 25 October, Official Report, columns 14–15, I announced that the Army Technical Support Agency collocation would be taken forward as a private finance initiative project. The future of the ATSA at Malvern will depend on the outcome of the PFI solution for ATSA collocation.

PRIME MINISTER

Queen's Speech

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Vote Office copies of the consolidated press lobby briefing on the Queen's Speech. [833]

The Prime Minister: Copies of the background notes have been placed in the Library of the House.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister (1) whether (i) the security services and (ii) GCHQ have registered under the Data Protection Act 1984; and if he will make a statement; [151]

(2) if the intelligence services have registered under the Data Protection Act 1984; and if he will make a statement. [207]

The Prime Minister: No. Agencies holding personal data for the purpose of safeguarding national security are exempt from registration under section 27 of the Data Protection Act 1984. The exemption is kept under review.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 31 October. [996]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 31 October. [997]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

HEALTH

NHS Trusts (Severance Payments)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what severance payments were paid to (a) Ms Sue De Gilio of Plymouth Community Services NHS trust and (b) Ms Jenny Parsonage of Thameslink Healthcare Services NHS trust upon their resignations. [453]

Mr. Malone: Severance payments for trust staff are a matter for the trusts concerned, taking into account the guidance issued to trusts by the national health service executive in May 1994. The hon. Member may wish to contact Miss Louise Churchill, chairman of Plymouth Community Services NHS trust and Mr. Ron March, chairman of Thameslink Healthcare Services NHS trust for details.

Schools (Dysentery)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many schools which have experienced outbreaks of dysentery in the last year have pupils from families whose water has been cut off. [426]

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected centrally.

Cosmetic Surgery

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the results of the study commissioned by his Department from the British Association of Plastic Surgeons on private cosmetic surgery started in July 1995. [421]

Mr. Horam: It is for the researchers to publish the report. The information from the study indicated that there was only very small usage of NHS resources in the treatment of the problems of aesthetic surgery carried out in the private sector.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which schemes for the provision of services for psychiatric patients have been approved under the private finance initiative. [1032]

Mr. Horam: Seven schemes providing services for psychiatric patients have been approved under the private finance initiative. Four of these schemes have been completed, one is under way and two are negotiating contract signature. They are:

Tees health authority: residential accommodation for elderly and mental ill patients. Capital value: £2.0 million. (Completed).

North Bedfordshire health authority: residential accommodation for elderly severely mentally ill patients. Capital value: £1.4 million. (Completed).

Brent and Harrow health authority: residential accommodation for elderly mentally ill patients. Capital value: £2.1 million. (Completed).

Merton, Sutton and Wandsworth health authority: residential accommodation for elderly mentally ill patients. Capital value: £1.0 million. (Completed).

Barnet Health NHS trust: residential accommodation for elderly mentally ill patients. Capital value: £1.5 million. (Under way).

Leeds Community and Mental Health Services Teaching NHS trust: north west community unit for elderly mentally ill patients. Capital value: £2.5 million. (Approved but not yet under way).

Leeds Community and Mental Health Services Teaching NHS trust: west central community unit for elderly mentally ill patients. Capital value: £2.5 million. (Approved but not yet under way).

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish his Green Paper on the future management of mental health services; and if he will make a statement. [1063]

Mr. Burns: Much progress has been made in developing and implementing policies for the delivery of comprehensive health and social care services to people with mental illness, but concerns are now being expressed that particular structural and organisational barriers may be impeding further progress. We are therefore examining the legal and other structural obstacles which might be inhibiting effective working between agencies and will shortly be issuing a consultation document seeking views on which options for change would be most supported by those working in the mental health field and by service users.

General Chiropractic Council

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects an announcement on the composition of the General Chiropractic Council. [1064]

Mr. Horam: Work on establishing the General Chiropractic Council is proceeding well and we expect to be able to announce its membership shortly.

Secure Accommodation

Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many places are available in secure accommodation for juvenile offenders in England and Wales; how many extra places will be provided during 1996; and if he will make a statement. [856]

Mr. Burns: There are presently 309 places available for use in local authority secure units in England and Wales. A further 40 places are available at Glenthorne youth treatment centre. We are on course to bring into use another 33 places by the end of 1996, making a total of 94 additional places provided during the year. All these places are available not only for young offenders but for children who need help with severe emotional and behavioural problems.

NHS Cost Inflation

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the basis for the current national health service cost inflation; and into which categories of patient care it is applied by district health service by his (a) Department and (b) district health services. [879]

Mr. Malone: Estimates of national health service cost inflation are not calculated. A retrospective measure of current inflation in the hospital and community health services—HCHS—sector of the national health service is calculated annually. The inflation measure is calculated as a weighted average of HCHS staff pay inflation and inflation in the purchase of goods and services within HCHS current expenditure.

The inflation estimate is calculated only at the national level, and is not disaggregated by category of patient care.

Community Care (Staffordshire)

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the extent of the failure of compliance of Staffordshire county council with the requirement in each of the last three years that 85 per cent. of special transitional grant for community care should go to private sector homes; what action Her Majesty's Government are proposing to take as a result; and if he will make a statement. [1050]

Mr. Burns: The independent sector condition attached to the special transitional grant required local authorities to spend at least 85 per cent. of the Department of Social Security transfer element of the grant on community care services purchased in the independent sector. The audited figures for 1993–94 show Staffordshire county council expenditure in the independent sector of £6.439 million compared with the minimum requirement of £7.958 million, thus failing the requirement by £1.5 million. The Secretary of State exercised his discretion not to require the repayment of the grant after taking account of the representations made by Staffordshire. In 1994–95, its expenditure in the independent sector amounted to £17.618 million, falling short of the minimum requirement of £18.166 by £0.5 million. No decisions have yet been made on the consequences of this failure. Audited figures for 1995–96 will not be available until 31 December.

School Health Service

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses were employed by the school health service in each of the past five years. [1101]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) on 21 May 1996, Official Report columns 87–88. Information for later years is not available centrally.

Waiting Lists

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients had been waiting for operations in excess of the patients charter waiting time standards at 1 September 1996. [1113]

Mr. Horam: The latest information available centrally is for 30 June 1996. This shows that, on that date, seven patients waiting for operations had been waiting more than 18 months from the date they were placed on a waiting list. Also, 109 patients did not receive coronary artery bypass grafts and associated procedures within the 12 months standard set by the patients charter.

AIDS

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died of AIDS in England and Wales in each year since 1990. [1116]

Mr. Horam: The number of deaths in reported AIDS cases by the end of September 1996 are shown in the table. These data are affected by reporting delays and under-reporting. The figures given exclude deaths reported in HIV-infected individuals who either died without reaching the AIDS case definition of whose AIDS status at the time of death has yet to be confirmed.

Year of death	England and Wales
1990	736
1991	892
1992	1,013
1993	1,192
1994	1,236

Total	6,199

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died of CJD in England and Wales in each year since 1990. [1117]

Mr. Horam: As at 29 October 1996, the number of deaths in confirmed cases of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease in England and Wales, including sporadic, iatrogenic, familial, new-variant CJD and Gertsmann-Straussler-Scheinker syndrome in each year since 1990 are as follows:

Year	Confirmed deaths
1990	27
1991	31
1992	45
1993	38
1994	55
1995	42
1996[1]	29

[1] Up to end of September 1996. Comparable figures for the United Kingdom were published in the chief medical officer's "Update" issue 12, published on 28 October, copies of which are available in the Library.

Lung Cancer

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients with lung cancer were over 75 in the following years (a) 1993–94, (b) 1994–95 and (c) 1995–96; and what proportion of the total these figures represent. [1118]

Mr. Horam: Information is held centrally in the hospital episode system—HES—for diagnosis using specific codes under ICD9 classification, copies of which are available in the Library. The latest year available is 1994–95. Data for the number of finished consultant episodes with primary diagnosis "Malignant neoplasm of trachea, bronchus and lung"—ICD code 162—in NHS hospitals in England are shown in the table:

Data year	Total cases	75 years and over	Percentage of 75 years and over of total
1993–94	57,822	13,620	24
1994–95	57,823	13,138	23

Episodes where the age of the person was unknown have been allocated pro rata.

Breast Cancer

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of breast cancer were identified in women of 65 years and over for each year since 1992; and what proportion they represent of all women diagnosed as having breast cancer. [1114]

Mr. Horam: Provisional numbers of registrations of breast cancer diagnosed in 1991 in England and Wales were published in the Office for National Statistics "Monitor" MBI 96/1, copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for 1992 and 1993 will be published shortly by the Office for National Statistics and copies will be placed in the Library.

NHS Health Advisory Service

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what decision has been made on the findings of the review of the NHS health advisory service. [2037]

Mr. Burns: We have decided to merge the NHS health advisory service, from April 1997, with a consortium led by the Royal College of Psychiatrists research unit and comprising members from the Royal College of Nursing Institute, Office for Public Management and British Geriatrics Society.

I believe this decision develops and builds on the work of the review team. It is the basis for an up-to-date and proactive advisory service, equipped with a multidisciplinary team able to help organisations improve and develop services.

Under a separate contract, the work of the drug advisory service will also change. It will take a more active role in alcohol misuse services and it will develop as a resource for health and local authority purchasers of substance misuse services.

Health Authorities (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the funding of health authorities in Manchester in the remaining months of the financial year; which authorities expect a shortfall; and if he will make a statement. [1378]

Mr. Horam: All health authorities are expected to remain within their allocated cash limit. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 17 October 1996 Official Report, columns 1104–05, which provided the estimated outturn position for all English health authorities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Open Prisons

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are applied to assess the suitability of prisoners in an open prison for work carried out in the community as part of their rehabilitation. [1083]

Miss Widdecombe: Prisoners who are held in open prisoners are thoroughly assessed to ensure that they do not pose a risk to the public. Open prisons will allocate prisoners to work in the local community only when this is considered to be of benefit to both the community and to the prisoner. Particular attention is always paid to the offences committed by the prisoner and to his or her background as part of this process. The overriding concern in such allocation is always the safety of the public; if such concern exists, the prisoner does not undertake work in the community, and may be transferred to a closed and more secure prison.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedures exist to assess a prisoner's suitability for transfer to an open prison; who is responsible for their implementation; and what assessment he has made of their effectiveness. [1084]

Miss Widdecombe: Determinate sentence prisoners must be reallocated to the lowest security category before their transfer from a closed to an open prison. This involves an assessment of any risk posed to the public by the prisoner, together with the risk of escape or abscond. Such reallocation and transfer will take place only if the staff of the closed prison are satisfied that the prisoner is not a risk to the public and is not likely to escape or abscond. The prisoner will undergo a further risk assessment at the open prison to ensure that he or she is suitable for open conditions.

The governors of the closed prisons transferring prisoners to open prisons and the governors of the open prisons themselves are responsible for the implementation of these procedures.

Life sentence prisoners who are considered suitable for open conditions require both a favourable recommendation from the Parole Board and the authority of a Minister, who considers detailed reports on each individual case before making a decision.

The allocation of all prisoners to open conditions is kept under continual review.

Prisons

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all (a) planned new prisons and (b) detention centres to be financed through (i) public capital expenditure and (ii) the private finance initiative. [55]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Chris Davies, dated 31 October 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the planned number of new prisons and detention centres to be financed through public capital expenditure and the private finance initiative.

The Prison Service has plans to build prisons but not detention centres. Currently, it has funding to provide three new prisons and one re-built prison, all of which will be provided under the private finance initiative. These include Fazakerley, Bridgend and the re-built prison at Lowdham Grange. A third new prison is currently the subject of a planning inquiry, which if successful, will be built at Agecroft near Manchester.

Asylum Seekers

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people who had applied at some stage for asylum were detained in Birmingham prison during (a) July, (b) August and (c) September; and what were the nationalities of those detained; [1037]

(2) how many people who had applied at some stage for asylum were deported from Birmingham prison during (a) July, (b) August and (c) September; and what were the nationalities of those deported. [1038]

Mr. Kirkhope: The available information on asylum seekers detained in Her Majesty's prison Birmingham is given in the table.

There were no failed asylum seekers recorded as being deported from Her Majesty's prison Birmingham during each of the months July to September 1996.

This does not include asylum seekers removed as illegal entrants.

In some cases the asylum application will have been lodged subsequent to the applicant being detained. The figures include asylum applicants detained in after-entry enforcement work and those awaiting removal following refusal of asylum, as well as those whose applications were under consideration or subject to appeal.
[2] The "Others" category may include nationalities already listed.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to declare a country as one in which there has been a fundamental change of circumstances under the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996. [972]

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to declare that any country has undergone a major upheaval such that we would not seek to return people there for the time being.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total number of asylum seekers held in detention at the end of (a) June, (b) July, (c) August and (d) September; in which establishments they were held; what were the nationalities of those detained; what were the gender of those detained; and how many were deported and from which establishments. [1044]

Mr. Kirkhope: The available information on asylum seekers detained, and on those deported from detention, is given in the tables. The number deported does not include those who are removed as illegal entrants or under port refusal procedures.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many substantive asylum appeals to immigration appellate authority special adjudicators have been (i) allowed, (ii) dismissed and (iii) withdrawn in 1996 to date. [884]

Mr. Kirkhope: Provisional information shows that, of the estimated 9,070 substantive asylum appeals determined by special adjudicators between January and September 1996, 3 per cent. were allowed, 81 per cent. were dismissed and 16 per cent. were withdrawn.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applications are currently awaiting an initial decision by his Department's asylum directorate; and how many of these applications were made prior to July 1993. [885]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 30 September 1996, there were 60,275 asylum applications awaiting an initial decision, of which an estimated 27,900 were made prior to the implementation of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993. Work is currently in hand to revise this estimate.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements his Department has made to expedite initial decisions on asylum applications in those cases where the applicant is detained under Immigration Act powers; and what is the current average time taken by his Department to reach an initial decision in such cases. [887]

Mr. Kirkhope: Statistics on the average time taken to decide cases where the applicant is detained are not available. However, all such cases are given priority consideration within the asylum directorate, with many applications being determined within days.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the average time currently taken by his Department to reach an initial decision on (i) asylum applications submitted prior to implementation of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, (ii) asylum applications submitted since implementation of the 1993 Act and (iii) all asylum applications; [889]

(2) what is the average time currently taken by the Home Office and the immigration appellate authority to prepare, hear and determine an appeal against a refusal to asylum. [890]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on the times taken at the various stages of the asylum process are given in the table.

Average times involved in deciding applications for asylum (March–August 1996)

	Months
Time taken for an initial decision to be made (Pre-act applications)	44.8
Time taken for an initial decision to be made (Post-act applications)	11.6
Time taken by the Home Office to process an appeal	1.4
Time taken by the Immigration Appellate Authority to determine an appeal	8.1

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to declaring Sri Lanka a country in which there has been a fundamental change of circumstances under the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 following the upsurge of fighting in September. [974]

Miss Widdecombe: We do not believe that the continuing hostilities in Sri Lanka constitute such a fundamental change in the circumstances there as to justify my right hon. and learned Friend declaring that the country has undergone a major upheaval.

The hostilities since May 1995 have been sporadic and confined largely to the north and east of the country. Most reports suggest that conditions elsewhere in the country remain reasonably safe and normal.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to declaring Afghanistan a country in which there has been a fundamental change of circumstances under the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 since the capture of Kabul by Taliban. [973]

Miss Widdecombe: We do not believe that the recent developments in Afghanistan constitute such a fundamental change in the circumstances as to justify my right hon. and learned Friend declaring that the country has undergone a major upheaval.

Afghanistan has been in a state of civil unrest for a number of years. The fall of Kabul to Taliban is part of this long-term continuing conflict.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons, having been refused asylum, have (i) been removed and (ii) made a voluntary departure from the United Kingdom in 1996 to date. [886]

Mr. Kirkhope: Provisional information shows that, during the period January to September 1996, there have been 2,810 removals—including voluntary departures—of persons refused asylum.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum, by persons applying (a) at a port of entry to the United Kingdom and (b) after entry have been decided in 1996 to date; and how many in each category have been granted (i) asylum and (ii) exceptional leave to remain. [888]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is given in the table.

Deportations

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of people deported under Immigration Act powers from the United Kingdom for (a) June, (b) July, (c) August and (d) September; and what were the nationalities of those deported. [1042]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested for June to August is given in the table. Complete data for September are not yet available. The figures do not include people removed as illegal entrants or under port refusal procedures.

[1045]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on persons recommended for deportation by a court on those removed from the United Kingdom is given in the tables. Custody (Deaths)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that the same categories of information in respect of deaths in custody are provided in private and state prisons. [960]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Harry Cohen, dated 31 October 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the categories of information provided in respect of deaths in custody in private prisons and state prisons.

There is no distinction in the categories of information provided in respect of deaths in custody which occur in privately managed prisons or public sector prisons. It is a contractual requirement that all privately managed prisons report deaths in custody to Prison Service Headquarters in the same way as all other establishments.

WALES

Inward Investment

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the inward investment projects into Clwyd from outside Wales since 1980; and if he will make a statement. [212]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Development Agency has collected data on inward investment since April 1983. Since then, over 300 projects have been recorded for the country; they promise over 18,000 new jobs, over 5,000 safeguarded jobs, and capital investment of almost £2 billion. Clwyd has been a major beneficiary of Wales's inward investment success.

I have asked the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency to write with a list of projects, and will arrange for a copy of the reply to be placed in the Library of the House.

Strategic Development Scheme

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all bids from the former Colwyn borough council, Rhuddlan borough council, Ogwr borough council, and Clwyd county council which received strategic development scheme funding from his Department. [216]

Council Personnel (Declarations of Interest)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines his Department has given to local authorities in Wales on the declaration by elected councillors and senior officers of any interest they may have in (a) the freemasons and (b) other such body; and if he will make a statement. [129]

Mr. Hague: Guidance on the conduct of local authority members is set out in Welsh Office circular 23/90. Paragraph 9 of this code refers to membership of the freemasons and other bodies. We may review this guidance in the light of any recommendations made by the Nolan committee.

The conduct of local government officers is a matter for local authorities to determine.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairmen of the Cardiff Bay development corporation and of the Welsh development agency concerning the need for a written statement on their roles in the corporation's designated area. [1538]

Mr. Hague: None. The Welsh Development Agency does not become involved in development within the corporation's designated area, except with the agreement of the corporation.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority concerning the

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Aid Funding

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest estimate of the proportion of GNP of the United Kingdom which will be directed to overseas aid during the current financial year; and what is the Government's medium-term target for this figure. [133]

Dr. Liam Fox: International comparisons of overseas aid figures are normally presented in relation to gross national product on a calendar year basis. In 1995, the latest year for which figures are available, UK net official development assistance was 0.28 per cent. of GNP. The figure for 1996 will be published in June 1997.

No ODA/GNP targets have been set for the future since, as with other areas of Government expenditure, the level of spending on development assistance is dependent on our economic circumstances and other public expenditure priorities. At £2,154 million in 1996–97, the UK development assistance programme is substantial and makes a significant contribution to tackling the problems facing the developing world.

Montserrat

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total aid given to Montserrat in the current year; and if he will make a statement. [86]

Dr. Liam Fox: As at 30 September, total aid expenditure in Montserrat since 1 January 1996 has amounted to £7.75 million, comprising £2.8 million in emergency aid, £2.75 million in budgetary assistance, and £2.2 million in development aid.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what relief aid the United Kingdom Government have provided following the volcanic eruptions in Montserrat. [664]

Dr. Fox: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on 17 October, columns 1118–9.

Police Training

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if she will list the countries in which British police or other bodies provided training for police or security forces in those countries; how long they have been in each country providing such training and what form that training takes for each; what criteria are used to determine whether training is provided, and what terms of reference are given for the training; what influence countries' human rights records have on determining police or security force training provided by the United Kingdom; if monitoring is carried out after the training to evaluate its impact; and what form that monitoring takes. [442]

Dr. Liam Fox: Countries whose police and security forces have received training from the FCO diplomatic wing include:

Police/security force training (DW)

Chile

Czech Republic

Cyprus

El Salvador

Fiji

Honduras

Hungary

India

Kazakstan

Kenya

Lebanon

Malaysia

Nicaragua

Palestinian Authority

Papua New Guinea

Countries who received aid for in-country police training from ODA in 1994 and 1995 were listed in the answer given to the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) on 14 May, Official Report, column 385.

Details of training programmes are not kept centrally and it would involve a disproportionate cost to collate this information for each of the countries referred to above. Training for the police is considered alongside other priorities for assistance in consultation with recipient Governments. Programmes of training are tailored in content and duration to the requirements of the police forces to be assisted. Human rights records are taken into account in the provision of assistance along with other good government and developmental considerations, including poverty, as well as the UK's national interest. The FCO police advisers and other diplomatic, ODA and training staff monitor police projects during implementation. For all aid projects costing above £250,000, a project completion report is prepared providing a preliminary assessment of impact. A selection of projects are also subject to detailed evaluation. An evaluation of a selection of police projects is planned in 1997.

Zaire and Rwanda

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the need for humanitarian aid in eastern Zaire; and on what occasions embassy staff have visited this area recently. [1161]

Dr. Liam Fox: The key humanitarian problem in eastern Zaire is lack of access to those remaining in refugee camps and those displaced. Agencies believe that there are sufficient stocks available in region to meet immediate needs. The security situation has prevented visits to the area of conflict but our representative in Bujumbura visited Gatumba camp on the Burundi–Zaire border on 28 October where returnees are arriving. Our embassies in Zaire and Rwanda are also monitoring the situation closely.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the humanitarian situation in the great lakes region. [1218]

Dr. Fox: There have been 1.7 million refugees in the region since 1994. The current insecurity in eastern Zaire has served to exacerbate an already critical situation. About 500,000 people have been displaced. Agencies report that they have sufficient stocks in the region to meet immediate needs. Political and security difficulties are restricting their delivery. The Government have supported UN and EU efforts to resolve this. Bilateral approaches have been made to Zaire and Rwanda to help defuse the situation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ferris Wheel

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what exchanges have taken place between the Accommodation and Works Committee and Lambeth borough council concerning the application for planning permission to build a giant ferris wheel by the Thames. [1353]

Sir Raymond Powell: The Committee was invited to express its views on the planning application for a ferris wheel on the south bank of the Thames. The Committee considered the matter on 22 July, and was of the opinion that the proposal was inappropriate on the grounds that the size, scale and location would be unsuitable given the fine surrounding buildings, would detract from the views of the Palace of Westminster from some angles, and during the lifetime of the temporary structure would be the dominant feature nearly opposite the, by then, newly completed New Parliamentary Building.

The Committee's views were communicated to Lambeth borough council on 24 July 1996.

Palace of Westminster (Works)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what are the expected final costs of all works carried out since July in the House of Commons for each room and area improved. [1460]

Sir Raymond Powell: In the 12 weeks of the summer recess, the Works Directorate completed another large programme of work. The value of the projets was £17 million and 1,800 contractors' employees were involved with up to 500 on site on some days. For the parliamentary data and video network—PDVN—installation, the magnitude of the task necessitated shift working, 24 hours a day and seven days a week.

Overall, the works were finished on time, but the reconstruction of the Members' and Strangers' Cafeteria is planned to be completed in November 1996 and the contract to repair the roof over the Lords Chamber and the Royal Gallery is planned to continue until October 1998.

Some of the more significant projects completed since July are as follows:

Full PDVN cabling at Star Chamber Court Block, Norman Shaw North floors 1 and 2, House of Lords West Front ground and first floors and 1 The Abbey Garden.

All Members' offices now have connections for colour televisions with the clean feed from the Chamber.

The Refreshment Department modernisation phase C entailed the new Members' and Strangers' Cafeteria, completion due November 1996, and a new servery and furniture restoration for the Members' Tea Room.

The Speaker's outer office was renovated.

The Churchill Room was redecorated and a new fire escape was built.

Automatic fire detection and new telephone wiring were installed at Star Chamber Court Block and House of Lords West Front.

Fire precautions were installed, with rewiring and redecoration at the Burma road press offices.

Security double glazing was fitted in the Members' and Strangers' dining rooms and the Shadow Cabinet Room.

Enabling works were begun for air conditioning of the Committee Rooms.

As part of the heating modernisation, steam and calorifier plant was replaced.

Electrical distribution boards were renewed.

The following lifts were modernised with disabled facilities: lift at the south-east corner of the Commons Chamber, lift at the south-west corner of the Commons Chamber, lift at the back of Speaker's Chair, lift at Sovereign's entrance and lift at Law Lords' corridor.

The following works of art were restored: two fresco paintings off Central Lobby, a fresco painting in House of Lords Chamber and 35 oil paintings.

The following lavatories were refurbished: Upper Committee Corridor South, opposite Committee Room 7, Commons Court Block—second floor. Lavatory facilities for the disabled were provided at the ground floor of 7 Millbank and the Lower Waiting Hall.

The cash machines corridor was refurbished.

The second phase of overhaul of the carriage gates was carried out.

At Norman Shaw South external painting and roof repairs were completed.

Work began on the roof repairs above the Lords Chamber and the Royal Gallery. Completion is due October 1998.

Repairs were carried out to the supporting structure of the Princes Chamber ceiling.

In the Library cellars, improved storage was provided.

Asbestos was removed from plant rooms.

In addition, two projects were planned for completion during the prorogation period. They are an improved sales counter at the Speaker's bookstall and the new pulpit on the main Committee Corridor.

There were also many more small projects, and with the very tight timetable, this demanding programme has fully stretched the House's technical staff and their contractors. The PDVN project and the building maintenance carried out under the same contracts in Lords and Commons areas were particularly challenging. The following statistics indicate the work involved in the PDVN contract:

PDVN was taken to 454 desk positions, and there were 1,780 new telephone outlets, 912 data outlets and 1,910 new power outlets.

This entailed: 359 of cable, 3.1 of metal trunking, 2.7 of water pipe and 24 tonnes of new Welsh slate for floors supported by 7.3 tonnes of new steel joists; 67,000 man hours were worked on the project.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Teachers (Vetting)

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures her Department takes to ensure that grant-maintained and independent schools meet their statutory obligation to check list 99 before confirming appointments of teaching staff. [1367]

Mrs. Gillan: The Department's circulars 9/93 and 11/95, which were sent to all schools, remind schools that they have a legal obligation not to employ people on list 99 who are barred from working with children. The Department provides a service to grant-maintained and independent schools of checks against list 99 and criminal background checks. Checks are also run by the Department when appointments are notified for the purpose of the teachers' superannuation scheme and on the annual survey of independent school staff.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Privy Council

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Lord President of the Council what criteria are used to select individuals for membership of the Privy Council. [903]

Mr. Newton: Appointment to the Privy Council is an exercise of the prerogative. Appointments are made by Her Majesty the Queen on the advice of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. A range of factors are taken into account. Those appointed mostly comprise Ministers, other parliamentarians and members of the judiciary.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Access to Justice

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has made for the implementation of Lord Woolf's final report on access to justice. [2184]

Mr. Streeter: I have today placed in the Library a copy of the Lord Chancellor's strategy for implementing Lord Woolf's recommendations. The strategy proposes that the major elements of the reforms, the fast track, the multi-track and the new costs regime, will be in place by October 1998. The new civil procedure rules to underpin these changes will also be in place in time for implementation.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Angola

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implementation of the Lusaka protocol in Angola; and if he will make a statement. [1220]

Dr. Liam Fox: The implementation of the Lusaka protocol was reviewed by the United Nations Security Council on 11 October. We and other council members expressed deep concern at the lack of significant progress in implementing the peace process. Both parties, but especially UNITA, were urged to fulfil their commitments to the Lusaka protocol. The United Nations Secretary-General will report further to the Security Council on 20 November.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the United Nations' plans for the future role of UNAVEM III, the United Nations Angola verification mission; and if he will make a statement. [1219]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The UN Secretary-General currently plans to begin reducing UNAVEM III military forces by the end of December 1996 in the expectation that the mission will be completed as planned by February 1997. Such an outcome will, however, depend on the willingness of the Angolan parties to honour their commitment to the peace process. The Secretary-General will submit detailed recommendations on the future role of the UN in Angola by 20 November 1996.

Rwanda and Zaire

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the role of the Rwandan authorities with regard to the security situation in the great lakes region. [1215]

Dr. Liam Fox: The Rwandan Government earlier denied any involvement of their forces in the conflict in eastern Zaire. There has been sporadic shelling across the Zaire–Rwanda border, in response to which the Rwandan Government on 30 October announced that they had sent troops into Bukavu. We have urged the Rwandans to withdraw immediately.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the security situation in the great lakes region of Africa. [1213]

Dr. Fox: The security situation in the great lakes is complex. There are long-standing ethnic tensions in eastern Zaire between Zairean peoples and those of Rwandan origin, aggravated by the influx of Rwandan and Burundi refugees. Recent violent clashes result from a backlash by Zairean Tutsis against attacks by the Zairean armed forces and extremist Hutus. The Rwandan Foreign Minister assured my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development on 31 October that Rwandan forces who entered Zaire on 29 October have now withdrawn. Meanwhile, an insurgency by extremist Hutus continues in Burundi.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures the UN is taking to prevent the conflict in eastern Zaire spreading throughout the great lakes region. [1216]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The UN Secretary-General sent Assistant Secretary-General Ibrahima Fall on a good offices mission to Zaire to assess the situation. He has now appointed a special envoy to visit the region with a humanitarian-political-military team. A special representative will be appointed after the special envoy's mission.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has recently received regarding the security and humanitarian situation in Zaire; and if he will make a statement. [1212]

Dr. Fox: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the security and humanitarian situation with the Zairean Prime Minister on 22 October. My right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Chalker met the Rwandan Foreign Minister on 31 October. We are urging restraint and dialogue to resolve the situation. We remain in close touch with other regional Governments, with UN and EU partners, as well as with the humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organisations involved. Aid agencies believe there are sufficient stocks available in the region to meet immediate needs.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has participated in recently (a) in the UN and (b) within the EU concerning the situation in Zaire. [1214]

Dr. Fox: The General Affairs Council discussed Zaire on 28 October and issued a statement calling for an immediate ceasefire and urgent dialogue to resolve the crisis in eastern Zaire. The Un Security Council conducts regular discussions on the situation there.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response the Government have made to the UN Secretary-General's call for an emergency mission to go to Zaire. [1217]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The UK has expressed its support in the Security Council for an emergency mission to go to Zaire.

Albania

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress in negotiations with the Albanian Government regarding an outstanding claim for compensation arising from the Corfu incident and the return of the Albanian gold. [849]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The Secretary-General of the tripartite gold commission met in London on 29 October with representatives of the Government of Albania to conclude the transfer of gold from the tripartite gold commission to Albania. At the same time, the Government of Albania settled the British Government's claim for compensation for the Corfu channel incident.

Human Rights

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures his Department is taking to prevent human rights abuses against Christians in Egypt. [1098]

Mr. Hanley: The violence some Egyptian Christians have suffered at the hands of Islamic extremists is a cause for concern. The Egyptian authorities are trying to suppress such violence. Our embassy in Cairo is following developments closely.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures his Department is taking to prevent human rights abuses in China. [1096]

Mr. Hanley: We remain deeply concerned about the human rights situation in China. We regularly express our concerns to the Chinese authorities, both bilaterally and in conjunction with our European Union partners. We shall continue to use our bilateral exchanges, for example on legal reform, to promote a more enlightened approach by the Chinese authorities.

Copex Fair (Indonesian Representatives)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if representatives of the Indonesian Government will be present at the contingency and operational procurement exhibition—COPEX—fair in Esher, on 5, 6 and 7 November. [420]

Mr. Hanley: The Copex trade fair is a private event. We do not know whether any representatives of the Indonesian Government will attend it.

EU Foreign Affairs Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the agenda and outcome of the EU Foreign Affairs Council on 28 October in Luxembourg. [1533]

Mr. David Davis: The A points in document 10968/96, the texts of which will be placed in the House as soon as they are available, were approved. They include draft conclusions on the EU regional approach to developing relations with the countries of the former Yugoslavia and a common position introducing a ban on visas for senior members of the Burmese regime and on high-level bilateral visits to Burma.

The Council noted the resolutions adopted by the European Parliament in document 9600/96. A copy of the document will be placed in the House as soon as it is available.

The Council reached political agreement on a regulation and joint action to counter unacceptable extra-territorial effects of US trade legislation affecting European companies trading with Cuba, Iran and Libya.

After discussion, the Council agreed conclusions on preparations for the world trade ministerial meeting in Singapore in December. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade emphasised that the Singapore meeting should give a boost to trade liberalisation.

Commissioner Marin, Vice-President of the European Commission, gave a short report to the GAC on the state of play in the association agreement negotiations with Egypt and how the Commission hoped to take negotiations forward. This was subsequently discussed at a meeting of the EC–Egypt co-operation council.

After discussion, the Council agreed conclusions announcing the mandate and appointment of Ambassador Miguel Angel Moratinos as the European Union's special envoy to the middle east peace process.

The presidency gave a progress report to the GAC on the European Union observatory to discuss racism and xenophobia. The presidency will produce a draft statute to clarify discussion of the legal base.

The Council agreed that a joint action should be prepared for adoption at or before the 25 November General Affairs Council on support for the democratic process in Zaire, covering establishment of an EU electoral unit and a contribution to the UN trust fund. The Council also issued a statement reiterating the Union's grave concern at the escalation of fighting in eastern Zaire and its potential to worsen further the already serious humanitarian situation existing in the region, calling for an immediate ceasefire, and restating its view that a regional conference on peace, security and stability in the great lakes region under the auspices of the UN and the Organisation and African Unity, has a central role to play in the establishment of a settlement.

The Council had an exchange of views on the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe summit to be held in Lisbon on 2–3 December, in the perspective of which it adopted "EU Guidelines".

On the morning of 28 October, I signed the EC–Korea trade and co-operation agreement on behalf of the UK.

In the margins, there were discussions on the location of the plant variety office and Turkey, both of which will be discussed at the November General Affairs Council, and under any other business there was a brief discussion on the results of the recent EU–southern Africa development community ministerial in Windhoek, and a request from Greece for the Commission to consider humanitarian aid to Bulgaria.

In addition, the presidency, on behalf of the Union, published a declaration on the situation in Afghanistan.

At a ministerial session of the Intergovernmental Conference Ministers discussed the external action of the EU, focusing on common foreign and security policy—CFSP—issues, security and defence, and external economic relations. On CFSP, Ministers exchanged views on a number of practical and institutional questions. On security and defence, Ministers discussed a range of institutional issues. On external economic relations, Ministers considered options designed to ensure that the EU is able to act decisively to promote its interests in external economic forums.

The Ministerial was preceded by an exchange of views with the presidency and representatives of the European Parliament.

BP (Colombia)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the allegations made in the European Parliament on 24 October relating to BP's activities in Colombia; and if he will make a statement. [1211]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We are aware of the allegations. We are not aware of any evidence which gives substance to them.

EU Council

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will detail forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union for November; and if he will list major European Union events for the next six months. [2113]

Mr. David Davis: This calender is primarily concerned with European Union matters, but certain other relevant events are also included. Events and dates quoted are based on the information available on the date of issue.

SCOTLAND

Children's Clubs (Police Advice)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what record is kept of police officers offering advice or assistance in their personal capacity to the organisers of children's clubs; and if he will make a statement. [195]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There is no central requirement for clubs or police officers to keep such records.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to make alterations to the system under which decisions relating to both the aggregate level and distribution between councils of grant-aided expenditure, Government-supported expenditure and aggregate external finance are taken with particular reference to the delegation of such decisions to the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities; and if he will make a statement. [206]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend is statutorily obliged to consult the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities about both the aggregate level of the local government finance settlement and its distribution among councils, but there is absolutely no question of decisions on those matters having been delegated to the convention as the hon. Member appears to suggest.

Cullen Inquiry

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many officers of Central Scotland police intimated a willingness to give evidence to the Cullen inquiry and subsequently declined to do so; and if he will make a statement. [90]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland appointed Lord Cullen on 21 March 1996 to be a tribunal for the purposes of this inquiry in virtue of section 1 of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921.

Under the provisions of the Act, Lord Cullen had the power to call witnesses and require them to appear at the inquiry. There was, therefore, no question of anyone intimating a willingness to give evidence to the inquiry and subsequently declining to do so.

Police (Freemasons)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what records are kept which show to which masonic lodges police officers belong; and if he will make a statement. [237]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No such records are kept by the Scottish Office.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the policy of the Central Scotland police in respect of officers being members of the masonic order. [89]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have no information about any such policy, which would be a matter for the chief constable.

Casualty Animals

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received relating to the reluctance of contractors to pick up bulls as casualty animals; and if he will make a statement. [464]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: None.

Thomas Hamilton

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions Thomas Hamilton was found in possession of firearms, other than those included on his firearms certificate; and if he will make a statement. [95]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Lord Cullen's report of the public inquiry into the shootings at Dunblane primary school mentions no such occasions. In particular, I refer the hon. Member to chapter 6 of the report, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Ex-prisoners (Employment)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what percentage of ex-prisoners in Scotland have entered (a) paid employment, (b) full-time training and (c) full-time education within six months of being released from prison in each year since 1990; [1472]

(2) what percentage of ex-offenders in Scotland who received non-custodial sentences have entered (a) paid employment, (b) full-time training and (c) full-time education within six months of completing their sentence in each year since 1990; [1473]

(3) what is the total number and percentage of ex-offenders in Scotland who have entered employment within six months of completion of their sentence in each year since 1990. [1474]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria are used by his Department in assessing requests for additional section 94 consents made by local authorities. [1379]

Mr. Kynoch: Additional section 94 consent is dependent on the availability of uncommitted resources for local authority capital spending. If resources are available, decisions are taken by Ministers in light of the submissions from local authorities and the relative needs and priorities of the councils seeking assistance.

Re-offenders

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total number and percentage of re-offenders in Scotland in each year since 1990; and if he will provide a breakdown of these figures by category of crime. [1475]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information is not available in the form requested. The Scottish Office publication "Criminal Proceedings in Scottish Courts, 1994" contains some information on those persons convicted on more than one occasion in the period 1989–1994.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Public Relations

Mr. Allason: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will contract out to the private sector media and public relations work currently undertaken by the Government Information Service. [850]

Mr. Freeman: Decisions on how media and PR campaigns are carried out are for Departments to make.

TRANSPORT

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of (a) the restructuring costs and (b) other costs relating to the letting of the west coast main line rail franchise. [1371]

Mr. Watts: The costs incurred by the franchising director to date on letting the InterCity West Coast franchise are £2.2 million. Any restructuring of the business will be the responsibility of the franchisee.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates have been made of (a) the total costs of consultants, (b) the costs of lawyers' fees, (c) the costs of accountants' fees, (d) the costs of management consultants' fees and (e) the costs of publicity, in the letting of the west coast main line rail franchise. [1370]

Mr. Watts: The costs of consultants' fees incurred by the franchising director on letting the InterCity West Coast franchise are:

Lawyers: £0.33 million

Accountants: £1.23 million

Management consultants: £0.28 million

Total consultants costs: £2.20 million

Apart from costs incurred at the time a franchise is awarded, costs on publicity are incurred for franchising generally and cannot be attributed to individual franchise sales.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what costs have been incurred to date on the bidding process in preparation for letting the west coast main line rail franchise, broken down by category. [1369]

Mr. Watts: The costs incurred to date by the franchising director on letting the InterCity West Coast franchise are:

	£ million
Legal	0.33
Financial adviser	0.23
Accountant	1.23
Management consultants	0.28
Engineering	0.13
Total	2.20

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the value of liabilities to be written off as part of the letting of the west coast mainline rail franchise. [1372]

Mr. Watts: The franchising director has written off no liabilities as part of franchising InterCity West Coast.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the expenditure on operation of the west coast mainline (a) in each year since 1993–94, (b) in the year up to the issuing of the first pre-qualification document by the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising and (c) in the time since preparation for letting the franchise began. [1373]

Mr. Watts: In 1993–94, the InterCity West Coast business was part of the InterCity division of BR and it is not possible to identify the operating costs of InterCity West Coast separately.

On 1 April 1994 the InterCity division was split in preparation for franchising and InterCity West Coast established as a separate business. From that date, responsibility for funding BR passenger operations has been the responsibility of the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising. Since then, BR has received support for passenger rail services to cover those costs of running the business that are not met from passenger revenue or other income. Opraf has paid the following sums to BR to cover the budgeted deficits of InterCity West Coast.

1994–95	99.05
1995–96	84.69
1996–97[1]	92.53
Total	276.27

[1] Annual total.

In 1994–95, BR received £67 million of the support for InterCity West Coast by 14 December 1994 when the first pre-qualification document was issued.

From 1 April 1994 to date, Opraf has paid BR £233 million in respect of InterCity West Coast.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of services projected in the passenger service requirement for InterCity West Coast between Watford junction and Milton Keynes. [1468]

Mr. Watts: There is no requirement for services to call at Watford or Milton Keynes in the InterCity West Coast draft passenger service requirement. The draft passenger service requirement for North London Railways includes a specification safeguarding regular services between London, Watford, Milton Keynes and stations on the route to Birmingham. In drawing up the draft passenger service requirement for InterCity West Coast, the franchising director has taken the view that the operator should have the commercial flexibility to determine the number of InterCity services calling at these stations. The consultation period on the draft passenger service requirement for InterCity West Coast ends on 20 November.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of consultants' fees relating to the preparation for letting the west coast main line franchise (a) for each year since 1993 and (b) to date. [1368]

Mr. Watts: The costs of consultants' fees incurred by the franchising director on letting the InterCity West Coast franchise are:

1993–94 £0.00 million

1994–95 £0.26 million

1995–96 £0.30 million

1996–97 £1.64 million

Total £2.20 million

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the projected number of services listed in the passenger service requirement for the InterCity west coast main line for services between London Euston and Crewe. [1519]

Mr. Watts: The draft passenger service requirement for InterCity West Coast specifies that the operator must provide an hourly service in each direction Mondays to Saturdays. On Sundays there must be an hourly service between Crewe and London Euston, and 14 trains between London Euston and Crewe. The consultation period on the draft passenger service requirement ends on 20 November.

Departmental Parking

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many car parking spaces (a) were available at the Department of Transport's former premises at 2 Marsham street and (b) are available at the Department's current premises at Great Minster house. [1375]

Mr. Bowis: Approximately 64 car parking spaces within 2 Marsham street were allocated to the Department of Transport on a permanent basis in 1995. The number of car parking spaces available in Great Minster house is 23.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the annual cost per annum of car parking spaces at the Department of Transport's current premises of Great Minster house. [1377]

Mr. Bowis: I refer to the reply I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 28 October Official Report, column 44.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost of car parking spaces at the Department of Transport's former premises at 2 Marsham street, on the basis of central London charges, for each year since 1979, in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms. [1376]

Mr. Bowis: Prior to leaving 2 Marsham street in June 1996, the cost of car parking was £192,000 per annum based on central London commercial rates. Information for earlier years is not available.

National Bus Company Pension Scheme

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the findings of the Pensions Ombudsman in respect of the National Bus Company employees: superannuation scheme; and what measures he proposes to return the £168 million plus interest received by his Department from the scheme prior to the sale of the Company. [1086]

Mr. Watts: The pensions ombudsman has issued his final determination on a complaint against the trustees of one of the pension funds—the bus employer superannuation trust—of the former National Bus Company. The trustees, to whom the determination is directed, are in touch with my Department about it. My Department is considering the determination and taking legal advice before replying to the trustees. It may be necessary and appropriate to ask the courts to make a ruling on the complex issues involved.

Rail Deregulation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals his Department has to issue deregulation orders in respect of initiatives involving (a) level crossings, (b) the introduction of new railway stock, (c) tramways and (d) railway heritage. [1432]

Mr. Watts: There are no plans to use order-making powers to further initiatives in these areas.

Rail Franchising Director

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many official cars are operated by the office of the Rail Franchising Director; and if he will indicate the total expenditure for those vehicles since Opraf was established. [1467]

Mr. Watts: Opraf leases one car from the Government car service. The net costs are as follows:

1993–94	16,510
1994–95	46,254
1995–96	45,527
1996–97[1]	23,793
Total	132,084

Watford Junction Rail Incident

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what action has been taken by the British Railways Board to investigate the reason for a London to Manchester train on 10 July overshooting Watford Junction station; [123]

(2) what failures in approved safety procedures have been identified by the British Railways Board to explain the reason for a London–Manchester train overshooting Watford Junction station on 10 July; [119]

(3) if all train staff specifically involved in the incident on 10 July when a London–Manchester train overshot Watford Junction station have been asked to offer evidence to an internal inquiry under the auspices of the British Railways Board; [117]

(4) if he will instruct the British Railways Board to publish the fully details of the incident on 10 July when a Euston–Manchester train overshot Watford Junction station; [113]

(5) if he has requested information from the British Railways Board about the incident on 10 July when a Euston–Manchester express train overshot Watford Junction station; [121]

(6) what defect reports on (a) the trainset and (b) the locomotive which overran Watford Junction station on 10 July were made on the previous day; and what action was taken; [116]

(7) what action has been taken by the British Railways Board following the incident on 10 July when a London–Manchester train overshot Watford Junction Station; [120]

(8) if the results of the British Railways Board internal inquiry into the incident on 10 July when a London–Manchester train overshot Watford Junction station have been made available to the train staff involved; [118]

(9) what explanation has been provided to him by the British Railways Board for the failure of a London–Manchester train on 10 July to stop at Watford Junction station; [91]

(10) what instructions he has given to the British Railways Board about making known full details of the incident on 10 July when a Euston–Manchester train overshot Watford Junction station; [114]

(11) on what date the Health and Safety Executive was notified by his Department about the incident on 10 July when an express train overshot Watford Junction station by five miles; [662]

(12) what action has been taken by the Health and Safety Executive to investigate the reasons for a London to Manchester train on 10 July overshooting Watford Junction station; [101]

(13) what recommendations have been made by the Health and Safety Executive following the incident on 10 July when a London to Manchester train overshot Watford Junction station. [103]

Mr. Watts: The incident on 10 July was reported to the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate by Railtrack within two hours of it occurring. HSE inspecting officers immediately started an independent investigation as to the cause. The train in question was operated by a British Railways Board subsidiary company, InterCity West Coast Ltd., which held an inquiry into technical aspects following an agreement with Railtrack.

As part of its investigation, the HSE has confirmed that the cause of the incident was the brake failure due to a hose blanking cap known as a "top hat" becoming trapped in a brake hose coupling. The "top hat" was able to spin on its axis causing an intermittent failure. The train's braking system was tested at the InterCity depot in Wembley, Middlesex before its journey to Euston, and was tested again immediately before the train's departure from Euston to Manchester. No defects were found. The blockage of the brake coupling hose which caused the brake failure must therefore have developed during the journey.

How the railways' internal inquiry is held, whom it chooses to interview, and to whom the results are made available, are matters for the railway companies involved. The Secretary of State for Transport has no statutory powers to request details of, or to instruct any railway company to make public, the findings of its internal inquiries into any incident. The HSE as the independent safety regulator does have power to require such details, and the Health and Safety Commission advises the Secretary of State for Transport. The HSE is continuing its discussions with the train operating company.

I understand from the HSE that:

(a) a check has been made of other rolling stock to see if any similar potential obstructions exist;

(b) suppliers of brake coupling hoses have now dispensed with the use of "top hat" blanking pieces and are using alternative means of preventing ingress of dirt during storage; and

(c) procedures in depots have been improved to ensure that brake hose couplings are properly checked for any potential obstruction on fitment.

The HSE will not conclude its investigation until it has reviewed the railway's internal report and satisfied itself that issues have been properly resolved.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the implications of the Financial Services Act 1986 for the making of a full public statement by the British Railways Board to explain why on 10 July a London to Manchester train overshot Watford Junction station by five miles. [102]

Mr. Watts: The Financial Services Act 1986 requires that any public statement to be issued in the United Kingdom which might constitute an investment advertisement, as defined in the Act, should first be approved by a person authorised under the Act. Until the rail franchising process is completed, British Rail will require its staff to follow guidelines aimed at ensuring that any public statements they make comply with the terms of the Act.

Rail Privatisation

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost of legal fees incurred by Her Majesty's Government in relation to the privatisation of Railtrack for legal advice and work provided by solicitors in private practice; and what was the average (a) daily and (b) hourly rate contracted for the advice. [852]

Mr. Watts: Government expenditure to date on legal fees in relation to the privatisation of Railtrack is £3.9 million, excluding VAT. Information about contracted daily and hourly rates is commercially confidential.

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if all trains currently operated by privatised train operating companies have complied in full with the safety case required by the Health and Safety Executive. [661]

Mr. Watts: I am advised by the Health and Safety Executive that it has no evidence that trains operated by privatised train operating companies are not in compliance with safety case obligations.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those companies on the pre-qualified bidders' list for railway franchises. [1471]

Mr. Watts: No. This information is commercially confidential.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the hourly rates paid to (a) Samuel Montague, (b) Kleinwort Benson, (c) KPMG, (d) Coopers and Lybrand and (e) Linklaters and Paines by the office of the rail franchising director for work undertaken in relation to rail privatisation. [1511]

Mr. Watts: No. It is not the Government's policy to divulge the hourly fee rates for their advisers.

Railway Rolling Stock

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many railway rolling stock leases involving mark I passenger carriages are currently in existence; and in respect of each lease, what is the name of the rolling stock company owning the vehicles, what is the name of the train operating company leasing them, how many mark I vehicles are covered by that lease and what is the date to which the train operating company is committed to leasing these mark I vehicles. [760]

Mr. Watts: The latest figures held centrally show the position as at 31 March 1995 and these are attached. The rolling stock companies were privatised last year and the current position is a matter for them.

Vehicles (Illegal Operators)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date his Department issued draft legislative proposals to allow the vehicles of illegal operators to be impounded. [1518]

Mr. Bowis: We have not yet done so.

Traffic Congestion

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now update the maps of current congestion and projections of future congestion referred to in his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 320, and include detailed forecasts of congestion for trunk roads in the south west of England and in particular for key links on the motorway network in the region. [1081]

Mr. Watts: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 17 October to the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner), Official Report, columns 1100–01. [1101]

Airport Security Staff

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals there are to extend the vetting of (a) in-house and (b) contract security staff at airports in the United Kingdom by permitting access to the police national computer; and if he will make a statement. [1028]

Mr. Bowis: Ministers agreed in August of this year that all security staff working at UK airports, whether in-house or contractors, should be subject to formal counter-terrorist checks against Government records, including criminal records held by the police. This is additional to the existing requirement for references to be obtained.

Rail Franchises

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each rail franchise (a) the cost of advisers, (b) the training operating companies' passenger revenue in 1995–96, (c) the subsidy paid by the franchising director prior to privatisation, (d) the subsidy paid at the date the franchise was let and (e) the projected subsidy for each of the last two years of the franchise. [1513]

Mr. Watts: The information is provided in the tables.

Air Traffic Control

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reasons the Civil Aviation Authority has not appointed a preferred bidder for the new Scottish centre air traffic control project. [1169]

Mr. Bowis: Decisions on the tenders for the new Scottish centre project are contingent on the review of the two-centre strategy for provision of air traffic control services currently being carried out by the CAA's subsidiary company, National Air Traffic Services Ltd. That review is not yet complete.

Northolt Station

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the safety of Northolt station for its users; and if he will make a statement. [961]

Mr. Bowis: London Underground Ltd. is responsible for the safe operation of its stations. Following its normal procedures, I understand that it has assessed the safety of Northolt station and instigated the appropriate level of inspections to monitor the condition of the structures.

Air Accident Reports

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each air accident investigation report published in the last five years those recommendations that have yet to be implemented. [1436]

Mr. Bowis: The Civil Aviation Authority's progress report 1996 (CAP 666) lists the action taken in response to recommendations addressed to the CAA and the Department in 1995 and to earlier recommendations which have action outstanding.

HGVs and PSVs

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many presentations to magistrates on the enforcement of heavy goods vehicles and public service vehicles have been made by (a) the traffic area network unit and (b) traffic commissioner's offices in each of the last 12 months. [1517]

Mr. Bowis: The Department of Transport's programme of road traffic presentations to magistrates is co-ordinated by the traffic area network unit in consultation with the local traffic commissioner and the vehicle inspectorate. A total of 22 presentations has been arranged so far in response to requests from local magistrates associations. The number held in each of the last twelve months is as follows:

November 1995: 1
December 1995: 0
January 1996: 1
February 1996: 0
March 1996: 2
April 1996 : 1
May 1996: 0
June 1996: 0
July 1996: 2
August 1996: 0
September 1996: 1
October 1996: 2

Fatal Road Accidents

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the number and proportion of fatal road accidents involving heavy lorries in the most recent year for which figures are available. [1498]

Mr. Bowis: In 1995, there were 530 reported fatal road accidents involving heavy goods vehicles, accounting for 16 per cent. of all fatal road accidents.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits Agency

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) under what statutory powers he has placed the Benefits Agency out to tender; [408]

(2) if he will list the functions of the Benefits Agency which are to be contracted out. [409]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Benefits Agency has not been put out to tender.

On 19 July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced proposals for three initiatives involving greater collaboration with the private sector as the next stage of the Department's drive to review and improve the delivery of social security.

Those concerning the Benefits Agency include, first, an invitation to the private sector to submit proposals for taking over the operation of the child benefit centre in Washington, Tyne and Wear.

The second initiative will involve three private companies—or consortiums—appointed following open competition to work in conjunction with the Benefits Agency in running benefit delivery in three of its 13 areas—Yorkshire, West Country and East London and Anglia directorates—for 12 months. All three companies will assist the Benefits Agency with the development of new business processes and information technology. They will be invited during the 12-month period to submit proposals for any elements of the agency's business which could be run differently, including the possibility of further parts of the operation being run by the private sector.

In addition, the functions of the Benefits Agency medical services will be contracted out. A contract is expected to be awarded in April 1997.

The award of contracts under these proposals will be in compliance with the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 and the Public Services Contracts Regulations 1993.

Invalidity and Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants received all forms of (a) invalidity benefit for each year since 1990 and (b) incapacity benefit for (i) 1995 and (ii) 1996. [733]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

Benefit	Number of beneficiaries
Invalidity benefit at 31 March 1990	1,209,000
Invalidity benefit at 30 March 1991	1,306,000
Invalidity benefit at 4 April 1992	1,439,000
Invalidity benefit at 3 April 1993	1,508,000
Invalidity benefit at 2 April 1994	1,681,000
Invalidity benefit at 12 April 1995	1,767,000
Incapacity benefit short-term higher rate and long-term rate at 31 May 1995	1,721,000
Incapacity benefit short-term higher rate and long-term rate at 31 May 1996	1,677,000

1. Figures for invalidity benefit are taken from a 1 per cent. sample of all claimants at the specified date.

2. Figures for incapacity benefit are taken from a 5 per cent. sample of the computer system at the specified date and exclude a small number of cases not held on the system.

3. When incapacity benefit was introduced on 13 April 1995 it replaced sickness benefit and invalidity benefit.

4. The information for incapacity benefit provides the numbers of recipients of short-term higher rate and long-term rate which are the direct equivalent of invalidity benefit in order to provide comparable figures.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the level of benefit fraud in the Bolton area; and what targets have been set for the anti-fraud team in Bolton. [125]

Mr. Heald: Reliable estimates of benefit fraud and incorrectness are derived from the benefit review programme, which is looking at all the major benefits over a five-year period. For example, it was announced in July 1995 that the benefit review of income support and unemployment benefit estimated 9.7 per cent. of claims to be fraudulent, representing an annual value of £1.4 billion. However, review results are statistically valid only on a national basis, and levels of fraud can not be derived for individual geographical areas.

In 1995–96 benefit savings from fraud investigation and initiatives under the security and control programme for the Bolton area amounted to £6,165,825.82.

Following the merger of the benefit fraud investigation teams serving Bolton and Wigan, a savings target has not been set separately for the Bolton area for 1996–97. The savings target for the area covering both the Bolton and Wigan areas for fraud investigation and initiatives under the security and control programme for 1996–97 is £9,423,363.

Benefit Appeals

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appeals against a decision that the claimant is capable of work have been (a) lodged and (b) decided during the year April 1995 to April 1996; and of those decided, how many were found in the claimant's favour. [416]

Mr. Burt: As at 31 March 1996, 40,665 appeals against a decision that a claimant was capable of work following an examination under the all-work test had been lodged. Of these, 7,671 had been heard and 3,549 were revised in favour of the appellant.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate his Department has made of the numbers of claimants receiving income support as a result of the rejection of their claim for incapacity benefit. [728]

Mr. Burt: As at 31 August 1996, 113,000[1] incapacity benefit recipients had been found capable of work following an examination under the all work-test. Of these, it is estimated that around 37,000[2] will become newly entitled to income support.

Notes:

1. Source: 100 per cent. count of cases on the incapacity benefit computer system. Excludes a small number of cases not held on the system.

2. Estimate based on family expenditure survey data, rounded to nearest 1,000 cases.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) IB50 questionnaires were (i) issued and (ii) returned and (b) how many examinations for the all-work test were (1) scheduled and (2) took place during the year April 1995 to April 1996. [411]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested as information on the return of questionnaires is not routinely collected. However, a recent sampling exercise indicated that 93 per cent. of questionnaires are returned within six weeks. The available information is in the table.

	Number
Questionnaires issued (13 April 1995 to 31 March 1996)	1,317,715
IB examinations scheduled (13 April 1995 to 31 March 1996)	683,760
IB examinations conducted (13 April to 31 March 1996)	434,817

Notes:

Figures for examinations scheduled and conducted include a small number of examinations for the own occupation test and all-work test examinations for severe disablement allowance claimants.

Out-of-hours Service

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what funds have been (a) made available and (b) expended on maintaining the out-of-hours service since the completion of the consultation exercise; and when he plans to announce a decision on the service. [124]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Peter Thurnham, dated 30 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what funds have been (a) made available and (b) expended on maintaining the Out of Hours Service (OOHS) since the completion of the consultation exercise; and when he plans to announce a decision on the service.

The consultation stage of the review of the OOHS took place during August 1996. The total budget allocated to budget holders for the administration of the OOHS for the financial year 1996/97 is £1.834m, of which £1m was issued on 10 October to enable managers to continue the service pending the results of the review.

The amount expended on maintaining the Out of Hours Service during this financial year is not separately identified by all budget holders and could only by obtained at a disproportionate cost.

The review of the OOHS is currently under way and as part of this review, the Benefits Agency has sought the views of all interested parties including social services. Those views will be taken into account in reaching the final decision. No decisions have yet been made about the OOHS. I am unable to confirm when an announcement will be made though it is hoped this will be before the end of the year.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Child Support Agency

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what measures he has put in place to ensure that confidentiality is not breached by Post Office staff opening letters to the Child Support Agency; [66]

(2) what safeguards he has put in place to ensure that Post Office staff opening letters to the Child Support Agency are not allowed to read them; [56]

(3) what safeguards he has put in place to ensure that Post Office staff involved with the Child Support Agency in a private capacity are precluded from opening letters to the Child Support Agency at work. [57]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 30 October 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about confidentiality safeguards regarding the opening of Child Support Agency post.

Client confidentiality is of the utmost importance to the Agency, and safeguarding information was an important consideration for the Agency before taking the decision to contract out its post opening requirements to the Royal Mail.

All Royal Mail staff are required to sign the Official Secrets Act, just as are staff employed by the Child Support Agency. The sorting service provided by Royal Mail is identical to the procedure previously undertaken by Agency staff.

Mail for the Agency is opened in a separate, secure room at each Royal Mail delivery office. The office is kept locked and staff are required to sign on entry to the room. The postal workers who open Agency post sign a confidentiality agreement relating to this work. The mail opening is continually supervised by a manager and monitored by close-circuit TV. After being opened, the mail is sorted into individual office addresses nominated by the Agency and then put in sealed pouches ready for delivery to Agency offices. The volumes involved and the large scale use of machinery in the process makes the reading of individual letters and forms an impractical proposition.

I hope this is helpful.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many complaints he has received from people using the Child Support Agency relating to breaches of confidentiality in each of the last five years. [65]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 30 October 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about breaches of confidentiality relating to the Child Support Agency.

It is not possible to answer your Question in precisely the form that you have requested, as statistics on the number of complaints are not recorded by category.

However, any apparent breach of confidentiality by Agency staff (whether it emerges via a complaint or our internal checks) is treated very seriously and thoroughly investigated. All staff are made aware of the importance of this aspect of the Agency's work. Since its launch in 1993, the Agency has handled over 1.7 million cases: the total number of confidentiality breaches resulting in disciplinary action is 47. The table below shows a yearly breakdown of this figure. The vast majority of cases were the result of human error, e.g. wrongly directing mail. In one case confidentiality was breached knowingly: this led to the dismissal of the person involved.

Year	Number of confidentiality breaches
1993–94	0
1994–95	4
1995–96	28
1996 to date	15

I hope this is helpful.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations he undertook before giving permission for Post Office staff to open letters from people writing to the Child Support Agency. [67]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 30 October 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security regarding consultations about the opening of Child Support Agency post.

Following a feasibility study, the Agency decided to contract out its post opening requirements to the Royal Mail. The Agency ran a six month pilot exercise to test procedures and issues such as security and client confidentiality.

Full consultations were undertaken with local and national Agency Trade Union representatives before this decision was taken; Agency staff and managers involved in post opening duties were also fully consulted.

I hope this is helpful.

National Insurance

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the annual cost to the Exchequer of raising the starting point for paying employee national insurance contributions to the weekly earnings equivalent of the annual sum of £3,765; and what is his estimate of the number of individuals who would cease to be liable to pay employee national insurance contributions if such a change were made. [815]

Mr. Heald: The estimated loss in revenue from employee national insurance contributions would be some £775 million in a full year. On average, about 0.8 million employees in any week would no longer be liable to pay contributions.

Source:
Government Actuary's Department.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the additional revenue yield in a full year which would result from extending employers national insurance contributions to all fringe benefits currently liable to income tax only; and if he will make a statement. [648]

Mr. Heald: An estimated £250 million would be raised by extending employer national insurance contributions to taxable benefits in kind.

Source:
Inland Revenue.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the revenue lost to the Exchequer in (a) 1990-91, (b) 1992-93, (c) 1995-96, (d) 1996-97 and (e) 1997-98 from the avoidance of employers national insurance contributions by companies who have paid annual bonuses in benefits in kind as opposed to cash; and if he will make a statement. [649]

Mr. Heald: Information is not available. Not all payment practices using benefits in kind are aimed solely or largely at unfair avoidance of national insurance contributions, and employers are not required to identify bonus payments, annual or otherwise, separately from other payments.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the revenue yield from employers national insurance contributions on fringe benefits in (a) 1990-91, (b) 1992-93, (c) 1995-96, (d) 1996-97 and (e) 1997-98; and if he will make a statement. [650]

Mr. Heald: The main benefits in kind provided by employers are cars and fuel and class 1A contributions are charged on them.

Information regarding receipts from employer's class 1A national insurance contributions—NICs—is in the table.

£ millions

Year	Employers' class 1A NICs (including NHS contribution)
1990–91	[1]—
1992–93	470
1995–96	[2]469
1996–97	[2]476
1997–98	[2]491

Notes:
[1] Class 1A came into operation from April 1991.
[2] Figures are estimated.

Government Actuary's Department.

A number of other payments in kind have been brought into class 1 NICs—paid by employers and employees—including certain share payments, options, assets, gilts and certain life assurance policies. No separate figures are available for the yield from these sources.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the law on the liability of employers to pay national insurance. [319]

Mr. Heald: We plan to legislate to mirror pay-as-you-earn settlement agreements in national insurance contributions at the earliest suitable opportunity. We remain committed to aligning further the rules for tax and NICs in the future except where there are clear reasons why they should differ.

TREASURY

Endangered Species

12. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what efforts are being made by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to stamp out the illegal trade in endangered species of flora and fauna. [325]

Mr. Oppenheim: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise plays a key enforcement role in the United Kingdoms long-standing obligations under CITES, the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species. This entails not only monitoring and regulating legitimate trade with other countries but seizing unlawful goods and, where appropriate, prosecuting those engaged in illegal trading.

Tax Rebates

13. Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to ensure that formerly unemployed people who have paid too much tax receive their full tax rebate. [326]

Mr. Jack: Existing procedures ensure that any tax overpaid would be repaid in the normal way.

Single Currency

14. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations have been made to him on the criteria for joining the European single currency. [327]

Mr. Clarke: The Government's economic policy objectives of permanently low inflation and sound public finances are fully consistent with the Maastricht convergence criteria. These criteria make economic sense in their own right, and are essential for economic success with or without EMU.

The precise interpretation of the criteria will be for the Council of Ministers to decide in early 1998, when the decision is taken on which countries have qualified to join the single currency.

Inflation

16. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the prospects for inflation into the next decade. [329]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The prospects are excellent. In recent years we have enjoyed the lowest inflation rate for almost half a century, and the Government are determined that it should remain low.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average rate of inflation (a) between March 1974 and May 1979 and (b) since May 1979; and if he will make a statement. [995]

Mrs. Knight: The average rate of year-on-year inflation measured by the retail prices index all items excluding mortgage interest payments was 16 per cent. between March 1974 and May 1979. The average rate since May 1979 has been 6.3 per cent. Since the Government's inflation target rate was set in October 1992, the average rate has been 2.8 per cent.

Personal Taxation

17. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest available figures for total personal taxation as a percentage of the total tax take; what was the equivalent figure in 1978–79; and if he will make a statement. [330]

Mr. Waldegrave: Total personal taxation was 69½ per cent. of total non-North sea taxes and national insurance contributions in both 1978–79 and 1995–96.

The Government are committed to low taxation and a tax system that raises revenue in ways that do least damage to the economy and encourage enterprise. Government tax reforms since 1979, particularly the switch from direct to indirect taxation, have allowed people to keep more of the money they earn to spend or save as they choose. By sharpening work incentives and encouraging wealth creation, the Government have laid the foundation for sustained long-term improvement in general living standards.

Private Finance Initiative

18. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for investment through private finance projects over the next three years. [332]

19. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total value of agreements announced under the private finance initiative to date. [333]

Mr. Jack: The latest available forecasts can be found in table 6.4 of the "1996–97 Financial Statement and Budget Report", and showed that the Government forecast private sector capital investment of £1.9 million in 1996–97, £2.6 million in 1997–98, and £2.8 million in 1998–99 at the time of the last Budget. The latest projections for the three years from 1997–98 will be published in the next "Financial Statement and Budget Report", on 26 November. Just over £7 billion worth of deals have been agreed to date.

Taxation (Cigarettes)

20. Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will increase the tax levied on cigarettes. [334]

Mr. Oppenheim: That is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement.

Poor Families

21. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what method he consults the views of poor families prior to reaching decisions on tax and other measures to be included in the Finance Bill. [335]

Mr. Jack: We receive many letters from all sections of the community, including those who are less well off, setting out their ideas for the forthcoming Budget. All representations are looked at carefully and inform the final Budget decisions.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

22. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, at the latest possible date, is the figure for the PSBR. [336]

Mr. Waldegrave: The PSBR in September was £3.4 billion. The PSBR in the first half of 1996–97 was £16.1 billion, compared with £20.1 billion in the first half of 1995–96. The summer economic forecast projected a PSBR of £26.9 billion in 1996–97 as a whole.

23. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current stage of the public sector borrowing requirement. [337]

Mr. Waldegrave: The PSBR in the first half of 1996–97 was £16.1 billion, compared with £20.1 billion in the first half of 1995–96. The summer economic forecast projected a PSBR of £26.9 billion in 1996–97 as a whole, a decline of nearly £5 billion compared with the PSBR in 1995–96.

Incomes

Mr. Evenett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the income of a family on average earnings (a) in April 1992 and (b) in April 1997. [324]

Mr. Jack: Real take-home pay for a one-earner family on average earnings was £292 per week in 1991–92 and is expected to rise to £305 per week in 1996–97. That is a total rise of around £700 a year. The 1996–97 income of a family on average earnings is up £700 a year after the effects of tax and inflation when compared to that of 1991–92.

Scottish Economy

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met representatives of the business community in Scotland to discuss recent trends in the Scottish economy. [328]

Mrs. Angela Knight: My right hon. and learned Friend keeps in regular touch with representatives of the business community from all parts of the UK, including Scotland. His last meeting with Scottish business men and women was on Tuesday 29 October.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mrs. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cost to the Exchequer of mortgage interest tax relief in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [805]

Mr. Jack: The estimated total cost of mortgage interest relief in 1996–97 is £2.3 billion. This estimate is provisional. It is based on the assumption, by convention, of no change from the current estimated average building society interest rate of 6.5 per cent. The cost of the relief in 1997–98 would depend on future interest rates and the future distribution of the number and value of outstanding mortgages.

Income Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the full-year cost of reducing the income tax rate on the existing 20 per cent. band to (a) 15 per cent., and (b) 10 per cent. [806]

Mr. Jack: The estimated full-year cost at 1997–98 income levels of reducing the income tax rate on the existing 20 per cent. band to 15 per cent. is about £4.5 billion and to 10 per cent. is about £9 billion. The estimates assume that the income tax rate on savings and dividend income is reduced to 15 and 10 per cent. and that the estimates take account of the effects of the change on receipts of advanced corporation tax and on consequential liability to mainstream corporation tax.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the full year cost per person of raising the standard rate of income tax by 1p in the pound for (a) each adult in the United Kingdom and (b) each income tax payer in the United Kingdom. [813]

Mr. Jack: The average tax increase at 1996–97 income levels of increasing the basic rate of income tax by 1p is about £35 for each adult—aged 18 and over—and about £63 for every income tax payer in the United Kingdom.

Profit-related Pay Tax Relief

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his estimate of the cost to the Exchequer of the tax relief on profit-related pay in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98 and (d) 1998–99; and if he will make a statement; [807]

(2) how many individuals are participating in profit-related pay schemes qualifying for tax relief; and what is his estimate of the number of such individuals who pay income tax at the top marginal income tax rate of 40 per cent. [808]

Mr. Jack: Available estimates of the cost of income tax relief for profit-related pay schemes in 1995–96 and 1996–97, and the number of participants up to the end of March 1996, are published in table 1.6 and table 6.3 respectively of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1996", a copy of which is in the Library.

Reliable information on the number of participants at each marginal rate is not available.

Ecus (Minting)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to further regulate the minting of ecus by local authorities. [320]

Mrs. Angela Knight: No changes are needed. The Coinage Act 1971 sets out clearly that only the Royal Mint may issue coins in the United Kingdom.

Government Procurement

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in improving value for money in Government procurement. [1986]

Mrs. Angela Knight: A report by the Treasury's procurement group on progress made in Government procurement is published today.

The main developments in the procurement field in 1995–96 were the publications of the Government's procurement strategy: "Setting New Standards" (Cm 2840) and the efficiency scrutiny: "Construction Procurement in Government". These set a framework for Departments to develop forward-looking and challenging objectives.

The report provides an overview of the progress made by departments in implementing both the strategy and scrutiny—in particular:

progress in developing (and implementing) procurement change programmes—designed to integrate procurement into all non-pay, non-transfer expenditure;

the development of best practice guidance for handling all aspects of large service and private finance initiative contracts;

the establishment of interdepartmental networks where Departments collaborate to share ideas on achieving value for money; in the construction area: the establishment of eight interdepartmental working groups to implement the scrutiny's recommendations;

the introduction of a benchmarking programme; and the establishment of an external advisory panel to the central unit on procurement to provide continuity of advice, being ideas to public procurement and ensure rapid assimilation of best private sector practice.

The report also records that, in 1994–95, Departments achieved value-for-money improvements of some £112 million on a total spend of £3.2 billion—3.4 per cent.

The main message of the report is that, although significant progress has been made, much remains to be done.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Paymaster Agency

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for that part of the Paymaster agency which is to remain in the public sector. [2110]

Mr. Oppenheim: The then Paymaster General announced on 15 July 1996, Official Report, columns 372–73, that the Government were accepting the recommendations of a prior options review concerning the privatisation of the Paymaster agency. He acknowledged that a small part of the agency's banking business must stay in the public sector.

This element, which will maintain the formal title of the Office of HM Paymaster General—OPG—will be separated from the agency on 1 November, when the present head of the National Investment and Loans Office—NILO—will be appointed assistant paymaster general and become responsible for the management of the Paymaster General's accounts at the Bank of England. The OPG will remain a separate statutory body within NILO, will manage the future contract for the provision of banking services once the agency is privatised next spring, and will ensure the protection of market-sensitive data.

Drug-related Deaths

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most recent calculation of the numbers of people who have died in each of the past five years as a result of using (a) cocaine, (b) ketamine, (c) khat, (d) amphetamines, (e) magic mushrooms, (f) solvents and (g) glue. [989]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 30 October 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from John Fox to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 31 October 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked the Director of the ONS to reply to your recent question asking for the numbers of people who have died in each of the past five years as a result of using (a) cocaine, (b) ketamine, (c) khat, (d) amphetamines, (e) magic mushrooms, (f) solvents and (g) glue.

The Director has asked me to respond in his absence.

The numbers of deaths in 1991 and 1992 as a result of using cocaine, ketamine, khat, amphetamines, magic mushrooms, solvents and glue are published in Table 10 of "Mortality statistics: injury and poisoning, England and Wales", Series DH4, nos 17 and 18, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

The information for 1993, 1994 and 1995 could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

VAT Refunds

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Custom and Excise implementation of a three-year limit for VAT refunds for local authorities. [789]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 29 October 1996]: The three-year cap on VAT refunds will apply to local authorities in the same way as to other VAT-registered bodies. Refunds of tax made to local authorities that are not VAT registered, on their non-business activities, will be unaffected.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Hospital Trusts

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the population served by each of the hospital trusts within the Eastern area health and social services board; and what is the capital expenditure proposed for this year and each of the next three years in each hospital trust. [64]

Mr. Moss: Under the Government's reforms it is the responsibility of purchasers, boards and GP fundholders, to secure services for the population. Trust can provide only services in line with contracts agreed with purchasers. The catchments of hospital trusts are dictated by the combination of contracts agreed with purchasers.

Capital expenditure approved for each trust in the Eastern Board area for 1996–97 is as follows:

	General capital £	Major projects £
Belfast city hospital trust	1,376,000	—
Down lisburn trust	1,005,000	—
Green park trust	171,000	—
Mater hospital trust	95,000	—
Royal group of hospitals trust	2,064,000	8,236,000
Ulster north down and ards hospital trust	912,000	—

My Department aims to maintain a broadly similar level of general capital expenditure in each trust over the next three years. Funding for other major projects will be dependent on the overall level of funding and the outcome of the tests for private finance now required by Government.

Parades

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has the total cost of policing the parades which took place in Northern Ireland from 1 April to 30 September 1996. [137]

Sir John Wheeler: The policing of marches and demonstrations is part of normal police duties and as such separate costings for these activities are not held centrally. Where the public order situation demands, it may be necessary to incur additional costs, and it is a matter of public record that the additional costs arising from the marches and demonstrations in July and August amounted to some £13 million.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many walks to services and special occasions held by lodges under the auspices of the Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland were held on dates other than 12 July during the last three years for which figures are available. [105]

Sir John Wheeler: The RUC does not record statistics on walks to services or parades held by specific organisations. It does, however, keep statistics under the broad generic headings of loyalist, nationalist and other groups. The figures for loyalist parades which include marches held under the auspices of the Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland are as follows:

1994–2057: (excluding 12 July)

1995–2034: (excluding 12 July)

1996–1895: (up to 30 September, excluding 12 July).

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many parades took place in Northern Ireland from 1 April to 30 September 1996. [135]

Sir John Wheeler: The total number of parades which took place between those dates is 2,603.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many walks or processions, under the auspices of lodges in the Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland, were held in Northern Ireland on 12 July for the last three years for which figures are available. [104]

Sir John Wheeler: The RUC does not record statistics on walks or processions held by specific organisation. It does, however, keep statistics under the broad generic headings of loyalist, nationalist and other groups. The figures for loyalist parades on 12 July, the overwhelming majority of which are likely to have been held under the auspices of the Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland, are as follows:

12.07.94: 463

12.07.96: 304.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (i) the location and (ii) the organisers of each parade which took place in Northern Ireland from 1 April to 30 September 1996. [136]

Sir John Wheeler: It is not practical to identify the individual or group which organised each of the 2,603 parades which took place during this period. The location of each parade is recorded by RUC sub-division. The table sets out a breakdown of the number of parades in each sub-division identified by the general term loyalist, nationalist and others.

Motor Cyclists (Licensing)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to change the system of licensing motor cyclists; if he will make a statement on the A1 licence; what are the EU requirements in this area; and if he will make a statement. [244]

Mr. Moss: The second EC directive on the driving licence requires member states to have two motor cycle driving licence categories and associated tests. Category A will give entitlement to drive any motor cycle with a power output up to 25kW or a power to weight ratio not exceeding 0.16kW/kg. Passing the category A test will also confer entitlement to drive larger motor cycles after two years. A sub-category (A1) will give entitlement to drive a light motor cycle up to 125cc, with a power output of 11kW. The minimum age for driving motor cycles will remain 17.

In implementing the directive in Northern Ireland, it is proposed that the existing category A test—which allows a person to take a motor cycle test in a vehicle up to 250cc—will continue until 1 July 1997 on which date learner motor cyclists will be restricted to vehicles of up to 125cc in line with current arrangements in GB. It is also proposed to introduce the sub-category A1 test along with other provisions of the directive on 1 January 1997.

Primary Health Care

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to develop research and development for primary health care in Northern Ireland. [107]

Mr. Moss: The imminent appointment of the first director of research and development for the health and personnel social services as head of a new office of R and D, and plans radically to revise funding mechanisms in line with Great Britain developments emanating from the Culyer report are designed to ensure that R and D in primary care receives equitable access to available funds for R and D.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sums were spent on research and development for primary health care in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available. [106]

Mr. Moss: The Department of Health and Social Services currently provides support for research and development in the health and social services in Northern Ireland via a variety of mechanisms. Departmental funds are not reserved for specific areas of research, but are available for application across all priority areas.

During 1995–96, the Department provided £75,000 in direct support of R and D in the area of primary health care.

In addition to this, indirect support for primary health care was further provided through the provision of research funds to the four core-funded research units at the Queen's university of Belfast. The units undertake a broad portfolio of research, comprising issues directly and indirectly associated with primary health care: for example, a primary concern for the drug utilisation research unit is the prescribing of drugs by general medical practitioners. Figures for expenditure by the units on specific research projects are not available centrally.

Casualty Animals

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representation he has received relating to problems associated with the payment by farmers for the collection and removal of casualty animals; and if he will make a statement. [462]

Mrs. Browning: I have received a number of representations from producers expressing concern about charges made for the collection and disposal of animals slaughtered on farm. Charges are generally higher for animals entering the over-30-month scheme than those applied to casualty animals before its introduction. The reasons for the increases are that there is now no residual value for the collectors in the hides or in the trimmings while their costs have actually increased as a result of the generally longer distances travelled to incineration sites. Against this, producers receive the full compensation rate under the OMTS rather than, as previously, a salvage value taking account of unusable parts of the carcass.

Beef Imports

Mr. Richards: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries which export beef and beef products to the United Kingdom; and what measures are in place to ensure all imported products conform with current public health criteria. [211]

Mrs. Browning: In 1996, beef—including beef carcass meat, bovine offal and preparations of beef meat and bovine offal—originating from the following countries has been exported to the United Kingdom.

Argentina
Australia
Botswana
Brazil
Canada
Mauritius
Namibia
New Zealand
Paraguay
Romania
Swaziland
USA
Uruguay
Zimbabwe.

Separate information is not available for exports of beef products into the United Kingdom. However, meat products—which may or may not have contained beef—originating from the following countries have been exported to the United Kingdom.

Argentina
Botswana
Brazil
Canada
Croatia
Hong Kong
Hungary
New Zealand
Norway

Poland

Singapore

Thailand

USA.

Note:

This information, as recorded in overseas trade statistics, is provisional.

Separate information covering imports from other member states is not readily available.

All consignments of fresh meat imported into the UK, whether from other member states or third countries, must have been produced in accordance with harmonised Community rules laid down in Council directive 64/433/EEC (as amended). In the case of meat products the harmonised rules are laid down in Council directive 77/99 (as amended).

Community rules require that all imports of third country animal products enter the Community through approved border inspection posts where they are subject to official checks to verify compliance with public and animal health import conditions.

For imports from other member states, the member state of origin is responsible for ensuring that exported goods comply with Community rules. Those receiving such goods are also required to check and report any discrepancies to the competent authority in the member state of destination.

Aquatic Environment Monitoring

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what biological and physiological parameters are monitored by his Department, in order for the Department of the Environment to assess the cumulative impacts of discharges from offshore oil and gas installations on marine wildlife and habitats. [506]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 30 October 1996]: Through the Directorate of Fisheries Research, the Department contributes to the extensive national monitoring programme which seeks, among other things, to identify any harmful effects of human activities on the marine environment. The monitoring includes chemical analysis, incorporating measurements of hydrocarbons in water and sediments, and biological effects testing. Aquatic environment monitoring reports which detail the monitoring programme and its findings are issued annually and are available in the Library of the House.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to change the cash limits for the Overseas Development Administration for 1996–97. [2372]

Dr. Liam Fox: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class II, vote 5 will be increased by £30,570,000 from £1,591,466,000 to £1,622,036,000. The increase is in respect of: a rollover of underspending against the 1995–96 external assistance vote; a balance of underspending against European Community budgetary aid in 1994; the early redemption of outstanding loan repayments by the Crown Agents to the National Loans Fund; advisers fee related to the privatisation of the Crown Agents; and the reimbursement of costs incurred in 1995–96 and costs for 1996–97 in respect of the Gibraltar social insurance fund. The increase will be charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Departmental Minutes

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the departmental minutes which the Overseas Development Administration laid before the House on 20 August. [1650]

Dr. Liam Fox: The departmental minute reported the assumption of contingent liabilities arising from tax indemnities given to the commercial banks which are making concessional loans to developing countries to finance the following projects:

Country	Project	Estimated maximum liability £
1 Indonesia	Advancement of SI Science and Technology	1,432,665
2 China	Guangzhou Metro Ventilation System	416,051

It was necessary to give the indemnities urgently during the parliamentary recess to avoid delaying the start of these two projects.

The departmental minute also reported that the contingent liability for the China Guangzhou metro overhead catenary system project had been underestimated by £88,317 in the earlier departmental minute laid before the house on 16 April 1996. This project is already being implemented. The financing agreement for this project will be increased. The contingent liability is now estimated to amount to a maximum of £916,354 instead of the £833,037 previously notified.

These projects are being supported by the Overseas Development Administration under the aid and trade provision soft loan financing arrangements which enable the banks to lend at concessional rates.

The departmental minute was placed in the Libraries of both Houses on 20 August and copies were sent to the Public Accounts Committee and the Foreign Affairs Committee.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Departmental Cash Limits

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what changes she proposes to make to her Department's cash limits and running cost limits for 1996–97. [2432]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class X, vote 1 will be increased by £14,107,000 from £948,760,000 to £962,867,000 and running costs limit is increased by £3,340,000 from £26,137,000 to £29,477,000. This is to increase provision for assets accepted in lieu of tax; within the new project ceiling, to increase provision to fund works required to complete the British Library St. Pancras building; to provide for payments from the National Heritage lottery fund to the royal commission for historical manuscripts for assessment work; to provide for additional expenditure on the royal estate and to transfer responsibility to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for maintenance work connected with ceremonial works; to provide for payments from the Department of the Environment—class VI, vote 5—towards the cost of refurbishing Somerset house for the housing of the Gilbert collection; to provide for additional appropriations from rents and other income from properties on the royal estate; to provide for the transfer of responsibility for costs of the Whitehall heating system for the Banqueting house to the Historic Royal Palaces agency; to provide for additional appropriations from sales of published material by the Royal Fine Art Commission; to provide for a reduction in expenditure on research and other services; to provide for an increase in running costs expenditure in line with entitlement to end year flexibility, to effect the transfer of responsibility for voluntary services from the Home Office and to transfer provision from the Security Facilities Executive agency for advisory services; to effect transfers from Home Office for grants for reducing racial disadvantage and for assistance to the National Association of Lay Visitors; and to provide for the expenses of the Department in the privatisation of the BBC transmission services. The increases will be offset by transfers, savings and charges to the reserve, and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

ENVIRONMENT

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each division of the Health and Safety Executive trends in staff levels relative to levels three years ago. [660]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following table shows the number of staff employed by the Health and Safety Executive in each of the last four years.

	1 April 1993	1 April 1994	1 April 1995[1]	31 March 1996[2]

Total staff	4,537.50	4,545.00	4,391.00	4,151.00

[1] Figures given are full-time equivalent counts. A revised Treasury methodology for calculating full-time equivalent figures for staff in part-time posts came into operation from 1.4.95. From that date all part-time staff were counted pro-rata according to hours worked. Previously part-time staff who worked 10 hours or more were all counted as 0.5.
[2] From 1.4.96 HSE Divisions were restructured. Staff in post data for 31.3.96 is listed to provide comparison with previous years.

Homelessness

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people were statutorily recognised as homeless at the latest available date; and of those how many are estimated to have accommodation with, (i) specific inadequacies and (ii) insecurity; how many are housed in emergency hostels; and how many are without any form of shelter. [1015]

Mr. Clappison: I refer my hon. Friend to the quarterly information bulletin entitled, "Households found accommodation the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985: England" for the available information. Copies of the bulletin, the latest of which provides statistics for the second quarter of 1996, are in the Library.

Lead Pipes

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy with regard to securing the replacement of lead pipes in the domestic water supply network. [1024]

Mr. Clappison: The Government's policy is to seek to reduce levels of lead in drinking water. Action is being taken by water suppliers to help reduce lead levels at consumers' taps, but responsibility for domestic pipework rests with property owners. To help them, the Government have recently published a leaflet which informs householders about the risks from lead in drinking water and gives advice on the action that they can take to reduce exposure. We are currently considering what further measures could be taken to provide information and promote awareness.

Occupational Dermatitis

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people have been diagnosed as contracting occupational dermatitis in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [1136]

Sir Paul Beresford: The industrial injuries compensation scheme administered by DSS tends to record the most serious cases of (non-infective) dermatitis. The numbers of new cases assessed at 1 per cent. or more disability, based on a 100 per cent. count of cases from 1985–86 to 1994–95 are as follows:

Year	Number of cases of dermatitis
1985–86	785
1986–87	464
1987–88	368
1988–89	285
1989–90	301
1990–91	434
1991–92	411
1992–93	419
1993–94	392
1994–95	368

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional measures are being evaluated to protect construction workers employed on the London Underground Jubilee line extension from contracting occupational dermatitis. [1139]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Health and Safety Executive has completed a follow-up survey on one site. This showed that where the full range of measures was used, cases of dermatitis had reduced by 80 per cent.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many construction workers employed on the London Underground Jubilee line extension have been diagnosed as contracting occupational dermatitis. [1137]

Sir Paul Beresford: Of the 133 men examined by HSE's employment medical adviser, 10 showed signs of occupational dermatitis.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures were taken at the outset of the London Underground Jubilee line extension to protect construction workers from occupational dermatitis. [1138]

Sir Paul Beresford: Protective measures are the responsibility of the contractors engaged in the project. I am informed by the Health and Safety Executive that washing facilities were provided at all Jubilee line extension sites. It is not possible to state the extent to which other measures such as protective clothing, skin creams and training were made available by contractors.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many guilty verdicts have been recorded, in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available, under health and safety law, following the serious injury of an employee. [1132]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information is not available, or available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for what reason each of the individuals cited in his answer of 16 October 1996, Official Report, column 1075, were sent to prison following convictions under health and safety at work law; and what was the length of the sentence in each case. [1133]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested about the three cases of individuals sent to prison following convictions under health and safety at work law is as follows:

Reason	Length of prison sentence (months)
1. Breaches of the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 and the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987	3
2. Contravention of a prohibition notice issued under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 (HSWA)	4
3. Contravention of a prohibition notice issued under HSWA	4

Mental Illness (Stress)

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to reduce instances of mental illness caused at work, following the 1995 court case in which an employee sued his employer for a nervous breakdown brought on by stress. [1140]

Sir Paul Beresford: In May 1995, the Health and Safety Executive published guidance "Stress at Work: A Guide for Employers" which explained that mental illness is one ill health condition that has been associated with stress. HSE is carrying out research in order to provide employers with more detailed guidance on this issue.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the rules governing the spending of capital budgets by local authorities during the transitional period to unitary authorities. [1087]

Sir Paul Beresford: Authorities in the transitional period before reorganisation are governed by the same rules on capital spending as other authorities, but in addition are subject to the prudential code of financial management, jointly published in 1994 by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and the local authority associations, and approved by the Audit Commission. I have arranged for a copy of the code to be placed in the Library.

Asbestos

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Health and Safety Commission's current review of the legislation on asbestos will be completed; and when its conclusions will be published. [1441]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Health and Safety Commission undertook a wide-ranging review of health and safety legislation including asbestos legislation in 1993–94, the results of which were published in 1994. As a result of the review, HSC published a discussion document in May 1996 on the future of the lead and asbestos regulations and is currently considering the responses received. It is expected that HSC will complete this work in 1997, and will issue a consultative document on any legislative changes it considers are needed as soon as possible thereafter.

Industrial Diseases

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in rank order the 10 most common causes of deaths from industrial diseases and the numbers of deaths from those diseases. [866]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information in the table is limited to those diseases that have a strong occupational link. These are diseases caused by the inhalation or swallowing of various kinds of mineral or organic dusts. The numbers of such deaths reported on death certificates in Great Britain in 1994 were as follows:

	Number
Mesothelioma	1,235
Pneumoconiosis (other than asbestosis)	276
Asbestosis (excluding certificates also mentioning mesothelioma)	174
Farmer's lung and other occupational allergic alveolitis	10
Byssinosis	7

Asbestos-related Diseases

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for the most recently available date (a) the 10 districts in Great Britain which have the highest rates of death from asbestos-related diseases and (b) the national rate of death from these diseases. [867]

Sir Paul Beresford: The only asbestos-related disease for which the data are available is mesothelioma, and the district breakdown is available only for the period 1976–91. The 10 districts in Great Britain with the highest rates of death from mesothelioma in this period are, in descending order: Clydebank, Barrow in Furness, Plymouth, Barking and Dagenham, Portsmouth, North Tyneside, South Tyneside, Southampton, Newham and Gillingham.

The average crude rate of death from mesothelioma in Great Britain in the same period was 11 per million. In 1994, the crude death rate from mesothelioma in Great Britain was 22 per million.

These tragic deaths are because of asbestos exposures of anything between 15 and 60 years ago, before the current stringent controls on asbestos were introduced.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what annual death rates from asbestos-related diseases the Health and Safety Executive has forecast over the next 25 years. [868]

Sir Paul Beresford: The estimated number of males dying annually from the asbestos-related cancer mesothelioma in 10 years time could range from between 1,300 and 2,100; in 20 years time between 1,300 and 3,000 and in 30 years time between 1,000 and 3,200. These estimates are based on a paper "The Continuing increase in mesothelioma mortality in Britain" which was published in The Lancet on 3 March 1995. This paper discusses the uncertainties attached to the projections which increase very significantly beyond about 2010. It is therefore inappropriate to forecast a figure for each separate year. Projected figures for females are not available.

Currently, there are estimated to be one or two deaths from asbestos-related lung cancer for each death from mesothelioma. The falling prevalence of smoking is likely to reduce this ratio in the future.

DEFENCE

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the changes to the class 1 cash limits and defence operating costs limit for 1996–97. [2375]

Mr. Soames: Subject to parliamentary approval of the winter supplementary estimates, the following changes will be made:

£000s

Class 1 vote	Current cash limit	Change	Revised cash limit
1	11,005,788	–10,891	10,994,897
2	4,662,170	25,000	4,687,170
3	5,761,870	288,000	6,049,870

The changes to class 1, votes 2 and 3 reflect the take up of entitlement to end-year flexibility. The reduction on class 1, vote 1 reflects the net effect of transfers to other Government Departments. In addition entitlement to end-year flexibility on class 1, vote 1 has, in accordance with Supply procedure, been funded through the partial appropriation of receipts from the sale of the MOD married quarters estate in England and Wales. The balance of the receipt from the sale will be brought to vote, subject to parliamentary approval, in the 1996–97 spring supplementary estimate.

The final outturn on the Ministry of Defence cash limit in 1995–96 was £21,522 million which was £48 million higher than the provisional outturn announced in Cmnd 3318. The Minister of Defence's entitlement to carry forward provision under the Defence operating costs and capital costs schemes has, therefore, been reduced by £48 million over the totals announced on 12 July, Official Report, columns 326–31. Thus all of the Ministry of Defence's entitlements to end-year flexibility arising the 1994–95 and 1995–96 will have been brought onto vote through the 1996–97 winter supplementary estimate. A total of £142 million of the additional provision on vote 3 in the winter supplementary estimate has been drawn down from provision eligible for carry forward under the Defence operating costs scheme.

The impact of these changes on the Ministry of Defence operating costs limit is as follows:

£000s

Class 1 vote	Current cash limit	Change	Revised cash limit
1	11,000,243	–10,891	10,989,352
2	4,662,170	25,000	4,687,170
3	806,347	—	806,347

Northern Ireland

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the cost of maintaining the British Army in Northern Ireland in each year since 1969. [1105]

Mr. Soames: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of the letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Gulf War (Illness)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of his Department's work in relation to illnesses among service men and women who served in the Gulf war. [865]

Mr. Soames: I will write to the right hon. Member and a copy of the letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

War Widows' Pensions

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will rescind the regulations reducing war widows' pensions because their husbands died of smoking-related causes; and if he will make a statement. [880]

Mr. Heald: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger) on 30 October, Official Report, column 162.

PRIME MINISTER

Cabinet Office (Cash Limits)

Mr. Key: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals there are to change the 1996–97 cash limit or running cost limit for the Cabinet Office: other services vote. [2433]

The Prime Minister: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit of the Cabinet Office: other services, class XVIII, vote 1, will be increased by £4,354,000 from £37,682,000 to £42,036,000 and the running cost limit will be increased by £2,567,000 from £40,586,000 to £43,153,000.

The increases reflect the transfer of provision of £645,000—running costs—and £1,457,000—capital—from the Office of the Public Service, class XVII, vote 1, to cover the cost of new repayment services; the transfer of certain administrative functions, the OPS's contribution to the cost of early staff departures and new IT systems and the increase of £70,000 in both running costs and receipts to account for staff loaned to Inland Revenue on repayment terms.

The increases also include the transfer of provision of £105,000—running costs—and £400,000—capital—from the reserve to fund new services and essential building works.

The vote is eligible for a cash limit increase of £1,788,000 in respect of end-year flexibility for running costs expenditure. The supplementary estimate will give effect to £1,738,000 of the increase.

All the increases are either offset by interdepartmental transfers or have been charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration (Philippines)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons born in the Philippines are estimated to reside in the United Kingdom; how many have the right of settlement; and which immigration laws permit (a) entry and (b) settlement. [1090]

Mr. Kirkhope: The labour force survey carried out in spring 1996 estimates that there are 29,000 persons born in the Philippines who are usually resident in the United Kingdom. Information on the number who may be eligible to apply for settlement is not available. Information on the number granted settlement each year between 1985 and 1995 is published in table 6.5 of the "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom 1995" (Cm 3353), a copy of which is in the Library. Entry into and settlement in the United Kingdom is governed by the Immigration Act 1971 and the immigration rules made under it.

Extradition

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of (a) requests made by United Kingdom authorities for the extradition of persons to the United Kingdom, (b) requests for extradition received from other countries for the extradition of persons out of the United Kingdom, and (c) individuals actually extradited to and from the United Kingdom for each year since 1992. [876]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Home Secretary is responsible for extraditions to and from England and Wales and from Northern Ireland. The information that follows relates to such cases.

(a) Number of requests made by United Kingdom authorities for the extradition of persons to England and Wales:

1992: 45

1993: 33

1994: 45

1995: 48.

(b) Number of requests for extradition received from other countries for the extradition of persons out of England, Wales and Northern Ireland:

1992: 78

1993: 100

1994: 100

1995: 101.

(c) (i) Number of individuals actually extradited to England and Wales:

1992: 25

1993: 21

1994: 29

1995: 14.

(ii) Number of individuals actually extradited from England, Wales and Northern Ireland:

1992: 36

1993: 27

1994: 35

1995: 31.

A number of extradition cases from 1994 and 1995 have not yet been resolved.

The figures refer to extradition to and from countries other than the Republic of Ireland. Extradition between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland takes place under the Backing of Warrants (Republic of Ireland) Act 1965 and the corresponding legislation of the Republic of Ireland. The Home Secretary is responsible where the case involves seeking the return of a fugitive who has been convicted by a court in England or Wales, while the Attorney-General is responsible where the case involves seeking the return of a person accused of an offence in England, Wales or Northern Ireland. I will write to the hon. Member with the statistics for such cases.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for changes to the 1996–97 cash limits within his responsibilities. [2374]

Mr. Howard: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the cash limit for class VII, vote 1—Home Office administration, police probation, immigration and other services, England and Wales—will be increased by £2,388,000 from £4,597,305,000 to £4,599,693,000 and for vote 2—prisons, England and Wales—will be increased by £120,646,000 from £1,521,670,000 to £1,642,316,000.

The increase for vote 1 is the net effect of transfers from the Ministry of Defence in respect of charging for meteorological services, from the Security Facilities Agency in respect for charging for its services, to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in respect of drug prevention; to the department for Education and Employment and Welsh Office in respect of sponsorship of probation students; to the Department of Health in respect of drugs challenge funding; from the Department for Education and Employment and Welsh Office in respect of provision of closed circuit television in schools; to the Department for National Heritage in respect of the transfer of responsibility for voluntary services; from the Prison Service in respect of boards of visitors' training and to non-cash limited police special grant within this vote in respect of pilot private finance initiative projects.

For vote 2 the increase is the net effect of additional provision of £120,650,000 from the reserve to meet the costs of the implementation of phase 2 of the recommendations of the Woodcock report and to increase the capacity of the Prison Service to meet the projected increase in the prison population, which includes the take-up of £750,000 end year flexibility towards the costs of Colchester young offenders institution; and the transfer of £4,000 to class VII, vote 1, Home Office, for external training of staff of the boards of visitors secretariat.

The non-voted cash limit—HO/LACAP—is reduced by £490,000 from £98,382,000 to £97,892,000 due to a transfer to non-cash limited police special grant within vote 1 in respect of pilot PFI projects.

In consequence of the changes the Home Office gross running cost limit will be increased by £12,334,000 from £1,801,481,000 to £1,813,815,000.

The increases will be offset by savings, transfers or charges to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Asylum Seekers

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people who had applied for asylum were deported from Scottish prisons during 1994, 1995 and from 1 January this year to date; and what were the nationalities of those deported; [1526]

(2) how many people who had applied for asylum were detained in Scottish prisons during 1994, 1995 and from 1 January this year to date; and what were the nationalities of those detained. [1525]

Mr. Kirkhope [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The specific information requested is not available.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the role of the Law Commission. [1663]

Mr. Streeter: The Law Commission has a single, central purpose: promoting the reform of the law, so that the law will be simpler, fairer, more modern and cheaper to use.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated outturn figure for the 1995–96 budget for the Law Commission. [1661]

Mr. Streeter: The estimated figure for the financial year 1995–96 is £2,960,537. This does not include charges for accommodation.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the number of permanent staff at the Law Commission; and how are they appointed. [1662]

Mr. Streeter: There are currently 39 permanent established staff working at the Law Commission and 19 established staff on short, fixed term appointments. This includes five parliamentary counsel assigned to the Law Commission from the parliamentary counsel's office.

All staff at the Law Commission are civil servants, recruited through open competition in accordance with the civil service commissioner's recruitment code.

Public Record Office

Mr. Gill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what changes he plans to make to the running costs limit of the Public Record Office, class VIII, vote 3 for 1996–97. [2373]

Mr. Streeter: The running cost limit has been reduced by £189,000 from £22,711,000 to £22,552,000, to reflect a transfer from running costs to capital. The capital expenditure will be defrayed on the fitting out of central London office premises, through which the office provides services to the public.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Terrorism

Miss Hoey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the Government's reasons for not providing compensation for victims of terrorism in England. [1342]

Mr. Nelson: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) on 27 June 1996, Official Report, column 202.

Miss Hoey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the cost of providing, in each of the three years before the commencement of the IRA ceasefire and in 1996 to date, compensation for losses caused by terrorism in England, Scotland and Wales on a similar basis to that provided in Northern Ireland. [1419]

Mr. Nelson: There is no justification for a compensation scheme because, unlike Northern Ireland, insurance cover is readily available elsewhere in the United Kingdom. No estimate of the cost of such a scheme has therefore been made.

Miss Hoey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the regulation of the premiums for terrorism insurance levied on people living or working in inner London. [1354]

Mr. Nelson: Individuals living or working in Inner London will normally be covered for any losses caused by acts of terrorism by their personal domestic household policies and/or comprehensive motor policies, as appropriate. Premiums are determined by normal competition between insurers.

Insurance policies for businesses or other non-personal policyholders will normally have a limit on the level of claims payable, unless the policyholder has bought full terrorism cover. Were insurance is provided by a member of the scheme established in accordance with the Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Act 1993, the additional terrorism premium is set by the Pool Reinsurance Company Ltd. in the light of advice of consultant actuaries and after consultation with my Department.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what changes will be made to cash and running cost limits within class IV of the estimates for 1996–97. [2431]

Mr. Lang: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV, vote 1—programmes and administration—will be increased by £13,930,000 from £1,301,655,000 to £1,315,585,000. This net increase results from:

(i) to take-up of running cost and capital end-year flexibility (£17,437,000) as announced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996 (Official Report, cols 326–331);

(ii) agreed changes to NIREX payments (£1,760,000);

(iii) an adjustment to the classification of Gas Consumer Council receipts from appropriations-in-aid to consolidated fund extra receipts (£2,894,000); and

(iv) other miscellaneous changes (£194,000);

offset by

(v) a net reduction to provision in respect of AEA Technology privatisation costs (–£3,855,000); and

(vi) the movement of provision from the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme to the non-cash limited Shipbuilding Intervention Fund (–£4,500,000).

Within this total, the gross running costs limit for the Department of Trade and Industry is being increased by £17,782,000 from £364,037,000 to £381,819,000. This change comprises:

(i) the take-up of running costs end-year flexibility (£15,654,000);

(ii) an adjustment in Insolvency Service fee income required for accounting purposes (£1,500,000);

(iii) the transfer of all Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service provision to running costs (£659,000); offset by other minor net transfers of provision (–£31,000).

A further increase to consolidated fund extra receipts of £215,000,000 is also expected following privatisation of AEA Technology.

The net effect of all the agreed changes to NIREX payments—including reductions to nationalised industries external financing limits of £2,990,000, which are not reflected in this vote—gives an overall benefit to the Exchequer of £1,230,000.

Also, subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV, vote 11—Office of Telecommunications—will be increased by £1,118,000 from £9,094,000 to £10,212,000 and the running cost limit will be increased by £1,059,000 from £8,677,000 to £9,736,000. The increase is required to meet new requirements, arising from European and UK legislation, to ensure that pro-competition policies are implemented and to meet additional litigation costs.

In addition, subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV, vote 12—Office of Gas Supply—will be increased by £2,000,000 from £7,743,000 to £9,743,000 and the running costs limit similarly increased from £8,452,000 to £10,452,000. The requirement results from additional running costs associated with the extension of domestic competition, further assessment of network code and the referral to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on price controls.

Additionally, subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV, vote 13—Office of Electricity Regulation—will be increased by £4,150,000 from £10,232,000 to £14,382,000 and the running costs limit by £4,100,000 from £10,694,000 to £14,794,000. These changes reflect the extra resources required by the Director General of Electricity Supply to fulfil his obligations under the Electricity Act 1989.

All such increases will be charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

School Security

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been allocated to each local education authority to (a) improve school security and (b) meet the recommendations of the Government working party on school security. [1493]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government have accepted all the recommendations of the working group on school security, including for provision of substantial additional funding to improve school security through the grants for education support and training—GEST—programme from 1997–98. The grant will be distributed according to the number of pupils and the number of schools in each authority. Local education authorities will be informed in December of their allocations for the coming financial year.

This new specific grant will be in addition to the funding already available to local education authorities generally for capital and current spending on schools. That will continue to allow for expenditure on school security.

Class Sizes

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will instruct Ofsted to open its data base derived from inspection of schools to accredited researchers, with particular reference to those investigating the effect of class size on the quality of education. [2322]

Mr. Robin Squire: No. This is a matter for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools. I know that he takes every opportunity to bring the information held by Ofsted into the public domain.

TREASURY

Taxation (File Access)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Inland Revenue's policy in respect of overseas computer access to British taxpayers' confidential files after the commencement of tax self-assessment. [959]

Mr. Jack: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) on 16 October, Official Report, columns 912–13.

Unemployment Statistics

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish, by region (a) the unemployment claimant count statistics and (b) the unemployment statistics as measured by the labour force survey, showing the percentage difference between the two in each case. [832]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Dennis Roberts to Mr. Ian McCartney, dated 1 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked the Director of the ONS to reply to your parliamentary question on regional unemployment. The Director has asked me to reply in his absence.

The latest LFS estimates of unemployment for the standard regions of Great Britain on the internationally standard ILO definition relate to Summer (June–August) 1996 and are published in Table 16 of the Labour Force Survey Summer 1996 First Release. The corresponding average levels of unadjusted claimant unemployment for the same three month period can be obtained on-line from the Nomis database. Both the LFS publication and access to the Nomis database are available from the House of Commons Library.

National Investment and Loans Office

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the cash and running costs limits for 1996–97 for the national investments and loans office. [2379]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XVI, vote 10 will be increased by a token amount to £341,000. Following a machinery of Government change in preparation for the privatisation of the Paymaster Agency, a small residuary body, to be known as the Office of HM Paymaster General—OPG—will remain in the public sector to perform the non-divestible functions. This token supplementary is required to allow for the transfer of OPG's functions from class XVI, vote II to NILO. The running costs limit will be increased by £104,000 to £1,366,000 with a corresponding reduction in the provision for class XVI, vote 11. The increase will be offset by savings or charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding the private finance initiative. [314]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 31 October 1996]: I have received many. I warmly welcome opportunities to talk to PFI practitioners in all sectors and to listen to their views on the initiative. As a result, we have made legislative and regulatory changes to facilitate the deal process. We have also published several sets of guidance, including case studies and standard terms of conditions of PFI contracts and we are working with the private sector to provide PFI training for officials. Most recently, we have responded in detail to recommendations put forward by the CBI, with whom we are working in partnership to push the PFI forward.

Income Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the additional annual full-year revenue which would be raised by the introduction of a 50 per cent. rate of income tax on earnings over £100,000 per annum; how many people would pay additional tax as a consequence; and what is the distribution of those persons by area of residence in the United Kingdom. [804]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Income tax rates are applied to taxable income—that is the total income for income tax purposes—including earnings—less those allowances and deductions which are allowable at marginal rates. The estimated full year yield at 1996–97 income levels of introducing a new rate of 50 per cent. on taxable incomes above £100,000 is £1.1 billion. The yield includes the consequential effects on the yield of capital gains tax after allowing for likely changes in the volume of disposals. It does not take account of any behavioural effects which might result from the introduction of the new rate of tax. About 120,000 taxpayers would be affected.

It is not possible to provide a reliable breakdown below United Kingdom level for 1996–97. The latest available information is for 1994–95.

Taxpayer Records

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if separate arrangements are made for the handling of secure cases with special reference to the files of hon. Members. [1079]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 30 October 1996]: Yes.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the security arrangements governing the handling of taxpayer records at Oracle facilities abroad. [1073]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 30 October 1996]: The handling of confidential taxpayer data is governed by the strictest possible security arrangements to safeguard against misuse. It would not be appropriate to make public the precise safeguards which are being put in place.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the batches of taxpayer records that may be available to staff at Oracle facilities abroad may include information about any matter relevant to tax in the case of any identifiable person. [1074]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 30 October 1996]: Diagnostic and remedial work undertaken to support the self assessment computer system may at times necessitate specialist staff—either in the UK or, exceptionally, or Oracle facilities abroad—having access to copies of batches of taxpayer records. Such data will not be in a readily intelligible form.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what percentage of schools in Northern Ireland have 1 per cent. or more of the school roll from a minority community. [970]

Mr. Ancram: Within Northern Ireland 328—26 per cent.—schools have 1 per cent. or more of the school roll from a minority community.

Terrorism

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his policy on Government claims or counter-claims against individuals in relation to damage and injury caused by those individuals as a result of their involvement in terrorist acts. [1204]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Compensation Agency under its chief executive, Mr Dennis Stanley. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D.A. Stanley to Mr. Robert McCartney, dated 31 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply, on behalf of the Compensation Agency, to your recent Question regarding policy on claims or counter-claims against individuals in relation to damage and injury caused by individuals as a result of their involvement in terrorist acts.

The Agency pays Compensation in Northern Ireland under either the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977 or the Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1988. The legislation directs that no compensation can be paid to any person who has been a member of an unlawful association at any time whatsoever, or is such a member, or who has been engaged in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism at any time whatsoever, or is so engaged. The only exception being that the Secretary of State may, if he considers it to be in the public interest to do so, pay such sum as does not exceed the amount of the disallowed compensation. This latter power is infrequently used and is exercised personally by the Minister of State on behalf of the Secretary of State.

In addition, the Agency has power under the legislation to pursue an offender for recovery of any compensation paid out by the Agency to a victim, irrespective of whether acts of terrorism were involved or not. Since being established in April 1992, the Agency has recovered £1.2 million from such offenders.

Education Department Headquarters

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the construction of a new headquarters for the Department of Education; what is the cost of the building; and what was the value for money of this project evaluated against other building priorities in education. [226]

Mr. Moss: The headquarters of the Department of Education in Bangor, County Down comprised a high rise building and a number of temporary annexes which were past their useful life. The new building at the headquarters site is a replacement of these temporary structures and the estimated cost is £3.657 million. This project was evaluated against other Government office priorities, but not against other building priorities in education.

Handguns

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many handguns are legally held in Northern Ireland; and if he will provide a geographical breakdown of their locations. [227]

Sir John Wheeler: At 30 September, 1996, the number of handguns held on firearm certificates in Northern Ireland was 12,872. Information on the geographical breakdown of their locations can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the difference in respect of guidelines relating to the legal possession of handguns in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) Great Britain. [228]

Sir John Wheeler: Under the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order, 1981, the Chief Constable is responsible for the administration of firearms licensing. His policy in relation to sporting handguns which was agreed with the Secretary of State is that a person cannot acquire a handgun unless he is able to show good reason for acquiring such a firearm and he has been a member of a registered firearms club for a minimum of 12 months; the application is supported by the secretary of the firearms club; and the police are content that he is a suitable person to hold such a weapon. In addition, the Chief Constable may approve the issue of a handgun where a person's life is believed to be under a serious and specific terrorist threat. In these circumstances the Chief Constable must satisfy himself that the individual is in all regards suitable to hold such a firearm and that his possession of the firearm does not pose a threat to the wider public safety.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has lead policy responsibility for firearms legislation in Great Britain.

Incorporated Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent provision he has made for accountancy services for incorporated colleges, broken down by (a) human and (b) technical support services, and what he estimates to be the cost of these services in this and the next financial year. [998]

Mr. Ancram: Additional provision of £510,000 has been made in the current financial year for use in strengthening their financial systems. No separate provision has yet been made for 1997–98.

The existing baseline also includes provision for the enhancement of colleges' financial management systems through improved computer hardware and financial accounting software. Estimated costs are as follows:-

	1996–97 £	1997–98 £
Capital	384,000	—
Recurrent	555,000	376,000

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the extra costs to his budget will be this year of funding the incorporation of the further education colleges; and if he will itemise that expenditure. [999]

Mr. Ancram: A budget of £1 million has been made available in the current financial year. It is estimated that this will be used as follows:

Strengthening college financial systems: £510,000

Project management and other college preparations: £395,000

Consultancy support, conferences, training and guidance for colleges: £95,000.

Nursery Vouchers

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what (a) decisions have been made and (b) procedures have been followed in respect of the appointment of a private company to fund the nursery voucher scheme; and what estimate he has made of the initial and annual costs of this administration. [1000]

Mr. Ancram: Following a competitive tendering process a contract to administer the nursery education voucher scheme on a UK-wide basis was awarded to Capita Management Services Ltd.

Legislation is currently being prepared to permit the extension of the nursery voucher scheme to Northern Ireland and the contract with Capita Management Services includes an opt-in clause for this purpose.

Consultation on the scheme in Northern Ireland ended on 7 June and I will make an announcement on the outcome later in the autumn. The cost of administering the scheme for Northern Ireland is estimated at a total of £300,000 over three years.

Integrated Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the likely capital costs of site acquisition and building integrated schools in the next three years. [1001]

Mr. Ancram: Expenditure on integrated schools likely to qualify for capital grant is estimated as follows:

	£ million
1997–1998	8.3
1998–1999	13.3
1999–2000	9.0
Total	30.6

SOCIAL SECURITY

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the average delay for each claimant of (a) invalidity benefit and (b) incapacity benefit for each year since 1990. [735]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

	Clearance time target	Performance achieved
1990–91 (SB/IVB)	average clearance time of 9 days	average clearance time of 9 days
1991–92 (SB/IVB)	average clearance time of 9 days	average clearance time of 7 days
1992–93 (SB/IVB)	65 per cent. in 10 days 95 per cent. in 30 days	77 per cent. in 30 days 95.1 per cent. in 10 days
1993–94 (SB/IVB)	65 per cent. in 10 days 95 per cent. in 30 days	72.5 per cent. in 10 days 94.3 per cent. in 30 days
1994–95 (SB/IVB)	65 per cent. in 10 days 95 per cent. in 30 days	77.4 per cent. in 10 days 95.7 per cent. in 30 days
1995–96 (IB)	65 per cent. in 10 days 85 per cent. in 30 days	78.9 per cent. in 10 days 96 per cent. in 30 days

Notes:
1. Figures are from successive Departmental and Benefits Agency Reports.
2. Up until 1992–93 the performance on the processing of claims was measured by the average time taken to clear claims. From 1992–93 the method of measuring performance changed to set percentages within 10 and 30 day targets.

Abbreviations:
SB = Sickness Benefit.
IVB = Invalidity Benefit.
IB = Incapacity Benefit.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many examinations for the all work test have (a) been carried out and (b) scheduled but not yet taken place during the year April 1995 to April 1996 for each of the regional medical centres. [419]

Mr. Burt: The administration of incapacity benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Alan Howarth, dated October 1996:

Appendix B provides details of the examinations scheduled, these include both All Work Tests and Own Occupation Tests as the tests are not recorded separately.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

State Pension

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the level of the basic state pension, (b) average weekly earnings and (c) the percentage of average weekly earnings represented by the basic state pension, for each year since 1966. [881]

Mr. Heald: I refer the hon. Member to tables 3.3 and 6.1 of the "Abstract of Statistics for Social Security Benefits and Contributions and Indices of Prices and Earnings", 1996 Edition; a copy of which is available in the Library.

Comparative information for the years 1966 to 1970 is not available because the new earnings survey did not begin until 1970.

Funeral Payments

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to review the provision of social fund funeral payments. [2550]

Mr. Roger Evans: Major changes were introduced in June 1995. I have been monitoring their effects. Expenditure has been significantly reduced from £63 million during 1994–95 to £49 million during 1995–96.

I now propose to develop the scheme further. From April 1997, help will be targeted more precisely on those most in need and the scheme will be made simpler. The proposed scheme will allow up to £600 for funeral expenses. The allowable items will no longer be specified leaving the person responsible for arranging the funeral free to decide which elements should be included. Certain disbursements— for example burial or cremation costs— will be paid in addition to the capped amount. Likewise, provision will be made where additional costs are likely to arise in exceptional circumstances, for example transportation costs for distances in excess of 50 miles. Under the proposed changes, both the person responsible for making the funeral arrangements and the funeral director will have a clearer understanding of the level of help available from the social fund.

In addition, a new test will help the adjudication officer to decide if it was reasonable for the person to have taken responsibility for the funeral expenses. In a case where there is no surviving partner, where a parent, son or daughter of the deceased exists, and neither they nor their partner are in receipt of a qualifying benefit it will be considered unreasonable for the person receiving the qualifying benefit to take responsibility for the funeral expenses.

Discussions have been taking place with funeral directors' associations at regular intervals and the proposed changes will be discussed with them shortly.

These proposals will be submitted to the Social Security Advisory Committee.

Departmental Estate (Transfer)

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on progress with the transfer of his Department's estate to the private sector. [2551]

Mr. Lilley: Three potential suppliers have been selected and will be invited to take part in the next stage of the project.

They are:

Partnership Property Management Ltd (previously named as Goldman Sachs International);

Mapeley Holdings Ltd (previously named as Nations Bank);

OPUS (previously named as Nomura International plc).

Each of the three consortia will be invited to submit a bid which details how they propose to meet the Department's requirements. The bids will be evaluated in early 1997 to identify the most suitable supplier.

Benefits Agency Medical Services

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases before the Benefits Agency Medical Services remain outstanding; and when he estimates his Department will have cleared any backlog. [729]

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Benefits Agency Medical Services is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Richard Burden, dated 31 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary question asking how many cases for Benefits Agency Medical Services remain outstanding; and when he estimates his Department will have cleared any backlog.

At 30 September 1996, Benefits Agency Medical Services have a total of 257,367 cases, of which 219,292 are Incapacity Benefit (IB) references. Of these, 9,522 are requiring specific medical advice from the customer service desk, 34,996 are for scrutiny to see if a medical examination is appropriate, a further 70,160 await an appointment and 104,614 have an appointment scheduled. Of the remaining 38,075 cases, 36,540 are Industrial Injuries, Prescribed Diseases and Respiratory Disease cases, 934 are Independent Tribunal Cases and 601 are cases referred from other Government Departments for medical advice. These figures are provisional and subject to change.

BAMS work to a target of clearing cases within 45 days. At the present time, cases are being cleared within 58 days. This gap has been closing in recent months, and is likely to continue to do so. This is because the number of clients in receipt of Invalidity Benefit who are awaiting consideration of the IB All Work Test continues to reduce. If present BAMS productivity holds up, then it is anticipated that the target of 45 days will be reached across the country by January 1997.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

New Claims Visits (Bolton)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which office is responsible for the new claims visits in the Bolton area; and what has been the performance record of that office. [127]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Peter Thurnham, dated 31 October 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking which office is responsible for the new claims visits in the Bolton area; and what has been the performance record of that office.

The office responsible for the New Claim Visits in the Bolton area is the Bolton District office which also covers the surrounding areas of Little Hulton, Kearsley and Horwich and includes a Branch office at Farnworth. The figures provided are for Bolton District.

Up to the 30 September 1996 the Bolton District had undertaken 1644 visits against a target for the year of 4350. As a result of these visits the office has achieved savings of £1,264,051.00. Their saving target for 1996/97 is £2,511,221.00. The figures are provisional and subject to change.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

"Civil Service Statistics 1996"

Mr. Faber: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when "Civil Service Statistics 1996" will be published. [2376]

Mr. Willetts: "Civil Service Statistics 1996" was published today and copies have been placed in the Library. This publication highlights key trends in civil service staffing for the period up to 1 April 1996. It shows that the number of permanent civil servants fell by 4.5 per cent. from 517,000 on 1 April 1995 to 494,000 on 1 April 1996.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proposals there are to change the 1996–97 cash limit or running costs limit for the Office of Public Service. [2377]

Mr. Freeman: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for the Office of Public Service—class XVII, vote 1—will be increased by £4,653,000 from £173,974,000 to £178,627,000 and the gross running cost limit will be increased by £8,548,000 from £74,101,000 to £82,649,000. The changes reflect the take up of running cost end-year flexibility— £8,775,000—and capital EYF—£645,000—under the end-year flexibility scheme announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326-31; and certain other transfers between Departments. Provision is also made for the privatisations of Her Majesty's Stationery Office, Recruitment and Assessment Services, the Occupational Health and Safety Agency, and the custody guards service. The increase in the cash limit will be met from the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the total of planned expenditure.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to change the cash limit of the Central Office of Information for 1996–97. [2378]

Mr. Freeman: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for the Central Office of Information class—XVII, vote 3—will be increased by £5,200,000 from £1,182,000 to £6,382,000. The change is to provide a subsidy to the COI trading fund to cover anticipated redundancy and other costs arising from the COI trading fund's exit from the provision of certain services, following the prior options review of COI.

HEALTH

Mr. Roy Hemming

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the additional annual cost to the NHS pension fund arising out of the payment of £50,000 to Mr. Roy Hemming of Doncaster Family Health Services Authority. [447]

Community Care (Staffordshire)

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost to Staffordshire county council of a community care place in a residential home run (a) by the county council and (b) by the private sector. [1051]

Mr. Burns: Staffordshire county council has told us that the net cost of a placement in one of its own homes is £198 and in the independent sector varies between £88 and £130. The reason for the cost differences includes the payment of residential allowance of £54, outside London rate, by the Department of Social Security which is made only to residents in the independent sector.

The gross cost of a placement in one of their own homes is £279 and for the three categories of placements in the independent sector are residential old age, £204, very dependent elderly, £236 and physical handicap elderly, £246.

NHS Number System

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the NHS number system identifying each patient individually will be operational. [1119]

Mr. Horam: The new national health service number system is being introduced through a phased programme across the NHS.

The NHS central register has created New NHS numbers for the whole population of England and Wales and these have been incorporated into health authority primary care patient registers.

New numbers are now being rolled out into general practitioner practice patient registers. At the end of September, this process had been completed in 65 per cent. of practices. By the end of 1996 full operational use of the new NHS number is scheduled in all breast screening office registers. The comparable date for cervical cytology, call and recall systems, diabetes screening systems and child health registers in mid 1997.

Mr. Dorrell: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XI vote 1—hospital, community health, family health and related services, England—will be increased by £125,517,000, from £27,682,304,000 to £27,807,821,000. This allows for increases of £124,373,000 in respect of the take up of the end year flexibility entitlement as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996 at columns 326–31; £1,758,000 for the drugs challenge fund made up of a claim on the reserve (£879,000) and by transfers from class VII, vote 1—Home Office administration, police, probation, immigration and other services, England and Wales—(£308,000, class IX, vote 1—Department of Education and Employment: programmes and central services—(£263,000) and class XI, vote 2—Department of Health administration, miscellaneous health and personal social services, England—(£308,000); and £65,000 from class XI, vote 2 for Mental Health Act Commission accommodation charges.

The overall increase is partially offset by transfers of £311,000 to class XIII, vote 4—hospital, community health, family health, other health services and welfare food, Scotland—for services provided by the former London postgraduate teaching hospitals (£292,000) and for GP fundholders cross boundary flows (£19,000); £185,000 to Department of Health and Social Services, Northern Ireland for supraregional services (£175,000) and services provided by the former London postgraduate teaching hospitals (£10,000); £111,000 to class XIV, vote 4—Hospital, community health, family health services and other health services (part), Wales—for services provided by the former London postgraduate teaching hospitals and £72,000 to class XI, vote 2—Department of Health administration, miscellaneous health and personal social services, England—in respect of a transfer of capital assets to the Public Health Laboratory Service.

This reduction allows for transfer of £373,000 (£65,000 running costs) to class XI, vote 1 as detailed above; £240,000 for publicity campaigns made up of transfers to class XIII, vote 4—Education, industry, arts and libraries, Scotland—(150,000), Department of Health and Social Services, Northern Ireland (£45,000), class XIV, vote 4—Hospital, community health, family health services and other health services (part), Wales—(£45,000); also a further transfer to class XIV, vote 4 of £234,000 to obtain advice and information about medical devices; £67,000 (running costs) to class XVI, vote 12—Office for National Statistics—for legal services and £15,000 (running costs) to class IV, vote 1—Departmental of Trade and Industry; programmes and administration—for Human Genetics Advisory Committee. The overall reduction is partially offset by a transfer of £72,000 from class XI, vote 1 as mentioned above.

The non-voted cash limit for supplementary credit approvals for personal social services—DoH/LACAP—in England is to be increased by £1,305,000 from £14,700,000 to £16,005,000 in respect of the take up of the end-year flexibility entitlement as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996 at columns 326–31.

The Department's gross running cost limit will be reduced by £147,000 from £280,204,000 to £280,057,000 as mentioned above.

All increases will either be offset by savings, increased receipts or transfers to or from other Votes or charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Health and Social Services

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent assessment his Department has made of the working relationships between health authorities and social services departments; if he will list examples of successful joint action in providing care in the community for people with special needs; what proposals he has for encouraging closer working together; and if he will make a statement. [1383]

Mr. Burns: Joint working between health and social services is a key feature of our community care monitoring. This shows that, although there are still improvements to make, there are many examples of good practice around the country covering groups of people with a range of needs. To assist authorities develop their collaborative working we published "Practical Guidance on Joint Commissioning" in 1995, copies of which are available in the Library. A development programme, which includes a series of locality workshop to encourage and enable authorities to develop their joint commissioning further, is taking this work forward.

[1619]

Mr. Horam: Notice of termination has not been given to CAMS Ltd. with respect to its contract with the Department of Health for the licensing and support of Read codes in the national health service.

The review commissioned by the NHS Executive from Silicon Bridge Research into these licensing and support arrangements has been completed and the report has been received. Its findings are being considered.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many applications have been received for the EU maternal and child health budget line, B7–5407, for 1997; from which agencies and non-governmental organisations; if he will indicate (a) how much funding each applicant is requesting and (b) which allocations have already been made; and if he will make a statement. [469]

Dr. Liam Fox: I have been asked to reply.

WALES

Cattle Cull

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received relating to problems faced by Welsh farmers in obtaining access to local slaughterhouses; and if he will make a statement. [456]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: We have received a number of representations from farmers. The Intervention Board has instructed abattoirs to source 50 per cent. clean cattle and 75 per cent. cull cows from markets, in line with historical patterns of marketing. From 4 November only registered animals will be slaughtered until the backlog is cleared; this will enable the Intervention Board to target those areas of Wales where there is greatest need.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency concerning the preparation of alternative scenarios for 1997–98 funding; if he will give the percentage reductions relative to preferred budget estimates which he has requested the agency to prepare; and what estimates the agency has given of the impact of those alternative budget strategies on its level of operations in 1997–98 and 1998–99. [1963]

Mr. Hague: My 1966 strategic guidance letter asked the agency to prepare a corporate plan based on 80, 100 and 120 per cent. of the 1996–97 baseline expenditure of £126.8 million. The agency prepared its plan on this basis and included other funding options. I met the chairman and the board on 2 October to discuss the plan.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency in relation to the recent agency appointment of a part-time business adviser in Japan to help expand market opportunities for Welsh small and medium-sized enterprises. [1959]

Mr. Hague: None. This is entirely an operational matter for the Welsh Development Agency.

Beef Export Ban

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to secure early relaxation of the beef export ban from grass-fed specialist Welsh beef herds with full passporting; and if he will make a statement. [1961]

Mr. Hague: The United Kingdom will continue to work within the Florence framework for progressive lifting of the export ban. As the next step we are exploring the scope for exports under a certified herd scheme, such as the beef assurance scheme or a variant of it.

South-East Wales Ambulance Trust

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has received a copy of the district auditor's reports into the accounts of the South-East Wales Ambulance trust; what consultations he has had with the chairman of the trust concerning reference to the relevant constabularies; and if he will make a statement. [1962]

Mr. Hague: I have had no discussions with the chairman but my officials have seen the reports in draft. I understand that they will be presented to the board of the trust on 4 November. Any follow up action on specific points is a matter for the trust.

University Hospital of Wales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the university hospital of Wales in relation to the provision of private finance initiative capital for the modernisation of sterile supplies at the university hospital of Wales site in Cardiff. [1960]

Mr. Hague: None. The scheme falls within the trusts delegated limits and will be for the trust board to take forward.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes he is proposing to make to the cash limits for his Department and the office of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools in Wales in 1996–97. [2430]

Mr. Hague: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the cash limit on class XIV, vote 1 will be reduced by £3,500,000 from £25,655,000 to £22,155,000; the cash limit on class XIV, vote 2 will be increased by £14,906,000 from £689,272,000 to £704,178,000; the cash limit on class XIV, vote 3 will be increased by £5,961,000 from £518,909,000 to £524,870,000; the cash limit on class XIV, vote 4 will be increased by £30,390,000 from £1,879,735,000 to £1,910,125,000; the cash limit on class XIV, vote 5 has been decreased by £150,000 from £2,305,358,000 to £2,305,208,000.

The Department's running costs limit will be increased by £2,511,000 from £72,667,000 to £75,178,000. The running costs limit for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools in Wales will be increased by £157,000 from £3,150,000 to £3,307,000.

The local authority capital cash limit, WO/LACAP, has been increased by £4,473,000 from £513,733,000 to £518,206,000.

The cash limit decrease in vote 1 results mainly from lower-than-expected claims for agri-environmental and farm conservation schemes.

The cash limit increase in vote 2 results mainly from a net increase in grant in aid to the Welsh Development Agency of £25,313,000—including the transfer of urban investment grant—and the take-up of end-year flexibility entitlement, partly offset by reductions elsewhere in the vote and a transfer of £3,500,000 to class XIV, vote 3.

The net cash limit increase on vote 3 results mainly from an increase in the grant in aid for Cardiff Bay development corporation of £7,599,000, the transfer of £3,882,000 of urban investment grant to the Welsh Development Agency in class XIV, vote 2, and the take-up of end-year flexibility of £1,177,000. The increase in the running costs limit includes extra provision to cover the estimated costs of the north Wales child abuse inquiry and BSE.

The increase in the cash limit for vote 4 results from the take-up of end-year flexibility entitlement of £30,000,000 and transfers from class XI totalling £390,000.

The cash limit decrease on vote 5 results from lower than expected expenditure by the Valuation Office Agency.

The increase in the local authority cash limit, WO/LACAP, results from the take-up of end-year flexibility entitlement.

None of the proposed changes will add to the planned total of public expenditure.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Homes

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list for each year from 1989–90 to 1995–96 for each district and islands council area the total number of starts of (a) new build and (b) rehabilitation by housing associations for rent within Scottish Homes approved for development programme; [1615]

(2) if he will list for each year from 1989–90 to 1995–96 for each district and islands council area the total number of completions of (a) new build and (b) rehabilitation by housing associations for rent within Scottish Homes approved development programme. [1618]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The information requested is held by Scottish Homes. I have asked its chairman, Mr. John Ward, to write to the hon. Member.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes he intends to make to the cash limits and running costs provision for 1996–97 within his responsibility. [2553]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, I intend to make changes to nine voted cash limits, three non-voted cash blocks and nine running cost limits:

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 1—agriculture, fisheries and environmental services, Scotland—will be increased by a total of £5,184,000 from £359,091,000 to £364,275,000. Provision for running costs on this vote will be increased by £482,000 from £16,553,000 to £17,035,000. The changes include take-up of end-year flexibility entitlement for capital of £2,085,000 as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report columns 326–31, in respect of the new fisheries research vessel, take up of end-year flexibility for the running costs for the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency of £330,000 and for the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency of £152,000; and increase in fisheries grants of £1,126,000; a transfer from class XIII, vote 3 of £1,349,000 for rural partneriship fund; and a transfer from class VI, vote 3 of £142,000 for local authorities' costs associated with air quality duties.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 2—local government, housing, transport, other environmental services and European funds, Scotland—will be increased by a net total of £33,423,000 from £5,568,583,000 to £5,602,006,000. The net increase reflects a claim on the reserve of £15,058,000 in respect of the AEF guarantee scheme, an increase in Scottish Homes grant-in-aid of £14,528,000 met by a transfer of provision from SO/LA2; a reduction in Scottish new towns of £422,000; and a net increase of £1,972,000 for Historic Scotland—covering an increase in gross running cost provision of £1,607,000 from £13,609,000 to £15,216,000 reflecting the take-up of end-year flexibility entitlements, £1,143,000 capital and £691,000 running costs; a transfer from class XIII, vote 6 of £138,000 for running costs, further increases in provision of £778,000 for running costs, £1,322,000 for current expenditure and £1,487,000 for capital expenditure are offset fully by increased appropriations in aid—additional provision of £1,000,000 will be made available to Highlands and Islands Airports Limited to fund its assuming responsibility for operations at RAF Machrihanish and will be met by a transfer of provision from the Ministry of Defence; additional provision of £800,000 in revenue deficit grant to Caledonian MacBrayne Ltd. will be met by a corresponding reduction in grant for capital investment; and the take up of end year flexibility for the roads and transport programme of £1,287,000.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 3, education, industry, arts and libraries, Scotland, will be increased by £17,414,000 from £1,596,530,000 to £1,613,944,000. The increased cash limit takes account of £16,146,000 in respect of end year flexibility arrangements for capital expenditure relating to the National Museums of Scotland, the Scottish Office Pensions Agency and regional selective assistance. The increase also includes £334,000 in respect of end year flexibility arrangements for running costs expenditure relating to the Student Awards Agency for Scotland and the Scottish Office Pensions Agency. The changes include transfers from class XIII, vote 6 totalling £255,000 in respect of both agencies. The changes also reflect an increase in provision of £2,028,000 in respect of Scottish Enterprise, which has been offset by a corresponding reduction in SO/LA2, and a reduction of £1,349,000 which is transferred to class XIII, vote 1 in respect of rural parterships fund. Provision for pre-five education has been increased by £850,000 offset by a corresponding amount in appropriations in aid. Running cost provision increases by £579,000 from £7,736,000 to £8,315,000.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 4, hospital, community health, family health, other health services and welfare food, Scotland, will be increased by a net total of £59,538,000 from £3,476,975,000 to £3,536,513,000. The increase includes £66,264,000 reflecting the take up of end year flexibility; a transfer of £292,000 from class XI, vote 1 for services previously funded directly by Department of Health; a transfer of £19,000 from class XI, vote 1 for GP fundholding cross border flows; a transfer of £150,000 from class XI, vote 2 for HIV/AIDS prevention campaigns; a transfer of £140,000 from class XIII, vote 6 following the transfer of responsibility for the regional dental service to the Common Services Agency, a transfer of £541,000 to class XIII, vote 3 for placement allowances and travel expenses for student nurses; and a transfer of £283,000 to class XIII, vote 6 for increased accommodation and IT costs for the Mental Welfare Commission. In addition there is an increase of £100,000 for the setting up of the Scottish drugs challenge fund and some adjustments to reflect changes to anticipated appropriations-in-aid. The NHS trusts' external financing limit has also been increased by £7,117,000 from £41,723,000 to £48,840,000.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 5 will be increased by £7,529,000 from £624,399,000 to £631,928,000 and the running costs provision will be increased by £4,635,000 from £141,669,000 to £146,304,000. The cash limit increase is the net effect of the take up of EYF entitlement of £1,700,000 under the capital scheme and £5,435,000 under running costs and £1,494,000 under the HPSS scheme, offset by transfers of £800,000 to class XIII, vote 9 in respect of the running costs of the Dunblane inquiry and £300,000 to SO/LA1 in respect of additional capital allocations for Grampian Joint Police board. The increases will be offset by forecast underspends on criminal injuries compensation within the existing vote total.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 6—Scottish Office administration—is being increased by £7,050,000 from £160,928,000 to £167,978,000. Within this total, the running cost provision for Scottish Office Administration is being increased by £6,180,000 from £146,120,000 to £152,300,000 as a result of the take-up of end-year flexibility predominantly to fund staff early departure costs and inter-vote transfers. The capital provision is also being increased as a result of the take-up of end-year flexibility and inter-vote transfers. The additional capital provision is to cover expenditure on IT associated with the Department's response to BSE and also procurement of a computer system by the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 7, General Register Office for Scotland, is being increased by £93,000 from £5,186,000 to £5,279,000. This increase relates entirely to the capital provision for GRO(S), and results from the take-up of end-year flexibility to cover additional costs of the refurbishment of New Register house.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 8, Scottish Record Office, is being increased by £1,359,000 from £5,006,000 to £6,365,000. Within this total, the SRO running costs limit is being increased by £752,000 from £4,563,000 to £5,315,000 as a result of the take-up of end-year flexibility to cover additional expenditure on computer anti-virus measures, building repairs and the cleaning of records and record storerooms and also potential litigation costs. The increase in capital provision results from the take-up of end-year flexibility to cover cots of refurbishment work at General Register house.

The cash limit element for class XIII, vote 9,—administration of justice, Scotland—will be increased by an overall figure of £1,875,000 from £47,366,000 to £49,241,000. This reflects an increase in gross running cost limit of £1,400,000 to £42,144,000. Of that, £600,000 will be met by the take-up of end-year flexibility for expenditure on essential maintenance of court buildings and £800,000 will be transferred from class XIII, vote 5,—law, order and protective services, police grant and social work services, Scotland—to meet the costs of setting up and running the Dunblane public inquiry. Capital provision will be increased by £475,000 to £20,975,000 reflecting the take-up of end-year flexibility for expenditure on essential work on court buildings to bring them up to current health and safety regulations standard.

The overall running costs limit for the Scottish Office, together with its Agencies and Associated Departments, is being increased by £15,624,000 from £377,775,000 to £393,399,000. This results from the take-up of end-year flexibility, increased provision for Historic Scotland being covered by increased income, and a transfer from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of work being transferred from their Tory laboratory to Scottish Office fisheries research services.

The non-voted cash limit SO/LA1, which covers non-housing capital expenditure by local authorities, is to be increased by £15,300,000 from £426,620,000 to £441,920,000, reflecting part take-up of end-year flexibility amounting to £15,000,000 and an increase of £300,000 transferred from class XIII, vote 5.

The non-voted cash limit SO/LA2 which covers housing capital expenditure by local authorities and capital expenditure by new towns will be decreased by a net total of £4,815,000 from £111,210,000 to £106,395,000. The decrease reflects a transfer of provision to Scottish Homes of £14,528,000 and Scottish Enterprise of £2,028,000 for which complementary increases are included in the winter supplementary estimates for class XIII, vote 2 and class XIII, vote 3 respectively and the take-up of end year flexibility of £11,741,000.

The non-voted cash limit SO/ERDF which covers European regional development fund payments in Scotland will be increased by £32,105,000 from £97,079,000 to £129,184,000 reflecting the take-up of end year flexibility.

The increases will be offset by savings or charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cattle Slaughter

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ensure that a twin-bladed saw is used to remove the spinal column from all cattle carcases destined for human or animal consumption. [234]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A prototype twin-bladed saw is still under development and evaluation. A number of technical and practical issues have yet to be overcome. Not until these have been successfully resolved will we be in a position to consider the circumstances in which such equipment might be used.

Agriculture Council

Mr. French: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Luxembourg on 28 and 29 October; and if he will make a statement. [1836]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council in Luxembourg, accompanied by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Scottish Office, my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Northern Ireland Office and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Welsh Office. Agreement was reached by qualified majority, Germany voting against—on a package of measures to re-adjust the EU beef market in the wake of the BSE crisis.

The Council invited the Commission to allocate a total sum of 500 million ECU to EU beef farmers whose incomes have fallen as a result of problems on the beef market. The United Kingdom's share of this sum, which is proportionate to our share of the total number of beef cattle in the EU, will be 13.1 per cent. This will provide some £50 million as further help to UK beef producers. The precise method of allocation of the funds will be decided in the light of further consideration in the Council and consultation with the UK farming unions on the preferred approach.

The Council agreement also made some important changes to the operation of the EU beef regime so as to bring production more closely into line with present and foreseeable demand. In particular the calf processing scheme, which has operated in the United Kingdom since April this year, is to be extended to include male calves of all breeds, not just dairy breeds as at present. This scheme, coupled with a scheme to pay an early marketing premium for calves sold as veal, is intended to reduce the number of calves going for beef production by some 1 million animals and hence limit the need for costly market management measures such as intervention purchasing. The Council also decided to cut the regional ceilings for payment of beef special premium in most member states in order more closely to align production with demand. However I successfully resisted any cut in the United Kingdom's regional ceiling in view of the fact that in the United Kingdom applications for this premium have regularly exceeded the ceilings fixed.

Amongst other features of the Council's agreement was a welcome boost for extensive beef production in the form of a new premium of 52 ecu per head for producers with a stocking density of less than one livestock unit per hectare. I estimate that this could be worth as much as £15 million to UK producers. The Council also agreed to a raising of the ceiling on intervention purchases in 1966 and 1997. Following pressure from the United Kingdom and other member states, the Council also committed itself to a more fundamental reform of the EU beef regime to be completed in the course of 1997.

As to the funding of this package of measures, there will be no immediate cut in arable area payments. However the Council made clear its intention to postpone payments of oilseed advances in 1997 in order to allow beef market-related costs to be met in the course of this budget year without breaching the agricultural guideline. Moreover, in respect of additional costs falling in 1998, the Council agreement stated explicitly that all necessary measures would be taken to ensure that expenditure on agriculture in that year remains within guideline. These assurances were important for the United Kingdom in view of the paramount need to observe budgetary discipline.

The Council also had a presentation by the Commission of a proposal to introduce an EU-wide system of cattle traceability, with a linked proposal on the labelling and promotion of beef products. The United Kingdom attaches importance to reaching an early agreement on the cattle traceability proposal, and will work constructively to achieve that end. I also raised in the Council the need for rapid implementation of the Council directives on the protection of animals in transport, in particular requesting the Commission to bring forward urgently its proposals for Council decisions on staging points and livestock vehicle standards. I also pressed for the rapid discussion and implementation of the rules governing producer organisations in the fruit and vegetable sector in the wake of the reform of the regime earlier this year.

Cattle Cull

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many (a) abattoirs and (b) incinerators are designated for use for casualty animals under the 30-month scheme; [1455]

(2) how many (a) markets, (b) abattoirs and (c) incinerators are designated as collection centres under the 30-month scheme. [1454]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 31 October 1996:]: There are (a) 61 abattoirs (b) 200 markets and (c) 13 incineration plants designated as collection centres under the over 30-month scheme.

All the abattoirs and incineration plants, together with one additional incinerator, are also designated to take casualty animals under the scheme.

Animal Passports

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food from what date animal passports have been mandatory for all United Kingdom cattle. [1459]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Passports have been mandatory for all cattle born or imported into Great Britain on or after 1 July 1996. Passports are not required in Northern Ireland because a movement permit system operates there.

BSE

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many feed mills have (a) had samples tested and (b) had samples that were found to be in breach of BSE controls in each month of 1996; [1458]

(2) what was (a) the number of samples and (b) the number of unsatisfactory samples taken from feed mills and tested for breach of BSE controls in each month of 1996. [1457]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The table sets out the results of the current programme of feed sampling visits, which began in February, up to September—the last full month for which data are available. The premises visited include feed mills, farms using on-farm feed mixers and any site where feed, or ingredients for feed, are produced or stored. Unfortunately we are not able to isolate data for feed mills.

ELISA—the laboratory test used—indicates the presence of mammalian protein in samples. The feeding of mammalian protein to non-ruminant animals, such as pigs and poultry, in forms other than meat and bone meal is still allowed. Samples which test positive or inconclusive for mammalian protein do not therefore necessarily indicate a breach of the legislation.

Every positive or inconclusive test result is investigated by the State Veterinary Service. Enforcement action is a matter for local authorities. The SVS liaises closely with the relevant enforcement authority whenever a possible contravention of the legislation comes to light. It would be for the relevant local authority to consider legal action where sufficient evidence of an offence is available.

Updates on the results of the feed sampling programme are published monthly in the "BSE Enforcement Bulletin", copies of which are placed in the House Library. The bulletin will also publish details of any prosecutions taken by local authorities and notified to us.

The figures shown are subject to adjustment as test results from the laboratory are updated.

Month 1996	Total visits	Total samples taken	Test Results
			Positive	Negative	Inconclusive
February	206	426	4	422	0
March	225	502	1	498	3
April	333	687	4	682	1
May	415	732	5	725	2
June	338	673	8	664	1
July	337	628	10	614	4
August	341	644	2	640	2
September	155	298	3	295	0
Total	2,350	4,590	37	4,540	13

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was (a) the number of visits and (b) the number of unsatisfactory visits to (i) slaughterhouses, (ii) hunt kennels and knackeries, (iii) rendering plants and (iv) incinerators made by the state veterinary service in each month since June 1996. [1456]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 31 October 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary gave to the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 24 July 1996 at column 625.

The information requested on surveillance visits made by the state veterinary service to monitor compliance with the controls on specified bovine materials is published monthly in the "BSE Enforcement Bulletin". Copies of this document are placed in the Libraries of both Houses. I am arranging for the hon. Member to be sent a personal copy of the third issue of the bulletin which has just been published.

TRANSPORT

Ticketing

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set up an impartial information and advice service to provide guidance to the public about ticket prices and through ticketing availability; and if he will make a statement. [1756]

Mr. Watts: Impartial advice on ticketing is already a requirement of the licences issued to train operators by the independent rail regulator. The regulator has all the powers he needs to ensure that train operators comply with their licence obligations.

Passenger Travel Statistics

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many public transport passenger miles were travelled in each year since 1990; and if he will make a statement. [1861]

Mr. Watts: The following table summarises the available figures:

Billion passenger kilometres

Year	Buses and coaches[1]	Rail[2]	Air[3]	All public transport[4]
1990	46	40	5	91
1991	44	38	5	87
1992	43	38	5	86
1993	43	37	5	85
1994	43	35	5	83
1995	43	37	6	86

[1] For buses and coaches, changes are estimated by deflating passenger receipts by the most appropriate price indices available. This method can only give a broad guide to trends.
[2] Rail data given for financial years. Comprises British Rail, former British Rail companies and urban rail systems.
[3] Revenue passenger kilometres on scheduled and non-scheduled services. Includes Northern Ireland and Channel Islands. Excludes air taxi services, private flying and passengers paying less than 25 per cent. of the full fare on scheduled and non-scheduled services.
[4] Excludes travel by taxi, for which figures are not readily available.

Exhaust Emissions

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned regarding the device being developed by Dyson for removing particulates from the exhaust emissions of diesel engines; and if he will make a statement. [1837]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of incursions into restricted zones at (a) the international channel tunnel rail terminal and (b) the tunnel site since the sites became operational. [1509]

Mr. Watts: At Waterloo international terminal there have been 27 incursions, including illegal immigrants, into the restricted zones. At Ashford international terminal there have been a further two incursions. At the tunnel site there have been four incursions into the restricted zones; two at the Cheriton site and two at Dollands Moor. In all cases the incursions were identified promptly and dealt with appropriately.

Drivers' Hours

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to promote legislation which will allow drive hours records to be handed over to vehicle inspectorate staff. [1504]

Mr. Bowis: The Government will consider what further clarification of the powers of inspectors to inspect and remove tachograph charts is necessary and, if appropriate will propose amending legislation in due course.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what factors underlay his Department's decision not to reduce the maximum number of drivers' hours; and what research his Department evaluated in this area. [1506]

Mr. Bowis: In the absence of any research evidence to suggest that the existing European Union limits on maximum driving time and minimum rest requirements are in themselves a cause of accidents, the Government have no reason to doubt that the existing drivers' hours rules strike a reasonable balance between road safety and operational flexibility.

Domestic Drivers

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects his Department to make an announcement on the abolition of domestic drivers' hours rules. [1503]

Mr. Bowis: It is too soon to say.

Bridges

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many bridges have been identified as unable to bear 40 tonne vehicles, to date. [1447]

Mr. Watts: Of those that have been assessed, there are three bridges supporting trunk roads in England which are unable to carry 40 tonne vehicles at the present time. These are:

M1 Junction 2 slip road viaduct in north London;
A13 Movers Lane flyover in east London; and A40 Golden Valley flyover in Gloucestershire.

Improvements are planned in each case.

A number of bridges carrying local roads are also unable to bear 40 tonne vehicles. It is for the local highways authority concerned to decide whether improvements are required.

Transec

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those train operating companies inspected by Transec to ensure compliance with security standards and regulations; [1510]

(2) if he will list the number of covert inspections undertaken by Transec on each mainline London railway station for each of the last three years. [1507]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack oversees the security system for the national railway network, with the close involvement of the British Transport police. This system is mandatory on all train operating companies through their operating licences. Transec has not so far carried out any security inspections of train operating companies or of Railtrack.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the last three years the number of covert inspections undertaken by Transec staff on (a) the Port of Dover and (b) the channel tunnel. [1434]

Mr. Watts: Most inspections are unannounced but cannot in their nature be covert. All tests are covert. Transec staff also observe operations on other occasions, including when they are undertaking security audits.

The number of tests and inspections carried out on port operations at Dover, excluding tests and inspections of shipping companies using the port, were:

1993–94: 10

1994–95: 15

1995–96: 11.

The number of tests and inspections in relation to all channel tunnel services were:

1993–94: None

1994–95: 126

1995–96: 293.

Rail Privatisation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amounts paid to contractors involved in rail privatisation in success fees, indicating the contractors to whom the fees were paid. [1516]

Mr. Watts: Neither the Department of Transport nor the Office of the Rail Regulator has paid any success fees to contractors involved in rail privatisation. The Office of Passenger Rail Franchising has paid a total of £2.25 million to HSBC Samuel Montagu and Kleinwort Benson Ltd. in connection with letting passenger rail franchises.

Rail Fares Database

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if staff at the national train inquiry bureau access to a computer database of national rail fares. [1520]

Mr. Watts: All staff working in rail telephone inquiry bureaux have access to the "National Railway Fares Manual", prepared by Rail Settlement Plan Ltd. which lists the fares charged by train operators. The majority of telephone inquiry bureau staff have access to this information through on-line computer systems.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to change his Department's cash limits and running cost limits for 1996–97. [2434]

Sir George Young: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the following changes will be made:

(i) the cash for class V vote 1—Highways Agency—will be increased by £21,113,000 from £1,641,172,000 to £1,662,285,000. The increase in the cash limit includes the take up £21,064,000 capital end year flexibility entitlement and £4,000,000 running costs end year flexibility entitlement as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report columns 326–31, offset by adjustments in running costs funding between this vote and class V vote 2, relating to the consolidation of the Highways Agency's role. Running costs provision for this vote increases by $4,468,000 from £71,516,000 to £75,984,000.

(ii) the cash limit for class V vote 2—Administration and Transport Services—will be increased by £25,869,000 from £129,008,000 to £154,877,000. The increase in the cash limit includes the take up £2,000,000 capital end year flexibility entitlement from vote 2; £2,000,000 capital end year flexibility entitlement from class V vote 4 and £4,997,000 capital end year flexibility entitlement from class V vote 5; and £15,834,000 running costs entitlement as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report columns 326–31; the transfers of funds to class V vote 1 for restructuring and streamlining in the Highways Agency and relocation of some of the agency's research and development work to the central transport group; transfers of funds between this vote and class V vote 5 for new London road studies and an emerging shortfall in receipts; transfer of funds to class V vote 6 for network services; the transfer of some census and survey work to the Office of National Statistics; and transfers relating to accommodation changes and security responsibilities from the Office of Public Service and the Security Facilities Executive agency. Running costs provision for this vote increases by £15,302,000 from £92,685,000 to £107,987,000.

(iii) the cash limit on class V vote 5 will be increased by £2,458,000 from £389,580,000 to £392,038,000. The increase in the cash limit includes the take up of £2,470,000 capital end-year flexibility—EYF—entitlement, as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report columns 326–31, offset by intervote transfers between this vote and class V vote 2 and class XVI vote 12 of the Office of National Statistics and internal transfers to allow payment of £1,458,000 for audit adjustments to metropolitan railway grant 1995–96 outturn.

(iv) the cash limit on class V vote 6 will be increased by £4,701,000 from £81,364,000 to £86,065,000. The increase is accounted for by a transfer of provision from the Ministry of Defence for payments to the Meteorological Office trading fund and a transfer for network services from class V vote 2. Running costs provision for this vote increases by £75,000 from £38,766,000 to £38,841,000.

(v) the Department of Transport local authority capital cash limit will be increased by £4,530,000 from £308,114,000 to £312,644,000. This partially take up the capital end-year flexibility entitlement as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31.

(vi) the Department of Transport gross running costs limit will be increased by £19,845,000 from £376,078,000 to £395,923,000 as a consequence of the above changes, mainly for voluntary early retirements.

(vii) in addition the cash limit on class V vote 7—passenger rail services—will be increased by £137,000,000 from £1,650,668,000 to £1,787,688,000. The additional provision is required under British Rail's budget for the provision of passenger rail services in 1996–97.

The overall increases will be offset by transfers or charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

M20 Widening (Sandling)

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if all the outstanding accounts for the widening of the

M20 on the stretch at Sandling have now been settled; what was the final outturn; and what was the original estimate. [1910]

Mr. Watts: All the outstanding accounts have not yet been settled so the final outturn is not yet known. The original estimate at November 87 prices was £70 million—"Trunk Roads into the 1990s".

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions concerning environmental issues and sustainability have taken place at the EU intergovernmental conference. [1205]

Mr. David Davis: Environmental issues have been discussed on a number of occasions in the intergovernmental conference, most recently in the personal representatives working party on 29 October. A number of member states have put forward proposals in this area and the presidency has circulated negotiating papers. These have been deposited in the Library of the House.

Thailand

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts are made by British embassy and consular officials to investigate disappearances and deaths of British citizens in Thailand. [1207]

Dr. Liam Fox: We expect the Thai authorities to investigate fully the disappearance or death of British citizens. We take every opportunity to press them for results. We also carry out a search of our own records and check with immigration authorities, police, hospitals and morgues.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many reports have been received by the British embassy in Thailand of British citizens (a) going missing and (b) alleged to have committed suicide over the past five years. [1206]

Dr. Fox: Since 1991 our embassy in Bangkok has received over 215 missing persons inquiries. Nine suspected suicides were reported over that period.

Hungary and Romania (Treaty)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the treaty on understanding, co-operation and good neighbourhood signed on 16 September by Hungary and Romania, with particular reference to the implications for other European states of (a) the mutual recognition of territorial integrity and (b) the prohibition on territorial claims contained in article 4 of that treaty. [1162]

Dr. Liam Fox: We welcome the treaty of Understanding, co-operation and good neighbourliness between Hungary and Romania as a notable achievement which will contribute to good relations between the two countries. The treaty does not create rights of duties for other European states and is a matter for the two contracting parties alone.

Bosnia

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much money the Government contributed to the OSCE elections fund for the Bosnian elections; for what purposes; and if he will make a statement on the criteria governing the use of public money in such situations. [1190]

Mr. David Davis: Her Majesty's Government contributed £3 million to the OSCE elections fund for the Bosnian elections. We specified that this money should be used to provide ballot papers and other election materials. Elections were a key step in the Dayton peace process which Her Majesty's Government supports. They were essential to give Bosnia democratically elected leaders and joint institutions. These are the foundation for an integrated peaceful Bosnia.

Tony Bradbury

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received about the situation of Tony Bradbury, currently held in prison in Israel following an industrial accident; and if he will make a statement. [1192]

Dr Liam Fox: Mr. Bradbury is not in prison. He was remanded on bail on his own surety and cannot leave Israel. He has been charged with causing death by negligence. The date for his trial has been set for 13 January 1997.

British Embassy, Moscow

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the contract to build the new British embassy in Moscow and on the future of the present building. [1210]

Mr. Hanley: The contract to build new embassy offices, staff accommodation, amenities and ancillaries has been awarded to Taylor Woodrow in joint venture with the Finnish firm, Skanska. Construction will start this month and is scheduled to take 30 months. The value of the contract is about £60 million. The buildings will be a major improvement on the present cramped and unsatisfactory working and living conditions and totally inadequate visa-issuing facilities.

The lease on the present premises, which includes the ambassador's residence, was renewed for 99 years in 1993. The residence will be retained and the vacated offices will be converted into further residential accommodation for embassy staff.

EU (Common Policies)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provisions based on majority voting govern the development of common policies by a group of EU countries in new areas using the services of existing European institutions. [1667]

Mr. David Davis: There are no general provisions of this kind. However, the social protocol annexed to the EC treaty allows the other 14 member states to use the existing institutions to pursue social policy measures in accordance with the agreement annexed to that protocol. In addition article 130K of the EC treaty allows a group of less than the 15 member states to participate in supplementary programmes under the research and development multiannual framework programme.

The broader issue of flexibility is currently under discussion at the intergovernmental conference. The UK has made clear that access by a group of EU countries to European Community institutions and mechanisms including the budget could only be considered where this was agreed by all.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further changes he proposes to make in his Department's diplomatic wing cash limits and running costs limits for 1996–97. [2429]

Mr. Hanley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates the following changes will be made.

The cash limit for class II, vote 1—Overseas Representation—will be increased by £8,349,000 from £663,010,000 to £671,359,000. The increase results mainly from the take up of the end-year flexibility entitlement of £7,543,000 announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report columns 326–31. There are also net transfers totalling £806,000, which includes inward transfers of £1,522,000 from the Department of Environment (£1,175,000 running costs), £432,000 from PACE (£432,000 running costs), £100,000 from the Home Office (£100,000 running costs), £17,000 from the Department of National Heritage (£17,000 running costs) and £10,000 from SAFE (£10,000 running costs) with an outward transfer of £1,275,000 to class II, vote 3 (£75,000 running costs). Additionally, there is a transfer between subheads of £24,000 from running costs into other current expenditure.

The gross running costs limit on class II, vote 1 increases by £1,635,000, from £519,058,000 to £520,693,000.

The cash limit for class II, vote 2—Other External Relations—will be increased by £20,202,000 from £209,096,000 to £229,298,000. Parliamentary authority will be sought for additional expenditure in respect of certain international organisations and contributions to peacekeeping operations. This increase will be met partly by increased appropriations in aid and partly from a claim on the reserve.

The cash limit for class II, vote 3—BBC World Service—will be increased by £2,465,000 from £169,638,000 to £172,103,000. The increase is required to take up £1,190,000 under the end-year flexibility scheme announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report columns 326–31. Additionally there is a transfer from class II, vote 1 of £1,275,000 to take on responsibility for the FCO relay stations in Cyprus and Oman and in the UK at Orfordness, Suffolk.

All the increases in provision will be offset by transfers or charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 4 November 1996

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Profession

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the extent to which the legal profession in the United Kingdom is open to candidates from all social backgrounds. [277]

Mr. Streeter: The Lord Chancellor's responsibilities in this field extend only to England and Wales. The criteria for entry into the legal profession are set by the professional bodies and I have made no such assessment. However, both the Law Society and the Bar Council have adopted anti-discrimination measures to seek to ensure that fair recruitment practices are followed.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1250]

Mr. Streeter: For the Lord Chancellor's Department, the Court Service and the Public Trust Office, the information is as follows:

Total male: 4,205

Total female: 7,370

Proportion of total: 63.7 per cent.

Young Offenders

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the average length of time from the charging of alleged young offenders to their cases being tried in (a) Manchester and (b) Trafford magistrates and youth courts in each of the last five years; and what is the national average figure. [1394]

Mr. Streeter: The information requested is not available. The magistrates courts time intervals survey collects information on defendants in indictable—including triable either way—cases against whom proceedings are completed in three sample weeks a year—in February, June and October. The June survey also collects information about proceedings in summary cases. In cases where the defendant is charged, this date is collected. However, the start date of any summary trial is not. Further information on the survey is available in Lord Chancellor's Department information bulletins which are held in the House of Commons Library.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1283]

Mr. Streeter: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies, we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be inappropriate for us to request this information from staff and difficult to justify the collection of such data. For the period 1 October 1995 to 30 September 1996, however, subsidised employee child care was provided for 94 women who are mothers and 26 men who are fathers in the Lord Chancellor's Department, Court Service and Public Trust Office. Help is also available with additional child care costs incurred owing to breaks in normal working patterns and special leave given to parents for domestic emergencies. Advice on finding child care is contained in the "Childcare Handbook" provided to all maternity leavers.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1265]

Mr. Streeter: My Department has no specific public relations budget. Expenditure on publicity and promotions in each of the last five financial years was as follows:

1992–93: £40,000

1993–94: £46,667

1994–95: £78,961

1995–96: £117,684

1996–97: (to end September): £40,061.

Expenditure on official hospitality in each of the last five financial years was as follows:

1992–93: £20,697

1993–94: £20,477

1994–95: £26,159

1995–96: £27,694

1996–97: (to end September): £6,165.

The only advertising that this Department carries out is for recruitment. This information is not collected centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prosecutors

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to restrict prosecutors in the Crown court to Crown Prosecution Service staff; and if he will make a statement. [268]

Mr. Streeter: Rights of audience are determined under the procedure laid down in the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990. There is no question of restricting prosecutors in the Crown court to Crown Prosecution Service staff.

Rather, our policy is to allow for a wider provision of legal services, while maintaining the proper and efficient administration of justice.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Development Advisory Service

Sir Anthony Durant: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when ADAS is to be privatised; and what the objectives for the privatisation will be. [2641]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: ADAS is on course to meet its financial targets for 1996–97, including the target of 100 per cent. cost recovery on its advisory services. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have therefore decided to proceed as quickly as possible with the sale of the business. We will invite expressions of interest from potential bidders for the business as a whole or any or all of its constituent parts—consultancy, research and development and the laboratory—although our preference is to dispose of the business as a whole.

Our objectives for the privatisable functions of ADAS will be:

(1) To transfer the privatisable functions of ADAS, and the associated risks, to the private sector on the best available terms—that is, terms which optimise the risk adjusted net benefit to the taxpayer;

(2) To ensure that the services to be provided to MAFF and the Welsh Office from the private sector can be delivered continuously, economically, efficiently and effectively;

(3) To provide for a "clean break" between Government and the privatised organisation(s), or failing that, to minimise any contingent liabilities falling on the Government.

In pursuing these objectives, we will have regard to the need to ensure that the staff concerned in the transfer are treated fairly, in accordance with the relevant legislation.

Departmental Cash Limits

Sir Anthony Durant: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes are proposed in his departmental cash limits for 1996–97. [2642]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class III, vote 1, section B—the Intervention Board executive agency—will be increased by £7,641,000 from £56,817,000 to £64,458,000. The increases are to cover the administration costs associated with the implementation of emergency measures to protect against bovine spongiform encephalopathy in the United Kingdom for expenditure on IT services. The running costs cash limit will be increased by £3,350,000 from £36,818,000 to £40,168,000. Agents' services will be increased by £4,291,000 from £18,427,000 to £22,718,000. The supplementary will also give partial effect to the running costs end flexibility entitlement of £2,814,000 announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31. At this stage it is proposed to take up £565,000 of this increase to cover expenditure on IT systems.

The increase will be charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class III, vote 2—Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food: operational expenditure, agencies and departmental administration—will be increased by £5,057,000 from £911,318,000 to £916,375,000. The £5,057,000 relates mainly to the take-up of capital end-year flexibility entitlement of £5,189,000 as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31.

The following departmental transfers are also included; to the Scottish Office, administration (class XIII vote 6) £20,000 BSE-related running costs and £255,000 research and development expenditure, and from the Security Facilities Executive and the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate, £143,000 running costs.

The gross running costs limits for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will decrease by £2,806,000 from £354,768,000 to £351,962,000.

The increase in the vote total will be offset by savings or charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Beef Imports (Botswana)

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what amount of (a) beef and (b) beef products in the United Kingdom are currently imported from Botswana. [1659]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Imports of (a) bovine meat and (b) prepared and preserved bovine meat into the United Kingdom from Botswana, as recorded in "Overseas Trade Statistics" are, as follows:

	1994		1995		1996
	£000	Tonnes	£000	Tonnes	£000	Tonnes
Bovine meat	12,457	4,058	17,682	6,655	8,996	3,488
Prepared and preserved bovine meat	1,931	777	1,945	723	281	116

All data are provisional.

Basking Shark Fishery

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the commercial value of the basking shark fishery as assessed under the EC–Norwegian exchange agreement. [1151]

Mr. Baldry: Norway has a 100 tonne basking shark liver quota. No assessment of the commercial value of the fishery has been made. However, as nothing was taken in 1991, 1992, 1994 or 1995 and only 5.8 tonnes in 1993, the value is not likely to be great.

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the fisheries for basking sharks in United Kingdom waters. [1150]

Mr. Baldry: The Government are not aware of any current fishery for basking sharks in United Kingdom waters.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1276]

Mr. Boswell: Expenditure on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) official hospitality in each of the last five financial years is as follows:

Year	Advertising £	Public relations £	Official hospitality £
1991–92	441,877	4,174,427	64,852
1992–93	191,738	4,225,228	72,986
1993–94	269,821	4,379,768	79,758
1994–95	140,700	4,820,603	64,092
1995–96	144,781	5,280,010	59,646

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1259]

Mr. Boswell: As at 1 October 1996 the total number of women employed by the Department is 3,287. This represents 48.3 percent of the total number of people employed.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1293]

Mr. Boswell: Although the Ministry and its executive agencies collect statistical information on staff employed, this does not include information on the parental status of individual staff. It would not be appropriate to request this information and it would be difficult to justify its collection.

The Ministry and its agencies support 120 nursery places and holiday play schemes are run at a number of sites across the country. Some sites provide information for staff on local child care opportunities. In addition, staff may seek reimbursement of certain additional child care costs associated with a break in the normal working routine such as attendance at training courses.

Farmers' Incomes

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the changes in farmers' incomes in real terms for each month since January 1990; and if he will make a statement. [1588]

Mr. Boswell: Data on farm incomes are collected through the farm business survey on an annual basis. They are published in "Farm Incomes in the United Kingdom"—1994–95 being the latest—a copy of which is held in the Library of the House.

Cattle Cull

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps have been taken to ensure that cattle producers in Wales have equal access to the authorised abattoirs in England under the 30-month cattle cull with producers from other cases; and if he will make a statement. [1753]

Mr. Baldry: ABP Shrewsbury and Duggins (Bromsgrove), the two designated abattoirs to which I assume the hon. Member is referring, are required to source a predetermined number of cattle from Wales each week. No other area of the country has this guaranteed and preferential access to the two abattoirs concerned.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has of the numbers of cattle over 30 months awaiting slaughter; and how this estimate was arrived at. [1955]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 1 November 1996]: A sample survey by telephone was conducted in September to estimate the number of cattle on farms awaiting slaughter under the over-30-month scheme. The survey indicated that a backlog was then of the order of 400,000 animals in the United Kingdom. We have since introduced a registration system for animals awaiting slaughter which will establish more precisely the size of the backlog.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the benefits of a full written survey of farmers to ascertain precise numbers of cattle over 30 months awaiting slaughter. [1956]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The registration system for cattle, which are awaiting slaughter as at 2 November under the over-30-month scheme, will enable priority to be given to such animals as from 4 November.

Arable Area Payments Scheme

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list by county the payments made under the arable payments scheme in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995. [1620]

Mr. Baldry: The table gives the total arable area payments claimed in 1994 and 1995 on land situated in each county of England. The total amounts paid will have been slightly lower because of reductions made for various reasons. However, since such reductions normally have to be calculated on the basis of the total claim, which may include land in more than one county, it is not possible to give figures for the total amounts paid on a county basis.

In preparing the answer to this question the Department became aware that a similar question tabled by the hon. Member last year had been answered incorrectly—Official Report, 1 November 1995, columns 330-31. The payment rates used to calculate the reply to last year's question were those for 1995–96, but should have been those for 1994–95. The reply to the present question is based on the appropriate payment rate for each year and I should like to apologise to the hon. Member for the error in the earlier reply.

Mr. Soames: As with any other of the world's large military aircraft fleets, the number of faults found on Tornado aircraft runs into thousands each month, the vast majority of them trivial. The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Prince's Trust

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the Departments which have an interest in the Prince's Trust, indicating in each case the nature of that interest. [1502]

The Prime Minister: At the relaunch of Prince's Trust volunteers on 4 June, I personally pledged Government support to the Prince's Trust's aim of recruiting 25,000 young volunteers per year by the year 2000. I have asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to promote the scheme across the civil service.

Government Departments work in partnership with the Prince's Trust to help meet the many and varied needs of disadvantaged young people. The following Government Departments work with the Prince's Trust in a variety of ways, from providing secondees to giving advice on benefits policy:

Department for Education and Employment;
Welsh Office;

Home Office;

Inland Revenue;

HOME DEPARTMENT

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1252]

Mr. Howard: The Home Office and its agencies employ a total of 14,049 women which represents 27 per cent. of the total work force of 52,098 permanent staff. However, if the Prison Service is excluded, 5,956 women, representing 51 per cent. of the total work force, are employed.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1285]

Mr. Howard: Although the Home Office collects statistical information on staff employed in the Department and its agencies, information is not collected on the parental status of individual staff because it is not considered appropriate to do so. Child care assistance is provided in a variety of forms. The Department makes available a number of subsidised nursery and holiday play scheme places, provides advice on out-of-school care and pays additional child care expenses incurred where the normal working routine is broken.

Over a 12-month period to the end of September 1996, 122 women and 58 men have used nursery places and 89 women and 14 men have used play scheme places. Over the same period, excluding the Prison Service, 58 women and two men have received payments in respect of additional child care expenses.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1267]

Mr. Howard: The information requested about advertising and official hospitality is provided in the following table. The Home Office does not spend money on public relations. The communication directorate is responsible for providing information about my Department's policies and activities to the public and the media; providing information and advice to the public about their rights and obligations, and the protection of themselves and their property, for example; advice on fire safety and crime prevention, and of the need to register to vote. It achieves this through a wide range of communications means including news releases; answering the media's and the public inquiries; information campaigns; briefings; exhibitions; publications; and electronic publishing.

Financial Years	Advertising £	Official hospitality £
1991–92	7,275,940	28,094

Public Houses

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to require the names of public houses to be included within the conditions of the licence issued by the appropriate authorities for the sale and consumption on the premises of alcoholic beverages. [1885]

Mr. Kirkhope: No. Public house names are entirely a matter for the owners and licensees.

Mr. Anthony Okere

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the present situation relating to the proposed repatriation of Mr. Anthony Okere. [2142]

Mr. Kirkhope: If the hon. Member will provide me with more information, I will write to him.

Detainees (Birmingham Prison)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those people detained in Birmingham prison under Immigration Act powers were deported during the months of (a) July, (b) August, and (c) September; and what were the nationalities of those deported. [1041]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Dr. Lynne Jones, dated 4 November 1996:

[1945]

Gun Clubs

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the numbers of (a) gun clubs and (b) members of gun clubs in (i) Germany, (ii) France, (iii) Italy and (iv) the United Kingdom; and what the security requirements for gun clubs and their members are in each country. [1666]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The total number of shooting clubs approved by the Secretary of State in the United Kingdom is 2,067. The Government have no information on the number of members of approved clubs. Approved clubs must abide by published criteria which require them to store firearms and ammunition securely and to ensure that their members are of good character.

We have no information about gun clubs in Germany, France or Italy.

Asylum Seekers

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many women were detained in Scottish prisons under the powers contained within the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 during 1994 and 1995 and from 1 January this year to date; and what were the nationalities of those detained; [1527]

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many companies and individuals have been prosecuted for operating unlicensed puppy farms since the Breeding of Dogs Act 1991 came into force; and if he will list them and the local authority area in which they are situated; [1684]

(2) how many puppy farms are currently licensed in each local authority area in Wales; [1685]

(3) how many prosecutions have been made against licensed operators of puppy farms for breaches of the licensing regulations relating to puppy farms in the Breeding of Dogs Act 1991. [1686]

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Information on the number of licensed dog breeding establishments in each local authority area in Wales is not available centrally.

Information on prosecutions under the Breeding of Dogs Acts 1973 and 1991 is not collected in the form requested. Details of prosecutions in England and Wales for offences under the Breeding of Dogs Act 1973, as amended, are available as follows:

Child Sexual Abuse (Extradition)

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been extradited for trial on charges of child sexual abuse; and to which countries. [1362]

Mr. Kirkhope: The figures for extradition to stand trial on charges of child sexual abuse from England, Wales and Northern Ireland since 1986 are:

To the United States

1986: 1

1987: 1

1993: 1

1996: 1

To Germany

1996: 1

To Holland

1993: 1.

The Home Office has three outstanding requests—two from the United States and one from Belgium—for extradition to stand trial on charges of child sexual abuse.

Violent Videos

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set up a review into the effectiveness of the enforcement of the current law on the availability of violent videos to children. [1208]

Mr. Sackville: The Video Recordings Act 1984 makes it a criminal offence to supply an unclassified video, subject to certain limited exemptions, or to supply a video in breach of the classification certificate issued by the British Board of Film Classification—BBFC.

The operation of the Act is kept under careful review. The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 increased the maximum penalties for supplying unclassified videos—to two years in prison and/or an unlimited fine—and for supplying a video in breach of its classification—to six months in prison and/or a £5,000 fines. The 1994 Act also increased the powers of trading standards officers in investigating video offences, and amended the Video Recordings Act 1984 to lay down statutory classification criteria which the BBFC must take into account.

Prisons

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those prisons and detention centres (a) built, and (b) managed under the private sector. [54]

Miss Widdecombe: The management of four prisons is contracted out to the private sector: they are Blakenhurst, Buckley Hall, Doncaster and Wolds. The private sector has not completed building any new prisons. It is currently building two prisons under the design, construct, manage and finance—DCMF—initiative at Fazakerley and at Bridgend. The third DCMF contract, for Lowdham Grange prison, is expected to be signed imminently.

The management of three immigration detention centres is contracted out to the private sector: they are Campsfield house, Harmondsworth and a smaller, temporary facility at Gatwick airport. The fourth immigration centre, Tinsley house, was constructed by and is managed by the private sector.

Ethnic Minorities Education

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance has been issued to local authorities regarding bids for section 11 grants after March 1997. [149]

Mr. Kirkhope: We have under active consideration the position regarding further section 11 funding from next April onwards. Although we are not yet in a position to make an announcement, I expect to be able to do so shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Nuclear Power Stations

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the undiscounted value of post-operational advanced gas-cooled reactor liabilities for each privatised nuclear station which are not covered by the segregated fund; and what are the arrangements for BE to meet these liabilities. [233]

Mr. Lang: The value of British Energy's liabilities as at 31 March 1996 are listed on page 85 and the projected pattern of payments are listed on page 100 of the prospectus for the sale of British Energy, copies of which are in the Library of the House. The segregated fund covers all of stages 1 to 3 of decommissioning, excluding defuelling, at all of British Energy's station sites. British Energy will meet those liabilities not covered by the segregated fund as part of its day-to-day operating costs.

Radiocommunications Agency

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when the final phase of building work for staff was completed in New Kings Beem house; what is the estimated cost of the work undertaken; and if he will make a statement; [1540]

(2) when the Radiocommunications Agency will be relocated to South Oxey from New Kings Beem house; and what are the proposed costs involved in relocating; [1541]

(3) if the structural survey has been completed on South Quay 3; if he will place a copy of the document in the Library; and if he will make a statement; [1542]

(4) what are the consequences to staff and business customers of the proposed reorganisation of the Radiocommunications Agency; and if he will make a statement; [1544]

(5) if adequate facilities are provided for the Radiocommunications Agency trade union side in accordance with his departmental facilities agreement. [1545]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 1 November 1996]: These are day-to-day operational matters for the Radiocommunications Agency and I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Simon Hughes, dated 4 November 1996:

The Minister for Science and Technology has asked me to write to you in response to your Parliamentary Question, concerning the reorganisation in progress within my Agency.

The purpose of the planned re-organisation within the Radiocommunications Agency is to:

(i) enhance customer focus and service;

(ii) give greater responsibility to managers within a 'flatter' organisation;

(iii) ensure the Agency's limited resources are targeted to the maximum effect in facilitating a particularly dynamic area of the UK economy.

The staff of the Agency are fully involved in a consultative process ensuring the detail of the planning and implementation of the re-organisation are carried through to the best effect. The re-organisation will both improve the Agency's already good customer service and enhance the quality of work and job satisfaction for staff.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Simon Hughes, dated 4 November 1996:

Question: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, if adequate facilities are provided for the Radiocommunications Agency trade union side in accordance with his departmental facilities agreement.

I have been asked to answer the question you raised on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency.

The Radiocommunications Agency does abide by the terms of the departmental facilities agreement.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Simon Hughes, dated 4 November 1996:

I have been asked to reply on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency of the DTI to your recent questions relating to New King's Beam House (NKBH) and South Quay Three (SQ3).

Practical Completion for the work carried out on NKBH was achieved on 5 August 1996. The cost of the work inclusive of professional fees was £2.5 million.

I understand that the Landlord has completed the structural survey on SQ3 and will in due course be forwarding a copy of the report to the Agency. As it is the Landlord's document, the Agency will not be placing a copy in the library.

If the repairs are carried out on schedule, the Agency should relocate back to SQ3 in 1999. Under the terms of the lease, the Landlord warrants the performance of the building and therefore his insurance will bear the repair costs. RA's relocation costs for the return to SQ3 should be limited to the cost of furniture removal. It is too early to accurately estimate these costs.

Electro-magnetic Radiation

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what research he has (a) commissioned or (b) evaluated on the health risks associated with electro-magnetic radiation being emitted from household appliances; and if he will make a statement; [1596]

(2) what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the safety levels for electro-magnetic radiation emitted from household appliances such as (a) vacuum cleaners, (b) irons, (c) fridges and (d) microwaves; and if he will make a statement. [2044]

Mr. Ian Taylor: My Department has not commissioned or evaluated research into the health risks associated with electro-magnetic radiation from household appliances, nor have we received representations concerning safety other than in relation to microwave ovens.

The Electrical Equipment (Safety) Regulations 1994 (SI1994/3260) lay down requirements for the safety of household electrical appliances, implementing the low voltage directive (73/23/EEC), and include a requirement that radiation which would cause a danger must not be produced. The European electrotechnical standards body, CENELEC, has produced standards controlling radiation from appliances such as microwave ovens and sunbeds but has not found it necessary to specify requirements for other appliances.

Asbestos

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the laboratories that are accredited by the national measurement accreditation service for the purposes of asbestos sampling. [1439]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Responsibility for the accreditation of laboratories was transferred in 1995 from DTI to the United Kingdom Accreditation Service—UKAS—an independent body which operates under a memorandum of understanding with the Government. I am informed by UKAS that over 30 laboratories are currently accredited for asbestos sampling. I have written to the hon. Member enclosing the addresses and other details concerning these laboratories.

Business Breakfast Tours

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the costs of the business breakfast tours to be undertaken by Ministers. [1957]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The costs will depend on the number and size of the events.

Business Link

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many businesses are currently being advised by (a) Business Link London South and (b) Business Link London Central in (i) central London and (ii) the rest of London. [2349]

Mr. Page: Business links are private sector partnerships, not Government bodies. National statistics on business using business link are available in the quarterly "Report on Business Link and Business Link Regional Supply Network Management Information" and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House. Local statistics are a matter for local business link partnerships and I will ensure that the respective chief executives of Business Link London South and Business Link London Central are aware of the hon. Member's question.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the number of small firms which are aware of the loan guarantee scheme. [1233]

Mr. Page: The Department does not carry out specific research into how many businesses may be aware of the loan guarantee scheme.

Information about the scheme is readily available from all scheme lenders, a wide variety of business support services such as business links, training and enterprise councils, local enterprise companies, enterprise agencies, business shops in Scotland, Business Connect in Wales, Government offices, chambers of commerce, business exhibitions, and intermediaries such as accountancy practices.

Post Offices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many post offices have (a) closed and (b) lost Crown status since April 1992. [1229]

Mr. Page: I understand from the Post Office that nationally the number of post offices which closed—net of reopenings—between 1 April 1992 and 30 September 1996 is 855. During the same period, 376 Crown post offices were converted to agency status.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much her Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1272]

Mr. Sproat: The available information requested is given in the following table:

	[1]1992–93 £	[1]1993–94 £	[1]1994–95 £	[1]1995–96 £	[2]1996–97 £

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Torture

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Kenyan Government regarding ratification of the UN convention against torture. [1930]

Dr. Liam Fox: During her visit to Kenya in August, my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Chalker recommended to the Government of Kenya at a senior level that they should ratify this convention.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Israel (EU Aid)

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will itemise every form of economic aid and economic and trade preference provided to Israel by the European Union, in each case, where possible, stating the financial value of such aid or assistance. [72]

Mr. David Davis [holding answer 28 October 1996]: Given Israel's level of development, it does not qualify for bilateral grant aid or structural adjustment assistance. It is eligible for non-subsidised European investment bank loans, EC regional aid and investment support.

In the past seven years the EIB has made seven loans to Israel totalling 165 million ecu.

Israel benefits from EC grant aid for regional co-operation, through initiatives under the new Euro-Mediterranean partnership launched at the Barcelona conference—details can be found in the Commission leaflet which I have placed in the Libraries of the House. The Euro-Mediterranean partnership is allocated 4.685 billion ecu in grants for the period 1995 to 1999 through middle east development and regulation.

Over the first nine months of 1966, a total of 30 million ecu was committed in grants to the 12 Mediterranean partner countries, Israel included, for regional programmes.

Bosnia

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what sums from the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe elections fund for the Bosnian elections were paid to the Serbian Unity party. [1191]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The Serbian Unity party received DM300,104 for its election expenses. Funds for distribution among all registered political parties and independent candidates were provided by some Governments, but not the United Kingdom, and did not come out of regular OSCE funds or contributions.

New York Assembly Bill

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations were made after 1 April to the (a) New York Assembly and (b) other bodies on the Irish Famine as Genocide Education Bill; for what reasons his Department assessed the Bill was unlikely to pass into law; and what statements were issued by the consulate-general on the matter of Governor Pataki's signing ceremony and the invitations thereto in New York. [1158]

Mr. Rifkind: Following the answer that I gave to the hon. Member on 1 April, Official Report, column 9, British officials in New York provided key legislators and their staffs with objective accounts of the history of the famine. They registered the Government's strong concern at the parallel which the New York State Assembly Bill drew between the holocaust and the Irish famine. I have described the circumstances of the passage into law of this legislation in correspondence with the hon. Member.

The embassy in Washington and the New York consulate-general made plain our concern at the passage of the Bill into law, and at Governor Pataki's remarks at the signing ceremony on 8 October. The ambassador, Sir John Kerr, wrote to the governor emphasising the seriousness with which the Government regarded the issue, and explained that, unlike the holocaust, the Irish famine was not deliberate, not premeditated, not man-made and certainly not genocide.

Ireland

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made this year to the Government of the Irish Republic about the protection and security of British citizens resident in border areas. [1159]

Mr. Rifkind: No British national resident in the border areas of the Irish Republic has contacted the embassy in Dublin or this Department this year with concerns about their protection and security. Accordingly the British Government have made no representations on this subject to the Irish Government. If such concerns were expressed, the embassy in Dublin and this Department stand ready to offer appropriate help or advice.

Anglo-Irish Secretariat

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the dates and topics of presentations made by Foreign Office staff to the Anglo-Irish Secretariat since 1 January 1995. [1160]

Mr. Rifkind: None.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1266]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 16 October 1996, Official Report, column 920.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1284]

Mr. Hanley: This Department does not collect information on the parental status of individual staff.

The numbers of staff who have used FCO subsidised child care schemes from October 1995 to October 1996 are:

	Women	Men
Nurseries in London and Hanslope park (age 3 months—5 years)	17	8
Holiday playschemes in London and East Kilbride (age 5–12 years)	27	8

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1251]

Mr. Hanley: The number of women currently employed by this Department is 2,524. This represents over a third of the total staff—37 per cent.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies his Department has undertaken on the European convention on human rights; and if he will make a statement on the implications of writing the convention into United Kingdom law. [1163]

Mr. Howard: I have been asked to reply.

The operation of the European convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms is subject to regular review within Government. Following one such review, my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) announced proposals on 13 December 1995 for securing improvements in the convention's operation, which are presently under consideration in the Council of Europe. A paper setting out these proposals is available in the Library.

The implications of incorporating the convention into United Kingdom law have been set out on a number of occasions by the Government, most recently by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor and my noble Friend Baroness Blatch during debate in the other place on 3 July 1996 at columns 1451–52 and 1567–68.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Nurseries and Play Schemes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list, by Department, the (a) nurseries and (b) play schemes for children of civil servants. [1194]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 14 October 1996, Official Report, columns 662–63.

Information on the number of civil service nurseries and play schemes, by Department, is not held centrally.

Many civil service nurseries and play schemes currently in operation are run as interdepartmental or local partnerships, often involving other non-civil service employers such as local authorities and businesses.

Recruitment (Age Policy)

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which Government Departments have policy statements committing them to the recruitment, training and promotion of staff irrespective of age. [1427]

Mr. Freeman: From 1 April 1996, the civil service management code prohibited unfair discrimination on the basis of age. It is the responsibility of Departments and agencies to incorporate this into their own equal opportunities policies. Information on the number of Departments and agencies that have done so is not held centrally.

Staff (Age Profile)

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will produce an analysis of the age profile of all staff employed in all Government Departments for the year 1995–96, together with equivalent figures for 1985–86. [1426]

Mr. Willetts: The information requested was published on 1 November in Figure 11 of "Civil Service Statistics 1996," a copy of which is in the Library.

Deregulation Task Force

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the company directorships of each member of the deregulation task force. [1230]

Mr. Freeman: I am informed by those concerned that the company directorships currently held by members of the deregulation task force are as follows:

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he has taken to avoid conflicts of interest involving members of his deregulation task force. [1231]

Mr. Freeman: The deregulation task force is an independent advisory body, and it is for it to decide which issues it wishes to address in its reports. All recommendations that it makes to the Government are considered entirely on their merits, and in the light of the views of others. In common with other advisory non-departmental public and advisory bodies, members are appointed for the expertise they can provide.

The company interests of members of the deregulation task force, as with members of all non-departmental public bodies, are a matter of public record.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1274]

Mr. Willetts: Expenditure on public relations cannot be separated from that recorded for publicity. Expenditure on advertising was not recorded separately from publicity before 1993–94. Expenditure recorded by the Cabinet Office, excluding the Prime Minister's Office, and the Office of Public Service on external advertising and publicity, and official hospitality in each of the last five financial years for which there are records is shown in the table.

	Advertising £	Publicity £	Official hospitality £

In addition, £234,100 was borne by the OPS in 1991–92 on official hospitality in respect of the 1991 economic summit.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1291]

Mr. Willetts: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be inappropriate for us to request this information from staff and difficult to justify the collection of such data.

The number and proportion of staff receiving assistance in the Departments and agencies for which my right hon. Friend is responsible are as follows:

	Total staff	Number assisted	Per cent.
Cab/OPS	1,139	28	2.46
CCTA	261	10	2.61
CSC	258	15	5.8
SAFE	1,049	nil	—
TBA	123	nil	—
PACE	253	1	0.4
COI	423	14	3.3

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1257]

Mr. Willetts: There are 558 women employed within the central of the Cabinet Office and Office of Public Services which represents 46.4 per cent. of the work force. There are a total of 1,013 women within the whole of the Cabinet Office and Office of Public Service and agencies which represents 32.4 per cent. of the work force. The divergence is attributable to the Security and Facilities Executive where the majority of employees are male security guards.

ENVIRONMENT

Self-employed People (Accidents)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each of the last 10 years, the number of non-fatal recorded accidents to self-employed people in (a) the construction industry, (b) all manufacturing industry and (c) service industries; and if he will list the number of over three-day injuries reported by self-employed people in categories (a) to (c). [657]

Sir Paul Beresford: The number and incidence rate of non-fatal injuries to self-employed people in the construction, manufacturing and service industries, as reported to health and safety enforcing authorities, were as follows:

Asbestos

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many companies have introduced an asbestos control programme, following a visit from a Health and Safety Executive field inspector, during the last year for which figures are available. [1440]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the public consultation on a discussion document which outlined possible adjustments to the asbestos licensing regime will be published; and if he will place submissions to the consultation in the Library. [1442]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Health and Safety Commission's discussion document on the future of the lead and asbestos regulations was published in May, and a copy placed in the Library. In accordance with its usual practice and as explained on the front cover of the discussion document, the Commission will be making responses to the document, except where consultees asked that their response should not be so disclosed, available for public scrutiny at the Health and Safety Executive's information centres in London, Bootle and Sheffield. A list of responses received has been placed in the Library of the House: copies of individual responses may be obtained through the Library.

Hampshire County Council (Court Costs)

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the reasons for refusing Hampshire county council a supplementary credit approval to cover the costs incurred in the case of Digital v. Hampshire Fire and Rescue Services. [1938]

Sir Paul Beresford: Because of the public expenditure implications, it is our firm policy not to issue supplementary credit approvals except for purposes falling within certain specified, limited categories. Outside those categories, a SCA would be issued only in the most exceptional circumstances. After very carefully considering all the information provided by Hampshire county council, we concluded there was insufficient justification for the issue of a SCA in this case.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1262]

Sir Paul Beresford: The figures for (a) central advertising expenditure, and (c) official hospitality by my Department in each of the financial years requested are detailed.

	Advertising £	Official hospitality £
1991–92	680,000	56,000
1992–93	6,869,000	92,000
1993–94	5,149,000	68,000
1994–95	4,470,000	76,000
1995–96	2,800,000	73,000

The figures exclude recruitment advertising but include VAT, advertising agency commission and all levies as paid.
On (b), my Department does not employ public relations consultants.

All publicity and information activities are carried out by members of the Government Information Service whose salaries are paid as part of departmental annual running costs.

Supplementary Credit Approval

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the revised bids for supplementary credit approval cover in 1996–97 recently submitted by those authorities that have been or are to be reorganised on 1 April 1995, 1996, 1997 and 1998; and if he will state the proportion of those bids that have been granted supplementary credit approval cover. Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1279]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department and its executive agencies do not keep records of the number of staff who are parents but child care assistance is available to staff in the form of workplace nursery and holiday play scheme places. In the last 12 months, 40 female staff and 20 male staff were assisted with a nursery place and 72 female staff and 39 male staff with a play scheme place.

In addition, staff are entitled to the reimbursement of any additional child care costs incurred when the normal working routine is broken, for example, to attend a training course. Comprehensive records of the number of claims are not held centrally.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1245]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department and its executive agencies, the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre, the Planning Inspectorate and the Building Research Establishment currently employ 1,936 women. This represents 42 per cent. of the total employees.

SSSIs (Hampshire)

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites of special scientific interest which have been destroyed beyond repair in Hampshire in each of the last five years. [1970]

Mr. Clappison: None.

Public Houses

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many recent representations he has received from (a) right hon. and hon. Members and (b) others about changes in the names of public houses. [1883]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department received seven letters on this subject from hon. Members or their constituents.

Mr. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to bring forward legislation to include within planning law the names of public houses; and if he will make a statement. [1884]

Sir Paul Beresford: I believe that it would introduce unnecessary and excessive regulation to introduce planning controls over the naming or renaming of public houses. Owners of licensed premises should retain their right to trade under the name of their choice, just as their customers have a freedom to drink where they choose.

However, members of the public do make their views known and this can have a considerable influence on owners' decisions, generally against change.

Rents (Hampshire)

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average rent paid by (a) council tenants and (b) housing association trust tenants in (i) Southampton and (ii) Hampshire in each of the last five years. [1967]

Mr. Clappison: Average weekly rents for council and housing association tenants in Southampton and Hampshire are set out as follows:

	Council tenants[1]		Housing association tenants[2]
	Southampton £	Hampshire £	Southampton £	Hampshire £

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources he has made available to authorities that have been or are to be reorganised on 1 April 1995, 1996, 1997 or 1998 for reorganisation costs incurred by them in 1996–97; and if he will make a statement. [2046]

Mr. Curry: On 19 July I invited authorities that have been or are to be reorganised on or before 1 April 1998 to submit estimates of the amount of expenditure they expect to incur on transitional costs of reorganisation in 1996–97. On the basis, inter alia, of the information provided by the authorities, I have decided the maximum amounts that it would be appropriate to allocate towards such costs in 1996–97. In the initial round I gave priority to authorities that were reorganised on or before 1 April 1996. I have carefully considered the bids from these authorities and have decided that none has established a sufficiently exceptional case to justify an increase in their allocation for 1996–97. In this round I have given priority to authorities that are to be reorganised in 1997, especially their costs in respect of non-discretionary redundancy and other compensation payments to staff.
The amounts are as follows:

Maximum amounts: £000 rounded

Authority	1996–97
Isle of Wight
Isle of Wight Council	500

Staffordshire
Staffordshire County Council	1,800
Stoke on Trent City Council	2,800

Wiltshire County Council	1,300
Thamesdown Borough Council	2,800
Total	50,730
Combined total allocations	97,970

[1] (SCA) + 1,000 SCA previously issued.

I have also considered carefully the bids submitted by authorities that are to be reorganised in 1998, but, in my view, none of the bids established a sufficiently strong case to justify an allocation of SCA for 1996–97. I have, however, announced that I am prepared to issue capitalisation directions for the net eligible revenue expenditure incurred.

A reserve of £2.03 million has been retained to meet any unanticipated, exceptional costs incurred, with priority being given to the shadow authority of Brighton and Hove.

Nuclear Wastes

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on current progress in negotiations between the European Union and the World Trade Organisation over implementation of the Basel convention on transfrontier movements of nuclear wastes; and if he will list the areas where agreement has not yet been reached. [2330]

Mr. Clappison: The Basel convention on the control of transboundary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal does not apply to wastes which, as a result of being radioactive, are subject to other international control systems, including international instruments, applying specifically to radioactive materials.

Transfrontier movements of radioactive waste are covered by the International Atomic Energy Agency's code of practice on the international transboundary movement of radioactive waste. In addition, provisions on the transboundary movement of radioactive waste are likely to be included in the international convention on the safety of radioactive waste management, currently being negotiated under the auspices of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the finance management and policy review of the Housing Corporation. [2460]

Mr. Curry: The finance management and policy review of the Housing Corporation has been completed and I am placing a copy of the final report in the Library.

This final report is the completion of a process which started last year. The FMPR of a non-departmental public body comprises two stages. The report on the first stage, the prior options study, was completed in June 1995. The bulk of the fieldwork for the second stage, following up the POS, was completed by early this year. Given that neither the POS nor the fieldwork identified significant problems and that the Housing Bill had been introduced, completion of the report was deferred so that it could reflect the content of the Housing Act 1996.

The original POS confirmed that there should be no change in the basic approach of the Housing Corporation, and identified a number of points to be covered in the second stage of the FMPR and a series of issues which should be followed up outside the FMPR. A number of recommendations in the POS were reflected in the Housing Act 1996, including arrangements to put the housing association tenants ombudsman service on a statutory footing.

A good deal of the report is devoted to the strategic relationship between the corporation and the Department. The review, which included an investigation by outside consultants, found that this relationship was in good shape but made a series of detailed recommendations on how it could be improved further. The report summarises a series of other reviews: of the corporation's financial systems; of the scope for out-sourcing service functions; of the corporation's senior management structure; of the specific regulatory issues identified in the POS; and of how to handle potential conflicts of interest for corporation board members. The report also summarises progress with actions arising from the POS outside the FMPR.

The POS, last year, underlined the importance of the corporation's work and the effective way it is carried out. This report makes a series of suggestions for minor improvement, but again confirms the basic soundness of the arrangements. This all reflects well on both the staff of the corporation and the chairman and members of the board.

Central and Local Government

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will respond to the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on relations between central and local government, HL97 Session 1995–96; and if he will make a statement. [2638]

Mr. Gummer: In response to the House of Lords Select Committee report, I have today laid before Parliament a White Paper setting out a programme of action to strengthen local democracy, to promote local authorities' local leadership role and to improve further relations between central and local government. Under this programme of action we intend:

- to agree with the new Local Government Association and the Welsh Local Government Association, a statement of the role and status of local government in England and Wales, for inclusion in the guidelines on central/local relations; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will also consider with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities a similar statement in relation to Scotland;
- to develop further, with the Local Government Association and the Welsh Local Government Association, the guidelines for central/local relations; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will also consider with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities the development of suitable guidelines for Scotland;
- to review the scope for local authorities to fulfil their local community leadership role within section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, and to assess whether a more general power of local competence is practicable and advisable (in the light of broader priorities);
- to legislate in the next Parliament to enable local authorities in England and Wales to undertake experiments with their internal management structure;
- to undertake with the Local Government Association and the Welsh Local Government Association research on public participation in local government; and
- to review the arrangements in Government for handling cross-departmental business affecting local government.

This programme of action is based on the Government's belief, which the Select Committee shares, that democratically elected local authorities have important roles, in particular that of community leader, in the world of local governance today. As the Committee itself recognised, local authorities are not, never have been, and never will be the sole monolithic providers of all services in a given geographical area; nor can they ever operate wholly apart from powers for central intervention. Our programme represents a significant further chapter in the continuing development of local government within our living constitution, a development which we aim to take forward in a spirit of partnership and collaboration.

Cash Limits

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to change the 1996–97 cash limits and running costs limits for which he is responsible. [2640]

Mr. Gummer: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the cash limit for class VI, vote 1 (Housing and Construction, England), covering sections A, D to G and J to L of that vote, will be increased by £900,000 from £330,568,000 to £331,468,000. Increases in the cash limit of £2,200,000 are balanced by decreases of £1,300,000. The increases are a switch of £2,000,000 from non-cash-limited asylum seekers' housing grant to cash-limited Housing Corporation revenue grants; and £200,000 to meet increased administration costs the corporation is expected to incur preparing the loan portfolio for possible sale, funded from any receipt of the sale. The decreases are a transfer of £500,000 from gipsy site grant to class VI, vote 2, to fund projects on the Barkantine estate which was damaged in the docklands bombing of February 1996; and a switch of £800,000 from homelessness grants to Housing Corporation capital grant in aid, included in the DOE/HC (Housing Corporation) non-voted cash limit.

The DOE/HC (Housing Corporation) cash limit will be increased by £1,369,000 from £1,034,499,000 to £1,035,868,000 because of the take-up of £569,000 entitlement to end year flexibility as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326-31, to fund capital projects; and the transfer of £800,000 from the cash limit for class VI, vote 1 in order to switch current to capital expenditure within the rough sleepers initiative.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 2 (Regeneration and Countryside and Wildlife) will be increased by £5,336,000 from £1,459,443,000 to £1,464,779,000. The increase is partly due to the net effect of the payment of £4,702,000 on capital projects which either slipped from previous years or to meet statutory compensation claims or the claim slipped into the following year. This extra provision will be met by the take-up of end year flexibility entitlement, as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31, and will cover claims for the following: Teeside development corporation, Derby and Leicester city challenge and challenge fund within the single regeneration budget, estate action and Bristol development corporation. The balance will be made up of a transfer of £134,000 from the Departments for Education and Employment and of Trade and Industry as their contribution towards the Manchester bomb fund, and £500,000 transfer from vote 1 (Housing and Construction) to estate action to cover bomb damage in London.

There will be associated increases in external financing limits for urban development corporations by £767,000 from £207,050,000 to £207,817,000 and the housing action trusts by £250,000 from £878,960,000 to £879,210,000.

The DOE/NT (New Towns) non-voted cash limit will be decreased by £8,000,000 from –£100,000,000 to –£108,000,000. This decrease is due to the Commission for the New Towns having accelerated disposals and generated additional receipts in 1996–97 of £15,000,000 in gross terms, of which the commission expects to use £7,000,000 to increase capital spending leaving a balance of £8,000,000. Of this public expenditure survey saving: £1,800,000 will be transferred to class VI, vote 3 to meet pneumoconiosis compensation payments; £434,000 will be transferred to class VI, vote 7 (Office of Water Services) to meet additional monitoring and accommodation costs, £230,000 will be used to offset the penalty imposed on the Office of Water Services for its breach of cash and running cost limits in 1995–96 and £3,394,000 will be transferred to class VI, vote 8 (Ordnance Survey) to meet additional accommodation, security and severance costs.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 3 (Environmental protection and water), covering sections A to H of that vote, will be increased by £4,301,000 from £347,309,000 to £351,610,000. This change reflects increases in provision of £1,850,000 for grant in aid to the British Waterways Board, £1,800,000 for pneumoconiosis compensation payments, £500,000 for water and sewerage grants, £244,000 for grant to Mersey Basin Business Foundation, £39,000 for grant in aid to the Environment Agency, and £10,000 for Going for Green, less a transfer of £142,000 to the Scottish Office for the air quality pilot project. The increase will be met by reductions in the DOE/new towns cash limit (£1,800,000), the cash limits for class VI, vote 5 (DOE administration) (£254,000), class XIII, vote 2 (Scottish Office) (£800,000), class IV, vote 1 (DTI) (£39,000) and the take-up of end year flexibility entitlement—£1,550,000—as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31.

The external financing limit for the British Waterways Board will be increased by £2,800,000 from £47,000,000 to £49,800,000. This change will enable the board to undertake essential works to the Caledonian canal and will be funded by take-up of end year flexibility of £1,050,000, as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996 Official Report, columns 327–28, a transfer of £800,000 from class XIII, vote 2 (Scottish Office) and virements within vote 3.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 4, (Local government and planning, England), covering sections A to F of that vote, will be reduced by £30,000 from £31,128,087,000 to £31,128,057,000. This reduction is the net result of reductions in the payments made to the Valuation Office agency in section A (Valuation services) and an increase to allow payments to the Local Government residuary body in section B (Reorganisation of local government). The savings in section A will be used within vote 4, to cover residual payments of community charge grant in section H (Other grants), which is outside the cash limit on the vote.

The DOE/LGR (Local government reorganisation) non-voted cash limit will be reduced by £205,000 from £108,050,000 to £107,845,000 to offset the increase on section B of vote 4.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 5 (Administration) covering sections A to G and I of that vote, will be increased by £11,032,000 from £452,776,000 to £463,808,000. This change reflects increases due to the drawdown of £11,744,000 of running costs end year flexibility entitlement and £2,000,000 of capital end year flexibility entitlement, as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31, together with a £20,000 transfer from the Security Facilities Executive agency (class XVII, vote 1) and £587,000 to pay for the Department's costs in respect of the sale of the Housing Corporation loans portfolio with the extra provision being funded from the expected proceeds of the sale. The increases will be offset by transfers of; £1,522,000 to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (class II, vote 1) and of £43,000 to the Office of Public Service (class XVII, vote 1) in respect of Lancaster house; £1,500,000 to the Department of National Heritage (class X, vote 1) for preparatory works to Somerset house to house the Gilbert collection; and £244,000 to provide for grant to the Mersey Basin Business Foundation and £10,000 in respect of Going for Green, both to class VI, vote 3. Also as a consequence, the DOE gross running cost limit has increased by £10,985,000 from £218,078,000 to £229,063,000.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 7 (Office of Water Services) will be increased by £434,000 from £9,201,000 to £9,635,000 and the running costs limit will be increased by £434,000 from £8,901,000 to £9,335,000. This increase is required to cover the costs of active annual monitoring of the performance of the water and sewerage undertakings, development of information systems to allow the analysis of performance against comparative benchmarks and to meet additional administrative and accommodations costs. This change takes into account the penalties imposed following Ofwat's breach of its cash and running cost limits in 1995–96. The increases will be offset by savings on the DOE/NT (New Towns) non-voted cash limit and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 8 (Ordnance Survey) will be increased by £5,305,000 from £9,110,000 to £14,415,000. The increase is required to cover additional expenditure on building refurbishment, enhancement of building security, higher than anticipated contributions in lieu of rates and early retirement costs. The increase will be met by a transfer of £3,394,000 from the DOE/NT (New Towns) non-voted cash limit and by a transfer of £5,000 from the Security Facilities Executive agency (class XVII, vote 1) with the balance of £1,906,000 being charged to the reserve.

All the increases will be offset by either savings or transfers from other Government Departments or else represent take-up of end year flexibility entitled or will be otherwise charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Environmental Information (Article 169)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) in what circumstances the Government (a) will and (b) will not make available information relating to article 169 proceedings; [1189]

(2) if he will make a statement about the Government's policy in respect of access to information held by the European Commission and the United Kingdom Government in the case of potential article 169 proceedings. [1188]

Mr. David Davis: I have been asked to reply.

Communications between a member state and the Commission in the context of anticipated or actual proceedings under article 169 are treated by both parties as confidential. The Government support and uphold this principle. The absence of this protection would prejudice the achievement of a negotiated settlement of disputes and the ability of member states and the European Commission to obtain confidential assistance from third parties in the preparation and conduct of the proceedings.

The agency is also generating additional receipts of £11.7 million. Further expenditure will be funded by receipts from the European Union, which are estimated to be £4 million in 1996–97.

Learning Disabilities

17. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the services provided for people with severe learning disabilities in Wales. [294]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Local authorities have prime responsibility for the planning and commissioning of services for people with learning disabilities, but the Department receives monitoring information on these services.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The main investigative roles lie with the Health and Safety Executive and the South Wales police. I understand that a joint investigation is currently under way.

In the past 12 months to June 1996 the number waiting over 12 months of in-patient and day case treatment rose by 171 from 5,465 to 5,636. Recent data from NHS trusts show that the figure fell back to 5,173 in August.

Grant-maintained Schools

29. Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he proposes to introduce to ensure that grant-maintained schools are not disadvantaged by the 1997 standard spending round. [306]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My right hon. Friend will announce his decisions on public expenditure in Wales in early December. It would not be appropriate to comment in advance of this.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1290]

Mr. Hague: Information is not collected in this format. My Department has a workplace nursery, supports play schemes and also has provision to reimburse staff for additional child care expenses and expenses relating to care of dependants incurred in the course of their official duties.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1256]

1993–94	275	1,704	27

1995–96	508	2,062	22

1. Expenditure on advertising includes television, radio and press advertising costs.
2. Figures for press and public relations includes press and publicity staff costs, press cutting services and the cost of purchasing other forms of publicity material.
3. Spending is shown at outturn prices.

Deregulation

30. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what existing rules and regulations he proposes to repeal in each of the next six months. [307]

Mr. Hague: My Department does not at present propose to repeal any existing rules or regulations in the next six months.

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for each local education authority the amount paid to schools as in-year payments from the service, strategy and regulation budget in 1995–96. [2016]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Service strategy and regulation is a central cost of local education authorities and is not allocated to schools.

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for each local education authority its service, strategy and regulation budget for the fiscal year 1996–97. [2017]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is given in the following table. The figures also include education management and support services expenditure, other than service strategy and regulation, that have not been included elsewhere in the budget returns submitted by authorities.

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each local education authority the local management of schools criteria which determine what is a large secondary school. [2019]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I am not aware of any local authority's local management of schools scheme which incorporates a definition of a large secondary school. As far as Welsh Office guidance is concerned, the LMS framework as set out in Welsh Office circulars 36/88 and 38/91 provided a definition of a small school for salary protection purposes only but no such definition was included for large schools.

TREASURY

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of Exchequer what is his policy in respect of mortgage interest relief at source at the present rate of 15 per cent. (a) for the rest of the current financial year and (b) for the following five financial years. [520]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 31 October 1996]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his last Budget speech that mortgage interest relief will remain unchanged for the lifetime of this Parliament. Beyond that, the level of mortgage interest relief is a matter to be considered each year in the Budget.

Tax Returns

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate, in respect of tax year 1996–97, of the number of taxpayers who will submit their tax returns to the Inland Revenue by 30 September 1997; how his estimate of this figure changed over the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [267]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The Inland Revenue's current working assumption is that between 40 per cent. and 50 per cent. of tax returns for 1996–97 will be received by 30 September 1997. This assumption has remained constant over the last 12 months.

Unemployed Claimant Count

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people, by region and gender, are designated as economically inactive but are not included in unemployed claimant count figures, within the age groups (a) 16 to 24, (b) 25 to 49 and (c) over 50. [1143]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Dennis Roberts to Mr. Ian McCartney, dated 4 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked the Director of the Office for National Statistics to reply to your recent question asking for a breakdown by region, gender and age group of those people who are economically inactive, who would like a job but are not included in the unemployment claimant count figures. The Director has asked me to reply in his absence.

According to the spring 1996 Labour Force Survey there were 7,770,000 people of working age in the United Kingdom who were classified as economically inactive. Of these 2,335,000 said they would like a job, but were not classified as ILO unemployed either because they had not sought work in the past four weeks and/or they were not available to start work in the next two weeks. The main reasons given for not seeking work were that the respondent was long term sick/disabled, looking after their family/home or was a student. 2,164,000 of the total of 2,335,000 said that they were not claiming unemployment related benefits though this may be overestimated by up to 10 per cent as the LFS generally under-records people claiming unemployment-related benefits. Further details are contained in the article on page 464 of the October 1993 Employment Gazette a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. The UK total figure is disaggregated for the analysis in the attached table.

National Bus Company Pension Scheme

Mr. Hall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the implications of the pensions ombudsman's recent findings in respect of breaches of trust relating to payments made from the National Bus Company employers' superannuation scheme for similar payments to the Treasury from the pension schemes of Government assets prior to their privatisation. [1085]

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not aware of any implications for other privatisations.

Interest Rates

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the savings to the Exchequer which would result from lower debt interest costs if United Kingdom interest rates were (a) 0.5 per cent., (b) 1.00 per cent. and (c) 1.5 per cent. lower across the yield curve for (1) 1997–98, (2) 1998–99, (3) 1999–2000, (4) 2000–01 and (5) 2001–02. [814]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Estimated reductions in central Government net debt interest payments resulting from lower interest rates are presented in the table.

Savings made from stated reduction in interest rates (£ billion)

	0.5 per cent.	1.0 per cent.	1.5 per cent.
1997–98	0.3	0.6	0.9
1998–99	0.5	0.9	1.3
1999–00	0.5	1.1	1.6
2000–01	0.6	1.2	1.7

Such estimates are dependent on the assumed path of Government borrowing. These figures are calculated using the Budget 1995 forecast for borrowing and assume the fall in interest rates in sustained throughout the forecast period.

Revised short-term projections for Government borrowing were produced in the "Summer Economic Forecast 1996". Estimates based on this forecast are not significantly different from those shown.

No borrowing forecasts have been published for 2001–02.

GDP Growth Rate

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the fastest annual average United Kingdom GDP growth rate in any consecutive period of nine years since 1966. [802]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 4 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked the Director of the Office for National Statistics to reply to your recent question asking what has been the fastest annual average United Kingdom GDP growth rate in any consecutive nine year period since 1966. The director has asked me to respond in his absence.

The highest United Kingdom growth rate, for any nine year period since 1966, was 3.1 per cent. in the period up to and including 1990. United Kingdom GDP growth rates, for any nine year period since 1966, can be found in table 16.10 of the 1996 edition of United Kingdom National Accounts, a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. I attach a photocopy of the table.

Office for National Statistics

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the cash limit and running costs limit for the Office for National Statistics for 1996–97. [2549]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XVI, vote 12—Office for National Statistics—will be increased by £7,561,000 from £105,039,000 to £112,600,000 and the running costs limit will be increased by £7,100,000 from £99,839,000 to £106,939,000. This reflects:

the take-up of £5,453,000 for running costs and £1,254,000 for capital costs under the end year flexibility arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31. The increase will be charged to the reserve and will not add to the planned total of public expenditure; increased running costs provision of £1,216,000 and capital cost provision of £74,000 for the processing and production of statistics relating to the general practitioners' research database; most of the increase will be met by the Department of Health from within its existing resources; the remainder will come from various other customers. The payments will be taken in as increased appropriations in aid; increased capital costs of £2,565,000 for the refurbishment of Drummond gate, Pimlico. £600,000 will be funded from the Treasury's own end year flexibility entitlement, and the remaining costs will be met by the Metropolitan police and taken in as increased appropriations in aid; increased running costs provision of £177,000 and capital costs of £123,000 for the national health service tracing services project, and further capital costs of £650,000 for the Department of Health's existing number replacement project. The increases will be met by the Department of Health from within its existing resources and taken in as increased appropriations in aid; increases in running costs provision of £5,000 from the Security Facilities Agency for security advice, £67,000 from the Department of Health for legal services, £90,000 from the Department for Education and Employment for the labour market statistics and £92,000 from the Department of Transport for balance of payments work. All these will be met from existing resources.

TRANSPORT

M1 Slip Road Viaduct

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he instructed work to begin on the slip road viaduct at junction 2 of the M1 motorway to allow it to carry 44-tonne vehicles; how much the project will cost; and when he expects it to be completed. [19]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking him when he instructed work to begin on the slip road viaduct at junction 2 of the M1 motorway to allow it to carry 44 tonne vehicles, how much the project will cost and when he expects it to be completed.

Consulting Engineers were instructed on 4 April this year to examine options for strengthening the slip road viaducts to carry vehicles of up to 44 tonnes complying with current Construction and Use Regulations for combined road/rail transport. Preparatory site work was started on 21 October. The main strengthening contract is out to tender and is due to start in December 1996 with completion during the Spring of 1997.

The overall cost of the project is estimated to be £4m.

Motorways and Trunk Roads

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at how many places on the national, motorway and trunk road motorway (a) speed limits are imposed as a result of a maintenance problem awaiting attention, (b) areas of carriageway or hard shoulder have had access restricted because of a maintenance problem awaiting attention, (c) signs have been erected to warn of a slippery surface and (d) weight restrictions have been imposed as a result of structures unable to carry vehicles of up to 38 tonnes gvw. [243]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Robert Ainsworth, dated 4th November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking at how many places on the motorway and trunk road network (a) speed limits are imposed as a result of a maintenance problem awaiting attention, (b) areas of carriageway or hard shoulder have had access restricted because of a maintenance problem awaiting attention, (c) signs have been erected to warn of a slippery surface and (d) weight restrictions have been imposed as a result of structures unable to carry vehicles of up to 38 tonnes gvw.

At the present time, temporary speed restrictions apply at the following locations:

M1 Junction 1 Southbound

A40 at Golden Valley Bridge in Gloucestershire

A42 at Lount in Leicestershire and at 13 separate locations on the A14 in Cambridgeshire and Suffolk.

At these places areas of the carriageway or hard shoulder have been coned off pending maintenance work:

M1 at Smithywood in South Yorkshire

M1 at Birdwell Quarry in South Yorkshire

M1 at Stainborough in South Yorkshire

M1 Junction 1 Southbound

Signs have been erected to warn of a slippery surface as follows:

M62 Junction 29 Eastbound Slip Road

M62 Junction 33 Eastbound Slip Road

M62 Junctions 32-33 in West Yorkshire

M62 Junction 32 Westbound Slip Road

A1 Darrington Southbound Slip Road in West Yorkshire

A1 Womersley Slip Road in West Yorkshire

A1 Redhouse Northbound Slip Road in South Yorkshire

A5 Catthorpe Crossroads in Warwickshire

At these locations the problem is generally deformation of the road surface. There will also be other places where a routine survey of skidding resistance indicates a possible problem and the need for closer investigation. Signs warning of a slippery surface are erected at these locations too while these further investigations are carried out.

Finally, structures supporting motorways or all-purpose trunk roads which are currently restricted to vehicles of less than 38 tonnes are:

A13 Movers Lane Flyover in East London

A40 Golden Valley Bridge in Gloucestershire

Road Contracts

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amount spent on (a) accountants, (b) lawyers, (c) consultants and (d) other professionals in relation to design, build, finance and operate road contracts since their inception. [20]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking if he will list the amount spent on (a) accountants, (b) lawyers, (c) consultants and (d) other professionals in relation to Design Build Finance and Operate road contracts since their inception.

The information you have requested cannot be disaggregated for reasons of commercial confidentiality.

However, we can disclose that the amount spent on accountants, lawyers and technical advisors since 1994 in support of the Design Build Finance and Operate (DBFO) programme totals £13.5m. This figure does not include consultants appointed to design schemes which subsequently became subsumed within a DBFO project.

Maritime Search and Rescue Operations

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations requiring helicopter support in (i) the Dover strait, (ii) St. George's channel and (iii) the North sea over the last three years; [1054]

(2) what is the number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations occurring in (i) the Dover strait, (ii) St. George's channel and (iii) the North sea over the last three years; [1053]

(3) what was the number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations involving British military and civilian services around United Kingdom coastal waters over the last three years; [1055]

(4) if he will list (a) the number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations occurring around United Kingdom coastal waters requiring support from foreign search and rescue services over the last three years, (b) the date of those incidents, (c) the location of those incidents and (d) the nationality of those services involved; [1056]

(5) what consultation has been conducted with representatives of foreign search and rescue services over the recent changes to helicopter search and rescue cover within the United Kingdom. [1014]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Ms Glenda Jackson, dated 29 October 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about search and rescue operations, helicopter support in those operations and recent search and rescue helicopter consultation.

The number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations requiring helicopter support in the (i) Dover Strait, (ii) St George's Channel and (iii) The North sea over the last three years were:

	1993	1994	1995
(i) Dover Strait	82	59	33
(ii) St. George's Channel	2	Nil	1
(iii) the North Sea	887	1,166	991

These figures represent total helicopter call-outs and do not differentiate between incidents when a helicopter was the only rescue unit from those when it participated with other rescue units, nor should they be taken to imply that a helicopter carried out an actual rescue.

Dover Strait is defined as Dungeness Point to North Foreland out to the Anglo-French median line.

St. George's Channel is defined as the area to the east of the Anglo-Irish median line bounded by lines drawn in the north from Arklow (Republic of Ireland) to Bardsey Island and in the south from Carnsore (Republic of Ireland) to South Bishop lighthouse. It does not include Cardigan Bay.

The North Sea is defined as an area between North Foreland on the east coast to the Magnus Platform off the north–east coast of Shetland and out to the median line.

The recorded number of maritime search and rescue operations occurring in the last three years for (i) Dover Strait, (b) St. George's Channel and (iii) the North Sea were:

	1993	1994	1995
(i) Dover Strait	439	731	544
(ii) St. George's Channel	5	3	1
(iii) The North Sea	3,019	3,027	3,929

The number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations co-ordinated by HM Coastguard in the United Kingdom Search and Rescue Region over the last three years were:

1993: 9,590

1995: 12,220.

Some of these incidents will have involved the Ministry of Defence. The Agency has no records of SAR operations by the MoD other than those involving HM Coastguard.

The number of recorded maritime search and rescue operations occurring around the United Kingdom coastal waters where support was supplied by foreign search and rescues services was:

(a)

1993: Nil

1994: 3

1995: 6.

The dates and locations of the incidents and nationality of the services involved were:

No consultation has been conducted with representatives of foreign search and rescue services over recent changes to helicopter cover in the United Kingdom since neither the UK nor foreign services take account of each other's coverage in determining the location of their rescue facilities. However, foreign search and rescue services are kept advised of any changes in coverage by the Coastguard Agency through regular liaison meetings.

Air Crashes

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) civilian light aircraft and (b) helicopter crashes have taken place in each of the last five years, giving the figures to the latest available date. [1152]

Mr. Bowis: The number of accidents involving civilian light aircraft, with a maximum total authorised weight below 2,300 kg, and helicopters in each of the last five years is as follows:

	Light aircraft	Helicopter
1992	8	3
1993	3	5
1994	11	3
1995	8	1
1996 (to date)	8	4

These figures include mid-air collisions and collisions with ground, water or wires, but not accidents occurring on the ground at aerodromes.

Air Traffic Control

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many aircraft were affected by the air traffic control delays occurring on 23 August. [1446]

Mr. Bowis: I understand from the Civil Aviation Authority that on August 23 there were 5,072 flights through UK airspace, of which 740 were delayed by more than 10 minutes as a result of air traffic control restrictions in both UK and European airspace.

Traffic Enforcement

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those measures undertaken by his Department to improve the targeting of vehicle and traffic enforcement. [1505]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of the Vehicle Inspectorate agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ron Oliver to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning measures undertaken by the Department to improve the targeting of vehicle and traffic enforcement.

To improve our targeting capability, the Vehicle Inspectorate has done, or is doing, the following:

(a) Since November 1991, we have recorded all checks on mechanical condition of vehicles on a computerised database to enable identification of Operators with a poor history or whose vehicles have not been seen.

(b) We are currently linking annual test results to Operators, again to identify those with a poor history.

(c) We have trialled weigh-in-motion sensors which may have a role to improve the selection of vehicles brought in for weighing and the times of the day that weight checks should be run. The results are currently being evaluated.

(d) Over the next 12 months, we will be equipping all our Vehicle and Traffic Examiners with laptop computers so that they have access at the roadside to substantial parts of our operator and vehicle records. Through either mobile telephones or mobile data links, they will have access to all records.

(e) This year we are setting up 6 regional intelligence units to improve the collection and analysis of information.

(f) This year key targets for VI were agreed which give greater emphasis to the outcomes of our work, rather than the inputs, and which encourage Examiners to target their work. These targets will be developed further next year to encourage concentration on more serious cases.

HGV Spot Checks

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the number of silent checks aimed at detecting drivers interfering with tachograph records for each of the last 12 months; [1514]

(2) what percentage of heavy goods vehicle spot-checks were undertaken (a) between the hours of 1900 and 0600 on weekdays and (b) at weekends for each of the last two years. [1515]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of the Vehicle Inspectorate executive agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ron Oliver to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about the number of silent checks aimed at detecting drivers interfering with tachograph records for each of the last 12 months; and the percentage of HGV spot-checks undertaken (a) between the hours of 1900 and 0600 on weekdays and (b) at weekends for each of the last 2 years .

Details of the number of vehicles silent checked with the aim of detecting tachograph interference are as follows:

Month	HGV	PSV	Total
1995
October	404	96	500
November	605	46	651
December	630	[1]3,799	4,429
1996
January	246	535	781
February	262	140	402
March	310	172	482
April	477	78	555
May	447	149	596
June	632	698	1,330
July	576	866	1,442
August	756	354	1,110
September	305	122	427

[1] The use of this resource as a significant PSV enforcement tool was reviewed and as a result a special nationwide exercise was carried out in December.

Data on the percentage of HGV spot checks undertaken a) between 1900 and 0600 on weekdays and b) at weekends is not available separately. The total percentage of out-of-hours spot checks carried out between 1900 and 0600 and at weekends (against an agreed 5% minimum target) for each of the last 2 financial years is:

1994/95: 9.25%

1995/96: 7.49%.

Rail Driver Fatigue

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedures his Department has put in place to ensure that the research currently being undertaken by British Rail on the effects of driver fatigue will be disseminated to all rail operating companies. [1435]

Mr. Watts: This is a matter for British Rail and the Health and Safety Executive. BR will be disseminating the information to the train operating companies which are under BR's ownership at the time the study report is issued. BR has undertaken to convey any findings which have a significance for safety to other train operators.

HSE is aware of the project and will be discussing the results with BR and the researcher. HSE will ensure that any implications for safety are drawn to the attention of those operators which need to be made aware of the results.

Air Bags (Children)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what work his Department has (a) undertaken and (b) commissioned on the dangers posed by air bags to children in rear-facing child seats. [1469]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 25 October 1996, Official Report, column 11.

Air Security

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the last three years the number of inspections undertaken by Transec staff on (a) airlines, (b) airports in the United Kingdom and (c) overseas airports. [1433]

Mr. Bowis: UK airlines and airports, as well as those foreign airlines operating in the UK, were subject to the following number of security inspections in each of the last three years. Figures are also shown for the number of visits to overseas airports to assess the security afforded to and conducted by British airlines.

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Airlines	504	433	663
Airports	475	583	531
Overseas	101	72	33
Totals	1,080	1,088	1,227

Inspectors visited UK airports and airlines on many other occasions, mainly to audit and test their operations.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by airport the number of security breaches recorded by Transec for the last 12 months. [1508]

Mr. Bowis: It would be inappropriate for security reasons to provide this information. Whenever breaches are identified, appropriate rectification action is taken.

Re-signing (London)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the decision was taken to postpone the re-signing project in London; and when he expects work to commence. [1470]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question about when the decision was taken to postpone the re-signing project in London and when he expects work to commence.

The decision was taken at the end of September. It remains a high priority project and will be back in the programme as and when funding allows.

Driving Tests

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions in each of the last five years driving test candidates have been allowed to proceed with a driving test without a signed driving licence. [1438]

Mr. Bowis: Mandatory presentation of a signed driving licence by a candidate to an examiner at the start of a driving test was not introduced until 1 July 1996. We are unaware of any ordinary driving tests that have proceeded since that date where the candidate did not hold a valid licence or evidence that such a licence existed.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been invested in the infrastructure of the west coast mainline by (a) Railtrack plc and (b) the Department of Transport, (i) in each year since 1993 and (ii) since May 1996. [1374]

Mr. Watts [holding answer Thursday 31 October]: It is not for the Department to invest in the west coast main line. Railtrack was formed on 1 April 1994 and therefore would not hold investment information before that date. However, the company has confirmed the following investment details for each financial year since 1994:

1994–95: £47.6 million

1995–96: £50.9 million

1996–97: £70.1 million.

Railtrack is planning to spend a total of £1.35 billion to renew the core infrastructure and is prepared to spend a further £150 million on a passenger upgrade.

Diesel Fuel (Spillages)

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into preventive measures to stop diesel fuel spillages from vehicles. [1932]

Mr. Bowis: None. Legislation is already in place aimed at preventing the spillage of diesel fuel from vehicles.

Taxis (Pedestrian Deaths)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many pedestrians have died after being hit by taxis in each of the past 10 years. [1942]

Mr. Bowis: The number of pedestrians reported to have been hit by taxis in each of the past 10 years is shown in the following table.

Fatal pedestrian casualties from single vehicle accidents involving a taxi and pedestrian, by severity: GB 1986–95

	Casualties

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is the average age of mark 1 rolling stock currently in operation on the rail network; and if he will make a statement; [1877]

(2) how many mark 1 rolling stock are currently in operation in the UK rail network. [1876]

Mr. Watts: The latest figures held centrally show the position as at 31 March 1995 and these are shown as follows. The rolling stock companies were privatised last year and the current position is a matter for them.

Summary of Mark 1 Rolling Stock on lease as 31 March 1995

National Bus Pension Fund

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what action he is taking to pass to the trustees of the National Bus pension fund the moneys paid to the Government in respect of the fund; and how much money is involved; [1924]

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of his response to the report of the pension ombudsman into the National Bus Company pension inquiry. [1923]

Mr. Watts: The pensions ombudsman has issued his final determination on a complaint against the trustees of one of the pensions funds of the former National Bus Company—the bus employees superannuation trust. The complaint relates to the arrangements under which a surplus in the fund of £103 million, after tax, was paid to my Department in 1990. The trustees, to whom the determination is directed, are in touch with my Department about it. The Department is considering the determination and taking legal advice before replying to the trustees. It may be necessary and appropriate to ask the courts to make a ruling on the complex issues involved, including the sum involved should repayment of the surplus be required.

I will inform the House of my response to the trustees.

Rail Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on automatic train protection. [1878]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the answers to questions on this subject on 29 November 1995, Hansard, volume 267, columns 785–86, and 23 July 1996, Hansard, volume 282, columns 137–38.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport under what current circumstances HGVs over 38 tonnes can use United Kingdom roads. [1573]

Mr. Watts: The following categories of vehicles may exceed a gross weight of 38 tonnes:

(1) Certain 6-axle articulated vehicles and vehicle/trailer combinations carrying containers or swap-bodies to or from a railhead as part of a combined transport journey, up to a maximum weight of 44 tonnes.

(2) Vehicles carrying abnormal indivisible loads or designed for special purposes.

(3) Locomotives pulling trailers and when operating under a permit issued by a highway authority.

Eurostar

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the operation of Eurostar trains north of London. [1987]

Mr. Watts: The Department has received no recent representations about regional Eurostar services.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1277]

Mr. Bowis: The information is not available in the form requested.

The spend on advertising is:

1991–92: £4,667,000

1992–93: £5,759,000

1993–94: £4,256,000

1994–95: £4,518,000

1995–96: £6,493,000.

The spend on hospitality is:

1991–92: £102,000

1992–93: £127,000

1993–94: £220,000

1994–95: £123,000

1995–96: £106,000.

Public relations and entertainment expenditure is contained within the above figures.

The figures relate to the Central Transport Group only, and exclude information on agencies which could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received any assistance from the Department with child care. [1294]

Mr. Bowis: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies, we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be inappropriate for us to request this information from staff.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1260]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply given by the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) to the hon. Member for Cunningham, South (Mr. Donohoe) on 7 June 1996, volume 278, column 593.

M20 Widening (Sandling)

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest estimate for the final cost of widening the Sandling stretch of the M20. [1882]

Mr. Watts [holding answer Friday 1 November]: The estimated total outturns given in the trunk roads in England 1994 review was £118.7 million, excluding VAT. It is not our practice to publish updated estimates while final accounts remain to be settled.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Nursery School Gardens

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research she has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned regarding the educational benefits of having nursery schools with on-site nature gardens; and if she will make a statement. [1589]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government wish to encourage schools to make the best use of all their resources, both indoors and outside. The Department has a good record of research into the educational value and effective management of outdoor resources for all types of school, including nursery schools.

In the mid-1980s the Department, the Countryside Commission and several local education authorities jointly commissioned research whose main conclusions reached a wide audience through the 1990 Department of Education and Science publication "The Outdoor Classroom".

The Department intends shortly to publish further advice entitled "School Grounds: a guide to good practice". This will also draw on commissioned research and the experience of the Learning Through Landscapes trust.

South African Undergraduates

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many undergraduate students from South Africa were studying in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years and at five-year intervals between 1970 and 1990, broken down by ethnic origin and course of study where available. [1947]

Mr. Forth: The available information is as follows:

Full-time students from South Africa studying at undergraduate level in the UK[1]

	Thousands
1970–71	[2]0.1
1975–76	[2]0.1
1980–81	0.2
1985–86	0.1
1990–91	0.4
1991–92	0.4
1992–93	0.2
1993–94	0.2
1994–95	0.2
1995–96	0.2

[1] For the years prior to 1994–95 the figures cover undergraduate students in all HE and FE establishments; for 1994–95 and 1995–96 the figures cover HE establishments only.
[2] Includes postgraduates.

Readily available information on the ethnicity of students from individual overseas countries is available only for 1994–95 and 1995–96. However, levels of non-response and the magnitude of the numbers involved prevent meaningful information from being provided for students from South Africa. Similar considerations apply regarding course of study.

Employment Service (Computers)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what undertakings were given by the Employment Service to Mr. Thomas Docherty in respect of remedying the faults in the NUBS2—national unemployment benefit system—computer programmes; and which undertakings have been implemented to date; [1567]

(2) how many former students and others have paid excess taxation as a result of administrative errors by the Employment Service through faults in the NUBS2—national unemployment benefit system—computer programmes; and what sums of money were involved; [1569]

(3) for what reasons (a) students and (b) others have been given non-cumulative codes by the Employment Service on ceasing a period of unemployment benefit and taking up full-time employment; [1571]

(4) if the Employment Service has complied with pay-as-you-earn regulations in the issue of code numbers to former students taking up work and ceasing to be on unemployment benefit; [1598]

(5) what priority was given to the introduction of the jobseeker's allowance, in respect of work on his Department's computer system; and how many people were diverted from the NUBS2—national unemployment benefit system—programme to the JSA project; [1599]

(6) when she first evaluated reports that the NUBS2—national unemployment benefits system—Employment Service computer system was faulty; and what was the date of inception of the system; [1566]

(7) what reports she has received from the Inland Revenue about the taxation policy of the Employment Service regarding the accuracy of and procedures followed by the Employment Service in the initial taxation of (a) former students and (b) others; when she evaluated these comments; and what action she took; [1568]

(8) what factors underlie the decision to allow the Employment Service to administer the taxation of former students; and what plans she has to transfer this work to the Inland Revenue; [1570]

(9) if she will list the faults identified in the Employment Service computer programme; when they were identified; how many clients have been affected and in what ways; and what action has been taken to remedy the deficiencies; [1572]

(10) on what occasions the Employment Service submitted requests to the change control board to remedy errors in the Employment Service computer affecting the taxation of former students; and what responses it has received; [1597]

(11) what changes to improve the tax system were postponed to accommodate the jobseeker's allowance programme. [1601]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G Fogden to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 4 November 1996:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your questions concerning tax issues. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I will answer the questions in the order they will appear in Hansard.

Question 1567:

In his correspondence with the Agency Mr Docherty has not sought any undertakings, nor were any given.

Question 1569:

It is not possible to provide an exact figure of the number of clients affected. However, from mid June through to the end of July the number of claims registered reaches a peak. This peak can be attributed to full-time education leavers. Based on these figures, and taking into account the phased installation of the NUBS2 system (between February 1992 and September 1994), we estimate that up to 70,000 clients were affected in each of the four years in question. These figures assume that all ex-student clients found employment within the same tax year as they made their claim. As this will not have been the case it is fair to say that these figures are if anything over-estimates. It has proved impossible to obtain figures for the amounts of tax involved.

Questions 1571 and 1598:

(a) Due to a programming error with the NUBS2 computer system, students who have never worked and signed off in the same tax year were incorrectly allocated a non-cumulative tax code.

(b) Other claimants who are unable to supply a P45 from their previous employer are correctly allocated a non-cumulative code until IR can provide us with an up to date tax record. For some people, this may not have occurred before they find new employment. This is in accordance with the PAYE regulations.

Question 1599:

As it was new legislation, Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) had to be given the highest priority. It was therefore essential that the Employment Service could meet all its commitments up to and following the introduction of JSA. I cannot provide details of the number of people who moved from NUBS2 to the JSA project as there was a constant exchange of staff between the projects, according to workload and priorities.

Question 1566:

The Agency was first notified of a potential problem regarding tax codes in a letter from the Inland Revenue (IR) dated 19 December 1994. Investigations in January 1995 confirmed that this was indeed a fault with our system. The NUBS2 system national roll-out program began in February 1992.

Questions 1568 and 1570:

Since (the Act) in 1982, the Agency and previously the Department of Employment have been required to operate a modified PAYE system, and has maintained communication with IR in doing so. In the course of these exchanges, IR raised this problem with us. As always, we take on board their comments and endeavour to work with them to find solutions to any problems identified. Following their intervention, a clerical solution was developed to identify and rectify these cases. As the responsibility for the processing and payment of JSA now resides with the Benefits Agency (BA), any questions regarding future plans should be addressed to them.

Question 1572:

At the time of handover (7 October) to BA there were 512 identified problems with the NUBS2 system. All these problems had interim solutions. Instructions were issued to all offices in the form of a problem guide. System manuals were amended to reflect how the system was operating. In addition, assistance was available to offices at both a regional and at national level. A total of 1673 faults have been identified with NUBS2 over the period that it has been operational. It is not possible to state the number of clients affected, as system problems frequently had no impact on the client. Any system fault that adversely affected the client was always given the highest priority for rectification.

Question 1597:

The change request was originally submitted to the Change Control Board in March 1995. At that time it was accepted as a high priority and scheduled for introduction in October 1995. In September/October 1995 the change was reviewed in the light of the emerging priorities arising from the legislation to introduce JSA. It was then decided that since the problem would be corrected in the Jobseeker's Allowance Payments System, it should be controlled by clerical procedures. The Change Control Board reviewed the position again in January and May 1996, but on each occasion was unable to reverse their decision.

Question 1601:

The only other tax change involved was one regarding notifications of direct payments of Income Support from the Benefits Agency to the client. In this case additional procedures were combined with the action to take upon receipt of a direct payment notification which ensured that this problem had no affect on our clients.

I hope this helps to clarify the position.

Workstart

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many people are involved in the workstart programme; [2239]

(2) if the contract for the survey being conducted by Martin Hamblin Research was awarded by competitive tender; what is its value; and when the research will be published; [2241]

(3) how many people in the workstart programme are being questioned for the survey currently being undertaken by Martin Hamblin Research; and how many of these have agreed that their records can be handed over to a third party. [2240]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Ian McCartney, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the number of people currently on Workstart, and the research and contractual issues surrounding this programme. This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

Since 1993, the Employment Service has been assessing the viability of paying a subsidy to employers to recruit very long term unemployed jobseekers. Three pilot studies have been undertaken to test various delivery models, with a fourth currently underway and linked to the Project Work initiative.

Results for the period ending September 1996 show that a total of 2,946 people have taken part in the programme.

The contract for the research on the Workstart programme was put out to competitive tender, the successful contractors being Martin Hamblin Research. The value of the most recent survey was £8,175 (excluding VAT), the results of which are due to be published in Autumn 1997.

In the Workstart survey recently concluded, one hundred and fifty people were interviewed. Acting as principal for the Employment Service, Martin Hamblin Research processed all monitoring information relating to the programme. This relationship is recognised under the Data Protection Act and individual data is treated anonymously at all stages of the analysis.

Following up individuals in this manner is standard procedure. It is important to evaluate our initiatives to assess how they achieve their wider objectives, the help they give to individuals, and their value for money.

I hope that this is helpful.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the number of NVQs at each level awarded through youth training and training for work in each London training and enterprise council in the last two reporting years. [2302]

Mr. Paice: As the reply will consist of a large amount of data, I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my reply in the Library.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what sources of funds she proposes grant-maintained schools will use for expansion as envisaged in clauses 3 and 5 of the Education Bill. [2323]

Mr. Forth: Clauses 3 and 5 of the Education Bill enable grant-maintained schools to expand their capacity by up to 50 per cent. and to add or remove nursery, sixth form or boarding provision without central approval. Where capital funding is required, schools will need to consider the full range of options, including their annual formula-based capital allocations, commercial borrowing and the private finance initiative. As to recurrent funding, the existing mechanism will continue to apply, with the overall resources available being determined through the annual public expenditure settlement.

Nursery Vouchers

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many nursery vouchers have been spent in the autumn term 1996 in (a) reception classes in primary schools, (b) nursery classes in primary schools, (c) nursery schools and (d) the voluntary sector in the city of Westminster; [1389]

(2) how many nursery vouchers have been spent in the autumn in (a) reception classes in primary schools, (b) nursery classes in primary schools, (c) nursery schools and (d) the voluntary sector in the London borough of Wandsworth; [1384]

(4) how many nursery vouchers have been spent in the autumn term 1996 in (a) reception classes in primary schools, (b) nursery classes in primary schools, (c) nursery schools and (d) the voluntary sector by Norfolk county council. [1388]

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of nursery education vouchers used in each type of provider in the phase 1 local authority areas to date in the autumn term 1996 is set out in the following table. Information on voucher use broken down between maintained reception classes, nursery classes and nursery schools or between private and voluntary sector providers is not available.

Investors in People UK

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what consultations she had with (a) small business organisations and (b) Department of Trade and Industry Ministers and officials before selecting new members and reappointing existing members to the board of Investors in People UK. [1226]

Mr. Paice: All new and re-appointed members of Investors in People UK were appointed under the guidelines laid down by the Commissioner for Public Appointments. The posts were advertised nationally and all organisations were free to make nominations. Final appointments were made by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment against the requirements of the posts.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if she will list those members of the Investors in People UK board whose main business activity involves the running of a small firm; [1227]

(2) if she will list the members of the Investors in People UK board together with the businesses with which they are associated and the number of employees in each of those businesses. [1228]

Mr. Paice: On the board of Investors in People UK there are a number of directors whose main business activity involves the running of a firm with less than 200 employees. These include:

Mrs. Susan Tood, Mr. Martin Henry, Mr. Nick Hutton, Mr. Carl Hadley, and Mr. Patrick Hall.

The following table lists all directors and their main business. The Department does not hold details of the number of employees in all the businesses with which the directors are associated.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much her Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1271]

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 16 October 1996, Official Report, column 997.

Public Selection

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list, in relation to the proposed selection of pupils for secondary schools by ability or aptitude, as provided in clause 4 and schedule 1 of the Education Bill (a) the purpose for which these two qualities are directed and (b) how these qualities differ from the purposes to which pupils not so selected are to be directed in (i) the same and (ii) other schools. [2331]

Mr. Robin Squire: Different schools have different strengths, and some choose to specialise in particular areas of the curriculum. The provisions set out in clause 4 and schedule 1 of the Education Bill will give admission authorities the flexibility to offer a proportion of places to pupils with particular aptitudes, or of high ability in one or more subjects or generally, without seeking central approval.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what requests she has received for the imposition of a statutory duty on (a) maintained secondary schools and (b) secondary grant-maintained schools for an annual governors' review to introduce, or vary, selective admission procedures, naming the persons or bodies concerned in each case. [2333]

Mr. Squire: My right hon. Friend has received no such specific request. She is, however, aware that many parents, for whom it is not presently a possibility, wish to have the option of selective education. It is right that schools should consider on a regular basis whether the wishes of parents and the needs of children in their areas would be better served by the introduction extension or of selective admission arrangements.

Cash Limits

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what changes she plans to make to cash limits and running cost limits on votes within her responsibility for 1996–97. [2626]

Mr. Robin Squire: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IX, vote 1, Department for Education and Employment: programmes and central services, will be amended as follows:

Class: IX

Vote: 1

Existing cash limit: £8,744,945,000

Change: £197,000

New cash limit: £8,745,142,000.

The cash limit for class IX, vote 1 will be increased by £197,000 from £8,744,945,000 to £8,745,142,000. The cash limit increase is the net effect of the following: take-up of entitlements announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326–31, under the end-year flexibility schemes for capital expenditure (£2,189,000) and EU structural funds (£177,283,000—offset by receipts from the EU and increased appropriations in aid). We have also funded a £300,000 increase in specialist schools expenditure from our non-voted provision. Transfers to other Departments include £263,000 to the Department of Health for the drugs challenge fund; £2,000,000 to the Home Office for school security measures; £67,000 to the Department of the Environment as a contribution towards the Manchester bomb appeal; and £90,000 to the Office for National Statistics to provide funding for staff moved under machinery of Government changes. These transfers to other Departments have been partially offset by a transfer of £128,000 from the Home Office to fund the costs of probation service training.

The running costs provision for class IX, vote 1 will be increased by £558,000 from £366,705,000 to £367,263,000. This is the net effect of the transfer of £648,000 from the Department of Trade and Industry towards work done on an agency basis by the Department for Education and Employment, offset by the transfer to the Office for National Statistics of £90,000.

The increase will be offset by savings or charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Community Care

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many community care assessments have been carried out since 1 April 1992. [1102]

Mr. Moss: The new community care assessment arrangements came into operation on 1 April 1993. In the period since, up to 30 June 1996, a total of 24,983 assessments have been carried out.

Carers

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many carers assessments have been carried out since 1 April following guidance relating to the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 in Northern Ireland. [1103]

Mr. Moss: Statistics relating to cases where individual carers have requested a separate assessment of their needs are not collected centrally.

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps are being taken to monitor the implementation of the guidance issued relating to the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 in Northern Ireland. [1107]

Mr. Moss: Health and social services boards were directed by the Department to offer carers a separate assessment of their own needs if so requested, as elsewhere in the UK, from 1 April 1996. This requirement was reinforced by its inclusion in "Regional Strategy for Health and Wellbeing 1997–2002". The Department will monitor the implementation of the guidance as part of the overall strategy monitoring arrangements.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1264]

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1247]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is contained in the table:

The table shows the position as at 29 October 1996.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Lenient Sentences (Appeals)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Attorney-General how many requests to appeal against the leniency of sentences he has received this year; how many he has supported; and how many sentences have been increased as a result. [269]

The Attorney-General: During 1996 the Law Officers have considered the sentences imposed upon 115 defendants. Forty-nine of these cases have been referred to the Court of Appeal. In relation to the 42 cases which have been heard to date, the sentence has been increased in 32, or 76 per cent.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was his Department's estimate at the time of its introduction for the reduction in claims for incapacity benefit which would result from the introduction of the all work test; and what was the reduction of claims finally realised for each year since 1995. [756]

Mr. Burt: No estimate was made of the effect of the all work test on new claims for incapacity benefit. In 1995–96 there was a reduction in new incapacity benefit claims of around 100,000 over the previous year.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are his plans for the future of Great Ancoats street Benefits Agency office. [1958]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Tony Lloyd, dated 1 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what are his plans for the future of Great Ancoats Street Benefit Agency (BA) Office.

To enable BA to achieve improvements in customer service and further efficiency improvements as part of the Change Programme, Area Directors are looking critically at their estate in an effort to reduce running costs, whilst maintaining the service delivery to their customers.

The need for a customer outlet at Bishopgate House, Great Ancoats Street, Manchester is currently under review. The number of callers to this office has decreased over recent months leading to a close examination of the cost effectiveness of providing a service from this office. A further reduction in callers is expected with the introduction of Job Seekers Allowance.

No firm decisions have yet been made and a full consultation exercise with customer liaison groups and representatives has yet to be undertaken. I will ensure that you will be afforded the opportunity to comment on any more detailed proposals at that stage.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend the regulations governing backdating of social security payments; and if he will make a statement. [180]

War Widow's Pension

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of his total liability for war widows' pension from the changes brought in by the Pensions Act 1995 since 19 July 1995; and what has been the actual expenditure over that period. [183]

Mr. Heald: The estimated cost of restoration of war widows' pensions under the Pensions Act 1995 to the end of September 1996 is £30 million.

Information on actual expenditure to date on such pensions is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons have successfully claimed a war widow's pension on the basis of the provisions of the Pensions Act 1995. [184]

Mr. Heald: As at 30 September 1996, 14,474 successful claims for restoration of a war widow's pension have been made under the provisions of the Pensions Act 1995.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total budget for war widows' pensions in the last year for which figures are available; and how many claimants were involved. [185]

Mr. Heald: Expenditure on war widows' pensions in 1994–95 was £293 million. As at 31 March 1995, 48,405 war widows' pensions were in payment.

Fraud Hotline

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the projected annual cost to operate the freephone hotline number of social security fraud. [186]

Mr. Heald: The cost of running the national benefit fraud hotline is expected to be in the region of £1.5 million per annum.

The savings from early calls to the service is almost £1 million. It is estimated that total savings so far will be in the region of £5 million.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1246]

Mr. Burt: Excluding casual staff, 66,163 women—68 per cent. of the total—were employed by the Department at 1 October 1996.

The Department does not incur expenditure on public relations.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appeals concerning the all work test were heard by social security appeal tribunals in the March 1996 quarter; and how many and what percentage were decided in the appellant's favour, where the appellant (a) attended the hearing but was not represented, (b) was represented but did not attend, (c) attended and was represented and (d) did not attend and was not represented. [2023]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

Mr. Evans: The following nine venues have ceased to be used by social security appeal tribunals since January 1996: Mansfield, Bridgend, Merthyr Tydfil, Pontypridd, Gloucester, Yeovil, Huddersfield, Scunthorpe and Paisley.

The independent tribunal service has no plans to close any other venues.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library copies of the standard letters sent to appellants by clerks of social security appeal tribunals, disability appeal tribunals and child support appeal tribunals directing them to notify the clerk if they wish an oral hearing to be held. Mr. Evans: These standard letters are the responsibility of the president of the independent tribunal service, His Honour Judge Bassingthwaighte, who will write to the hon. Member shortly.

SCOTLAND

Dounreay Nuclear Plant

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what notification he has received of prosecutions to be undertaken under (a) the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 and (b) the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 by the procurator fiscal for the nuclear installations inspectorate and Scottish Environmental Protection Agency in regard to radiological incidents at the Dounreay nuclear plant. [1089]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am advised by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that the procurator fiscal at Wick has received a report from the nuclear installations inspectorate concerning the installation at Dounreay. The procurator fiscal is investigating the matter and will report the outcome of his inquiries to Crown counsel for instructions.

Clydebank and Anniesland Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current salary of the principal of Clydebank college. [1602]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The annual accounts for 1995–96 for Clydebank college disclose that the principal's remuneration, excluding employers' pension contributions, was £64,000 for the financial year.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the role of the college boards in respect of the merger of Clydebank and Anniesland colleges. [1606]

Mr. Robertson: In the event that both boards of management decide to pursue the possibility of a merger, they would be required to undertake a full option appraisal. This would have to be undertaken in line with the Scottish's Office's merger principles and criteria, which were sent to the Association of Scottish Colleges in June of this year. These criteria require full consultation with students, staff and relevant local and national interests.

Mr. Worthington: To ask The Secretary of State for Scotland what salary has been offered to the incoming principal of Clydebank college; and what contribution to it will be made by the Scottish Office. [1604]

Mr. Robertson: The salary of a college principal is a matter for the college board of management. The Scottish Office will not be contributing to the salary of the incoming principal of Clydebank college, but will be providing financial assistance to the college to enable the incoming principal to take up post before the retiring principal leaves, thus permitting a period of overlap. The scale of this assistance has still to be determined.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current salary of the principal of Anniesland college. [1603]

Mr. Robertson: The annual accounts for 1995–96 for Anniesland college disclose that the principal's remuneration, excluding employers' pension contribution, was £48,000 for the financial year.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what date the principal of Anniesland college accepted the post of principal of Clydebank college; on what date his representative met the principals and chairs of both colleges; and on whose initiative the meeting was arranged. [1607]

Mr. Robertson: The principal of Anniesland college accepted in principle the post of principal of Clydebank college on 9 September. The principals and chairmen of both colleges met, at his invitation, an official of the Scottish Office on 12 September, for exploratory discussions on the issues that the boards would have to consider if they decided to examine merger.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what have been the financial terms on which the principal of Clydebank college has accepted early retirement; and what contribution the Scottish Office has made to this settlement. [1605]

Mr. Robertson: The terms of any severance package are matters for the college's board of management to determine with the principal.

From the current phase of the colleges restructuring fund the Scottish Office has provisionally allocated Clydebank college £10,677 towards the principal's lump sum enhancement.

M80

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to announce the route for the new M80; and if he will make a statement. [1754]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The results of the consultation exercise recently carried out on the two route options are still being analysed. My right hon. Friend will consider the merits of each route once this and other relevant information is available to him.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he received on the two options proposed for the M80 extension between Stepps and Haggs; how these were distributed between the two options; and if he will make a statement. [1221]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Forty-three representative bodies gave evidence at the consultation forum held to determine views on the two route options. In addition, over 800 letters have been received. A number of concerns were raised in relation to each of the route options, and analysis of the responses is still in progress.

Mr. Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce his decision on the line of route for the proposed M80 motorway between Stepps and Haggs; and if he will make a statement. [1224]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The results of the consultation exercise recently carried out on the two route options are still being analysed. My right hon. Friend will consider the merits of each route once this and other relevant information is available to him.

Castle Urquhart

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to reach a conclusion on Historic Scotland's proposals for car parking and related commercial developments at Castle Urquhart, Inverness-shire; and if he will make a statement. [1591]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is not a matter for my right hon. Friend, as the application is currently before the planning authority, Highland council. I understand that the council is in the process of setting up a working party to meet with Historic Scotland to consider the way forward.

"Wildlife and Agriculture in Scotland"

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has sent to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds about the recommendations in "Wildlife and Agriculture in Scotland: A Secure Future". [1003]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: My noble Friend the Minister with responsibility for agriculture and the environment has been sent a copy of this report, which he hopes to discuss with representatives of the RSPB in due course.

Government Expenditure and Revenue Document

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will provide the same information for the 1994–95 "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland" report as that provided for the 1993–94 report, referred to in his answer of 17 October, Official Report, columns 1141–42; and if he will make a statement; [1463]

(2) how many of the 2,250 copies of the "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland" report were distributed in response to people who had written in requesting one and how many were sent out unsolicited; how many staff, and at what grades were involved in the research and writing of the document; what are the average annual costs of employing members of staff at these grades, including the share of running costs and support costs; what percentage of these staff's annual time was concerned with the report and related work; and if he will make a statement. [1464]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Office produced 2,500 copies of the report "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland, 1994–95". The publication date was Monday 21 October 1996 and, to Tuesday 29 October 1996, approximately 600 copies have been distributed. The cost of design, printing and publishing the document was £5,384 and the cost of the launch and publicity was £25. The cost of research staff time involved in its production cannot be identified separately.

Accurate information on the distribution of the "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland, 1993–94" report is not available by the type of detail requested.

The work undertaken by staff on the "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland" reports was carried out as an integral part of their normal work of providing economic advice and statistics and cannot separately be identified.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1258]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At 1 April 1996, there were 2,200 female staff in the Scottish Office core and its executive agencies other than the Scottish Prison Service: female staff accounted for 42 per cent. of the total. At that date, there were 615 female staff in the Scottish Prison Service, accounting for 14 per cent. of the total.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1292]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office operates a number of family-friendly working practices that indirectly assist staff with child care. These include the provision of two contracted workplace nurseries, flexible working hours, alternative working patterns, maternity–paternity leave and paid–unpaid special leave. We do not hold statistics on the total number of mothers or fathers who have benefited from these arrangements.

Green-field Sites

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the total area of green-field sites he expects to be developed in the next five years. [1222]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 1 November 1996]: My right hon. Friend has made no estimates of this nature.

Home Affairs Budget

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much and what percentage of the Scottish Office budget has been allocated to home affairs in each year since 1990 at 1996–97 prices; and if he will list the categories of expenditure. [1476]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The table sets out expenditure by the Scottish Office Home Department, other than on social work services, and Scottish Courts Administration, together with total expenditure within the Secretary of State's responsibility. The table includes expenditure by central Government only: it does not include expenditure by local authorities. Comparisons over years are affected by the Secretary of State taking on responsibility for additional functions. The principal instances are set out in full in chapter 1 of the publication "Serving Scotland's Needs—The Government's Expenditure Plans 1996–97 to 1998–99", Cm 3214, a copy of which is in the Library.

Brown-field Sites

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the total area of brown-field sites which is available for redevelopment; and what estimate he has made of that area to be redeveloped in each of the next five years. [1223]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 1 November 1996]: My right hon. Friend has made no estimates of this nature. However, the hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that information on the amount of vacant and derelict land in Scotland is reproduced in the Scottish Office statistical bulletin environment series "Scottish Vacant Derelict Land Survey 1995", published in October this year. A copy is available in the House Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each district and islands council area the final outturn expenditure for 1995–96 in (a) the housing revenue account and (b) the non-housing revenue account. [1616]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The latest information provided by local authorities on outturn expenditure is set out in the table.

Nursery Vouchers

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many four-year-olds were in (a) private, (b) voluntary and (c) local authority pre-school provision in each of the pilot areas of the nursery voucher scheme, for the latest date for which figures are available prior to the issuing of vouchers. [1823]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The information is set out in the table, except for Argyll and Bute where information is not separately identifiable for the pilot area. It is important to note that children may attend more than one type of pre-school provision.

[2] Numbers at September 1995.
[3] Includes nursery schools/classes and special schools.
[4] Numbers at November 1994.
[5] LA figures include jointly administered facilities and day nurseries.

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what notification he has received in respect of pre-school providers that have gone out of business as a result of competition from other providers in the pilot areas of the nursery voucher scheme. [1825]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: None.

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the vouchers that have been redeemed to date, have been redeemed in (a) the public, (b) the private and (c) the voluntary sector. [1829]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Of the vouchers for which claims had been paid by 25 October, 61 per cent. had been used in the public sector, 13 per cent. in the private sector and 26 per cent. in the voluntary sector. A number of claims had not yet been made, and these proportions will change as outstanding vouchers are submitted.

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) parents and (b) eligible children in each of the pilot areas of the nursery voucher scheme have not taken up the entitlement to apply for a voucher. [1824]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Precise information on the numbers of eligible parents is not available. The four pilot authorities have estimated that there are 3,763 eligible children in the pilot areas. As at 25 October, 3,716 books of vouchers had been issued.

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from pre-school providers outside the pilot areas whose rolls have decreased as a result of the piloting phase of the nursery voucher scheme; and if he will list the providers. [1826]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: My right hon. Friend has received one such representation.

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many providers have received initial validation to accept voucher-bearing children in (a) public, (b) private and (c) voluntary sectors. [1828]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Centres in the pilot areas are registered for the use of vouchers only if they are already subject to inspection by HM inspectorate, or if the HMI, having examined its profile of education provision, is satisfied of their capacity to deliver quality education. There are currently 152 centres registered as eligible to redeem vouchers—64 public sector, 18 private sector and 70 voluntary sector.

Pre-school Education

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many three-year-olds were in receipt of pre-school education in the period 1994–95; and how many have registered since August 1996, broken down by (a) type of provision and (b) unitary authority. [1827]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Information on three-year-olds attending education authority and independent schools, as at September 1994 and September 1995, is set out in the table by unitary authority. While information is collected centrally on the numbers of three-year-olds attending other voluntary and private sector centres, it is not currently possible to identify whether a three-year-old in such a voluntary or private sector centre is receiving education as distinct from care. Information on the number of three-year-olds who have enrolled for pre-school education since August 1996 is not yet available.

Mr. Dixon: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will publish in the Official Report the letter sent to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) giving details of the number of days and hours the House has sat in each of the last 10 years. [1656]

Mr. Newton: The information requested by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey in his oral question to me of 28 October is as follows. A copy of my letter to him of 28 October has been placed in the Library of the House.

Session	Days	Hours
1986–87	109	930
1987–88	218	1,978
1988–89	176	1,581
1989–90	167	1,468

1993–94	154	1,258
1994–95	159	1,313
1995–96	146	1,278

For purposes of comparison with other Sessions, 1986–87 and 1987–88, and 1991–92 and 1992–93 should be aggregated. In each case, these comprised one short and one long Session.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will review the procedure which prohibits the tabling of questions during prorogation. [1193]

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman may wish to draw this point to the attention of the Procedure Committee.

HEALTH

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Royal College of Psychiatrists has finalised its arrangements for the training of its members in mental health law. [1035]

Mr. Burns: No.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if research into the decision making and outcomes of mental health review tribunals has started; who is conducting it; and when it will be completed. [1031]

Mr. Burns: The research which is being undertaken by the Policy Studies Institute began in January 1996 and will be completed by 31 March 1998.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the numbers of psychiatric patients detained (a) under the Mental Health Act 1983 and (b) under other legislation, as a percentage of all admissions to NHS hospitals for psychiatric treatment, in the financial year 1989–90. [1036]

Mr. Burns: The information requested is shown in the table:

Formal admissions to NHS facilities for the financial year 1989–90[1]

England

	Number of admissions	Admission as a percentage of all admissions[3]
Formal admissions under the Mental Health Act 1983	16,974	7
Other Act admissions[2]	59	0

[1] Excludes admissions into Special hospitals.
[2] Other Acts includes Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991, Section 47 of the National Assistance Act 1948, Section 1, 2 and 12 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969, Children Act 1989 and Section 3 of the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973.
[3] All admissions is taken as number of admissions to mental illness and learning disability specialties.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many psychiatric patients aged between 16 and 64 years were (a) discharged from hospital in the 90-day period April to June for which returns are being collected by the NHS executive and (b) readmitted to hospital within 90 days of discharge. [1034]

Mr. Burns: Information on emergency psychiatric readmissions to hospital within 90 days of discharge was collected for the first time during the first quarter of 1996–97.

Between April and June, in the region of 27,000 patients aged 16–64 had been discharged from the care of a psychiatric specialist. During the same period in the region of 5,000 patients aged 16 to 64 were readmitted as emergencies to the care of a psychiatric specialist within 90 days of previous discharge.

Heart and Circulatory Disease

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what has been the cost to United Kingdom industry, in each of the last five years for which figures are available, of sickness absence caused by heart and circulatory disease; [1131]

(2) how many working days are estimated to have been lost, in each of the last five years for which figures are available, due to heart and circulatory diseases. [1130]

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected centrally.

Health Checks (Children)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children have received health checks in each of the past five years. [1099]

Mr. Burns: This information is not collected centrally.

Wheelchair Vouchers

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the basis for determining the value of the proposed wheelchair voucher. [1135]

Mr. Burns: It will be the cost to the national health service of providing a new wheelchair that, in the opinion of the NHS therapist or other qualified professional, would meet the clinical needs of the user.

Speech Therapists

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists per 1,000 population there are in (a) inner London, (b) outer London, (c) Liverpool, (d) Manchester, (e) Newcastle, (f) Leeds and (g) Birmingham. [1126]

Mr. Horam: The precise information requested is not available centrally.

The number of speech therapists employed by the NHS hospital and community health services by health authority areas is available from the Department of Health's statistical tables "NHS Hospital and Community Health Services staff by health authority areas, England 1995"—the latest year available—copies of which are available in the Library. Information on the estimated 1995 population in health authorities is also available from the Library in "Office for National Statistics Monitor for Population and Health: Mid-1995 population estimates for re-organised local and health authority areas in England and Wales".

The number of speech therapists per head of population within health authorities should be interpreted with caution because in some cases the population served by the organisations in each authority may be greater than the population of the health authority itself.

Strokes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his Department's latest estimates of the number of people who have had strokes in each of the latest three years for which figures are available. [1450]

Mr. Horam: Information on the total number of finished consultant episodes with primary diagnosis cerebrovascular disease in national health service hospitals in England is shown in the list:

1992–93: 137,396

1993–94: 145,761

1994–95: 140,413.

Source:
Hospital Episode Statistics, Department of Health.

Mr. Horam: The Secretary of State has not met the Stroke Association in the last year.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the research commissioned by his Department on (a) strokes and (b) related illnesses in each of the last three years. [1448]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is in the following list.

The influence of developmental indices and blood pressure in young adults on risk of stroke and ischaemic heart disease in later life.

Multi-centre trial of out-patient occupational therapy for stroke.

A prospective study of cardiovascular risk-conducted within the framework of the British Regional Heart Study (on—going since 1985).

The treatment of urinary incontinence in stroke patients.

Formulation of guidelines for dental rehabilitation of stroke patients.

Development of an early warning discharge policy following acute stroke.

Co-ordinated stroke audit and research (COSTAR).

Rehabilitation of arm function.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what standards apply to the treatment of strokes; and what steps he is taking to ensure consistency of treatment throughout the United Kingdom. [1452]

Mr. Horam: Clinical standards in the treatment of all diseases are primarily a matter for the relevant professional bodies. Decisions about the best type of treatment to be given in individual cases is for the clinician concerned in consultation with his patient, where this is practicable. The Department's clinical effectiveness programme will help to ensure that all patients have access to services of proven effectiveness, enabling the best use to be made of available resources.

Standards of treatment in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assistance his Department gives to the Stroke Association. [1449]

Mr. Horam: The Stroke Association has received regular funding from the Department for projects to enhance the provision of stroke and coronary heart disease services in primary care. The most recent grant came to an end in 1995–96.

Health Authority Funding

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proposals he has in respect of the future funding of Nottingham district health authority; and if he will make a statement; [1425]

(2) if he will list those district health authorities which currently receive more than 100 per cent. funding on the current formula, giving the percentage funding in each case; [1423]

(3) which district health authorities with teaching hospitals in England are receiving less than 100 per cent. funding using the current formula, giving the percentage funding in each case; [1422]

(4) what additional money would be available to Nottingham district health authority if it were funded to 100 per cent. on the current formula (a) in the current year and (b) in 1997. [1424]

Mr. Horam: If Nottingham health authority were at its weighted capitation target in 1996–97, it would have received an extra £7,029,000.

No decisions have been made regarding 1997–98 allocations or for future years. These decisions are taken annually in the light of the overall level of resources available to the NHS. We are committed to the principle of achieving equity in resource allocation based on weighted capitation as soon as practicable.

Tables showing (i) those health authorities above their weighted capitation target and (ii) those health authorities with a teaching hospital situated within their boundary, which are below their weighted capitation target, will be placed in the Library. However, weighted capitation targets do not reflect any element for the cost of medical education and research. These are funded separately.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to use the test for the molecular marker specific for new variant CJD to screen (a) all cases of spongiform-like disease in humans and (b) all available preserved specimens of brains from cases of degenerative brain disease; and if he will make a statement. [1658]

Mr. Horam: This technique has yet to be fully evaluated and more work needs to be done, including the replication of the technique in other laboratories, before its usefulness as a practical screening tool for new variant Creutzfeldt-Jacob disease can be established. This work will be a priority in our centrally directed programme.

Maternal Deaths

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) direct maternal deaths and (b) indirect maternal deaths registered in England and Wales in 1991 and each subsequent year were of women born in (i) the United Kingdom, (ii) the Republic of Ireland, (iii) the new Commonwealth and Pakistan, (iv) other countries and (v) unstated countries. [1838]

Mr. Horam: The number of direct and indirect maternal deaths in England and Wales for the period 1991 to 1993, the time scale covered by the latest report of the confidential inquiry into maternal deaths was 113 and 85 respectively. Information on country of birth was not available.

Maternal deaths occurring from 1994 onwards are the subject of a continuing inquiry and details will be published in the next report, due in 1998.

Head Lice Treatment

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the reason for the withdrawal of the head lice treatment, derbac, from the NHS prescription list. [1943]

Mr. Malone: Derbac is available on the national health service for the treatment of head lice.

Obstetric Interventions

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued to NHS trusts in connection with obstetric interventions (a) without the consent of and (b) against the expressed wish of the patient. [1843]

Mr. Horam: None. Advice on clinical issues is a matter for the royal colleges and professions involved. It is for clinicians to determine the most appropriate form of treatment, including medical interventions, for individual patients. As far as possible, this should be done with the knowledge and consent of the patient concerned. On the rare occasions when this is not possible, this is ultimately a matter for the courts.

Acute Care

Sir John Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's current definition of acute care. [1002]

Mr. Horam: Clinical practice varies throughout the national health service. Different hospitals use the term "acute care" in different ways.

Keep Warm, Keep Well Campaign

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the projected budget for the keep warm, keep well publicity campaign. [182]

Mr. Horam: The projected spend for the keep warm, keep well publicity campaign in 1996–97 is £550,000.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has issued to local authorities regarding the duties of social services departments where the Benefits Agency out-of-hours service is inoperative. [1429]

Mr. Burns: The impact of the possible withdrawal of the Benefits Agency's out-of-hours service is being assessed.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1286]

Mr. Horam: Information of the parental status of staff is not available.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1269]

Mr. Horam: Information for the financial years 1991–92 to 1995–96 is shown in the table. Functions which are commonly associated with public relations for the Department of Health are carried out by the Department's press and publicity division. The division now includes the public inquiry office and provides direct marketing, print, storage and distribution services for the whole Department. The running costs figures are therefore not comparable over the years. The Department does not have an entertainment budget but official hospitality expenditure has been included which contains both general hospitality and working lunches.

£ million

Financial year	Total advertising expenditure	Press and publicity manpower and running costs	Official hospitality expenditure
1991–92	8.70	1.50	0.17
1992–93	5.05	1.75	0.25
1993–94	6.10	1.90	0.22
1994–95	4.30	2.00	0.23
1995–96	2.35	3.00	0.32

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [1392]

Mr. Horam: The Department is currently consulting on the following proposals for use of the deregulation order-making power:

Children and Young Persons Act 1933:

To allow children under 16 to work longer hours on Sunday;

Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 and the London Local Authorities Act 1991:

To reduce the licensing requirements for skin piercing businesses.

The timing of any reference to the Deregulation Committee will depend on a number of factors, including the outcome of consultation.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1253]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health employed 2,697 women on 1 October 1996. This represented 56 per cent. of the total staff employed.

Cystic Fibrosis Trust

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount has been given in section 64 grant to the Cystic Fibrosis Trust by his Department in 1996–97 and in each of the last five years; and for what purposes. [2047]

Mr. Horam: In the period in question, the Department gave the Cystic Fibrosis Trust the following three-year section 64 project grants:

Family Support Project:

1990–91: £22,000

1991–92: £20,000

1992–93: £18,000.

Family and Adult Support Volunteer Network:

1993–94: £16,000

1994–95: £14,000

1995–96: £12,000.

Cystic Fibrosis Advocacy Project:

1996–97: £25,000

(this grant will continue in 1997–98 and 1998–99).

Multiple Pregnancies

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy with regard to selective termination of pregnancy when such an operation is solely to terminate one or more of the foetuses that make up a multiple pregnancy; and if he will make a statement. [2139]

Mr. Horam: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 clarified the legal position on selective termination of a pregnancy. Whether or not selective termination should take place rests on the opinion of two doctors, formed in good faith, that it is justified within the terms of the Abortion Act 1967, as amended.

Beta-interferon

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the NHS spent on beta-interferon in the first six months of (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1995–96. [2329]

Mr. Malone: Information on the net ingredient cost of all beta-interferon products dispensed in the community in England is shown in the list. Information on the cost of drugs dispensed in hospital pharmacies is not available centrally.

1995

January–June: £63,000.

1996

January–June: £163,000.

Notes:

Data are only available for the first three months of the 1996–97 financial year. In order to provide a six-month comparison period, data are therefore provided on the basis of the first six calendar months for each year.

Figures are rounded to the nearest £1,000, and include the cost of any prescriptions written by hospital consultants but dispensed in the community.

The data are from the prescribing analysis cost system generated by the Prescription Pricing Authority and cover only those prescriptions which were dispensed in the community.

Childhood Leukaemia

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has supported on childhood leukaemia by ensuring that the national database of childhood leukaemia held by the childhood cancer research group remains open; and what plans he has for future funding. [2332]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health supports the childhood cancer research group. A new contract has been placed to run from 1 January 1996 to 31 December 2000 to a value of £350,000 per year. One of the main objectives of the core-funded programme is the development and management of the national registry of childhood tumours, which includes virtually all cases of cancer and leukaemia in children aged 0 to 14 in Great Britain.

Finance

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list in cash terms the baseline allocation figures for each English health authority which have been circulated to finance directors for comment. [2328]

Mr. Horam: A table showing the health authority recurrent baselines will be placed in the Library. These have been circulated to health authorities for validation and may therefore be subject to amendment.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Greyhound Racing

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what assessment she has made of the impact on greyhound racing of the decision to allow a second weekly national lottery draw, in respect of (a) attendances (b) the number of greyhound tracks (c) employment in the industry (d) total revenue accruing to greyhound racing (e) greyhound racing profitability and (f) taxation revenue; [2318]

(2) what assessment she has made as to the impact on the off-course greyhound betting industry of the introduction of a second weekly national lottery draw. [2275]

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made no such assessment. Under section 4 of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993, the Director General of the National Lottery has a duty to exercise his functions in the manner he considers most likely to secure that the national lottery is run with all due propriety, that the interests of participants in the lottery are protected, and subject to these to maximise the revenue to the good causes. The director general judged that the introduction of a midweek draw would be consistent with these duties.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has to meet representatives of the greyhound racing industry to discuss the impact of a second weekly national lottery draw on off-course and on-course betting. [2237]

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to meet the greyhound racing industry. Responsibility for greyhound racing and the gaming industry in general is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

BBC

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the publication of the BBC's statement of promises to viewers and listeners. [2768]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I welcome the publication today of the BBC's first statement of promises to viewers and listeners. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House. The BBC is a unique broadcaster and has a unique relationship with its audience. The new charter and agreement came into effect on 1 May this year. They reaffirm the BBC's independence. That independence requires direct accountability to licence fee payers. The statement of promises forms a new link between the BBC and its audience. It sets out the standards of service that all viewers and listeners can expect from the BBC and the standards against which the BBC board of governors will carry out its annual assessment and report on the corporation's performance. The statement of promises brings to the BBC the principles of the Prime Minister's citizens charter initiative. A summary version will be available to licence fee payers.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many women are currently employed by her Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1248]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 4 November 1996]: My Department, excluding its executive agencies, currently employs 178 women. This is 49 per cent. of the total staff employed by the Department.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by her Department have received any assistance from the Department with child care. [1289]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies, we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be inappropriate for us to request this information from staff and difficult to justify the collection of such data. However my Department, as part of its equal opportunities policy, offers a range of child care facilities including a subsidised nursery place, a subsidised holiday play scheme and standard civil service maternity and paternity provisions; staff also have the opportunity to take extended leave due to family commitments.

Public Houses

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps she is taking to protect the historical heritage of public house names; and if she will make a statement. [1886]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The names of public houses are entirely matters for their owners to decide. Where a change of name of a public house which is listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest involves an alternation to its fabric which would affect its character as such a building, listed building consent would be required from the local planning authority.

DEFENCE

Land Mines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the (a) maximum timed life and (b) self-destruct reliability of (i) area denial and (ii) land mine systems presently in active service with British forces. [391]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The systems concerned are the HB876 sub-munition of the JP233 area denial weapon and the MLRS AT2 scatterable mine. Self-destruction will normally take place in a matter of hours for the HB876; its self-destruct reliability is currently being assessed. The AT2 mine self-destructs within days and has a reliability which has been evaluated as over 99 per cent. Additionally, in each case mine detonation relies on a short-life battery, and any mine that fails to self-destruct will deactivate within a further short period. Precise self-destruction timings for both mines are classified.

There is no other area denial weapon in service with the British armed forces, and no other land mine system in service which has a maximum timed life or a self-destruct capability.

Unidentified Flying Craft

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the reports of encounters by Royal Air Force pilots with unidentified flying craft since 1966 which have not been released to the public; on what grounds they have been retained; and if he will make a statement. [2201]

Mr. Soames: The information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the Royal Air Force's practice as regards investigating sightings of unidentified flying craft which correlate with radar information; if there is a requirement to investigate such phenomena by scrambling aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [2200]

Mr. Soames: Unidentified contacts penetrating UK airspace or the UK air defence region are identified by all available means, including interception.

Gulf War Veterans

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the people who are currently employed on his Department's Gulf veterans medical assessment programme. [1687]

Mr. Soames: The personnel currently employed by my Department's Gulf veterans medical assessment programme are:

Military:

2 consultant physicians (1 group captain RAF and 1 lieutenant colonel Royal Army Medical Corps)

1 state registered nurse (squadron leader RAF)

1 medical administrator (flight sergeant RAF)

Civilian:

1 personal secretary

1 administrative officer

2 administrative assistants

1 typist

In addition, the Middlesex hospital undertakes diagnostic testing at the request of the MAP consultants.

Married Quarters Estate

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the sale of the married quarters estate to Annington Homes. [2750]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Contracts for the sale were exchanged on 24 September. The transaction was completed today.

Menwith Hill RAF Station

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what right of access the Health and Safety Executive has to Menwith Hill station; if it makes regular health and safety checks; and how many times it has made official visits to the Menwith Hill station. [2153]

Mr. Soames: The Health and Safety Executive has the same right of access to RAF Menwith Hill as at any other MOD establishment. The Health and Safety Executive have visited the site once in June 1996.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what systems are in place to monitor levels of non-ionising electro-magnetic radiation at Menwith Hill station; who is responsible for such monitoring; if their reports are made available to the public; and what precautions are being taken to protect the health and safety of (a) the base population, (b) the local community and (c) the local environment from the effects of non-ionising electro-magnetic radiation emitted by operations at Menwith Hill station. [2157]

Mr. Soames: There is no specific legal requirement to monitor non-ionising electro-magnetic radiation. However RAF Menwith Hill observes and operates in accordance with the National Radiological Protection Board guidelines and the Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will commission a report on the state of the environment at Menwith Hill station, similar to the internal US environmental compliance status survey of 1992; on what occasions his Department has commissioned similar reports in the past; and if he will commission and publish such reports on a regular basis. [2158]

Mr. Soames: No. The commissioning of compliance status surveys is the sole responsibility of the US authorities. These surveys are carried out to US criteria and I am satisfied that the standards applied fully meet those applicable in the UK. Therefore my Department has not commissioned any similar reports and does not intend to do so.

United States Visiting Forces

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which British bases are occupied by United States visiting forces; how many United States personnel are stationed at each; for what reasons sites used by United States visiting forces are designated as RAF stations; when and by whom this decision was taken; what parliamentary scrutiny of this decision has taken place; and if he will make a statement. [2155]

Mr. Soames: United States visiting forces are present at the following bases. Numbers of personnel at each base are shown in brackets.

RAF Alconbury/RAF Molesworth/RAF Upwood: (1,365)
RAF Croughton/RAF Barford St. John: (530)
RAF Daws Hill/RAF High Wycombe/RAF West Ruislip: (600)
RAF Digby: (15)
RAF Edzell: (280)
RAF Fairford/RAF Welford: (180)
RAF Fylingdales: (1)
RAF Hythe: (5)
RAF Lakenheath/RAF Feltwell: (5,330)
RAF Menwith Hill: (1,200)
RAF Mildenhall: (4,450)
RAF Northwood: (10)
RAF Oakhanger: (1)
RAF Spadeadam: (5)
RAF St. Mawgan: (320)
RAF Uxbridge: (15)

The American presence is chiefly Air Force and as the sites are parented by the RAF they are designated as RAF stations. Parliament has the same opportunity to scrutinise this as with any other administrative decision.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2618]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The capability of MOD's existing computer systems to recognise the millennium date change remains under investigation and has been the subject of recent MOD-wide guidance requiring those responsible for current and planned information systems to assess fully the extent of the problem. Until these assessments have been made it will not be possible to assess the cost effects of the year 2000 date change.

Operation Seanuts

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the waste disposal programme, Operation Seanuts. [2601]

Mr. Soames: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of the letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

TRANSPORT

Railway Inspectorate

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many complaints have been received by Her Majesty's railway inspectorate relating to unqualified contractors working on the rail network in the last 12 months. [1445]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 14 October 1996, Official Report, column 972.

Clapham Rail Crash (Recommendations)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the recommendations of the 1988 Clapham rail crash report which have not been put into operation. [1871]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 24 July 1996, Official Report, column 347.

Watford Rail Crash

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the passenger train involved in the Watford train crash of 8 August was equipped with automatic train protection; and if the protection was operating at the time of the crash. [1873]

Mr. Watts: I am advised by the Health and Safety Executive that neither train involved in the accident near Watford on 8 August was fitted with automatic train protection.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish the accident report into the Watford rail crash of 8 August. [1868]

Mr. Watts: The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate is continuing its independent investigation into the cause of the collision. A report of the findings will be published by HSE when its inquiries are complete.

Railway Accident Reports

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he has taken to prevent the naming of individual railworkers in advance of the publication of a railway accident report. [1869]

Mr. Watts: I deplore the leaking of railway accident reports and the premature and unauthorised release of the names of individual rail workers in advance of the publication of any railway accident report, and especially in advance of decisions being taken on whether any legal proceedings are to be taken as a result of any official investigation.

Rolling Stock (Safety)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the safe operating life of mark 1 rolling stock. [1875]

Mr. Watts: Mark 1 rolling stock was built between 1951 and 1974, although the oldest stock currently in use all year round dates from 1956.

Mark 1 rolling stock was designed and constructed to have an expected life of between 30 and 40 years and is subjected to regular inspection and maintenance at planned intervals to ensure that it is suitable for service use.

There is no reduction in the level of operating safety of mark 1 rolling stock during its life provided that it is maintained appropriately.

Rail Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the cost of installing and operating automatic train protection on all trains on the network. [1872]

Mr. Watts: None. The British Railways Board estimated in 1994 that, assessing the project over a 20–year period, the net total cash cost of a network–wide ATP system would be about £759 million. The independent Health and Safety Commission advised that the introduction of ATP, as piloted, on a network–wide basis was not reasonably practicable, and that there were alternative safety investments which would be likely to yield greater effectiveness in terms of lives saved, and better value for money.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what (a) legislation and (b) other rules and regulations cover safety requirements for rail transport after privatisation; and if he will indicate in particular which legislation or regulations apply to the number of standing passengers permitted as a ratio of seated passengers; [1852]

(2) what (a) legislation and (b) other rules and regulations covered rail transport safety before rail privatisation; and if he will make a statement. [1835]

Mr. Watts: The statutory requirements concerning railway safety which pre–date rail privatisation are referred to in annex 11 of HM Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways' annual report for 1994–95, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. These provisions are still in force.

Since the start of rail privatisation in 1994, the following safety regulations have been made under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974: the Railways (Safety Case) Regulations 1994; the Railways (Safety Critical Work) Regulations 1994; the Railways and Other Transport Systems (Approval of Works, Plant and Equipment) Regulations 1994; the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Rail Regulations 1996; the Packaging, Labelling and Carriage of Radioactive Materials by Rail Regulations 1996. In addition, the Health and Safety Commission has recently submitted to the Secretary of State draft Level Crossings Regulations and draft Railway Safety (Miscellaneous Provisions) Regulations. The latter would repeal and replace most of the pre–1994 provisions.

There are no statutory provisions which cover the ratio of standing to seated passengers.

Heathrow Flight Path

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the annual figures for the number of aircraft flying over Lewisham, East to and from Heathrow for each of the past five years. [2129]

Mr. Bowis: The information is not held in the form requested. Radar track recordings are not normally retained by National Air Traffic Services Ltd. for longer than 30 days. Heathrow Airport Ltd. holds information on aircraft tracks beyond a radius of 12 miles from the airport for the first 10 months of 1996 only, but analysis of this would incur disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes there have been recently to the flight path of aircraft flying to and from Heathrow over Lewisham, East. [2202]

Mr. Bowis: The main departure route from Heathrow towards Dover used by Heathrow traffic during easterly operations was last adjusted by one degree on 19 August 1993 to compensate for the accumulated movement of magnetic north since the previous such adjustment made in 1986. There are no fixed routes for landing aircraft. Aircraft normally land and take off into the wind. Lewisham, East is overflown by Heathrow departing traffic during easterly operations, which occur about 25 per cent. of the time during an average year, and by Heathrow landing traffic during westerly operations, which occur about 75 per cent. of the time during an average year. Lewisham, East is situated between the holding stack, located since 1971 over the Biggin Hill and Orpington area, and the extended runway centre lines followed by landing traffic on final approach to Heathrow during westerly operations. It is also overflown during easterly operations by traffic landing at London City airport.

Franchising Director

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the contractual restrictions placed on the retiring director of the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising in respect of professional relations with companies which had applied for a franchise to operate passenger rail services. [2219]

Mr. Watts: Under the terms of his original appointment, the former Director of Rail Franchising cannot join any company with railway interests within two years of termination except with the consent of the Secretary of State.

Bus Transport

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to prevent the creation of regional monopolies in bus transport. [2281]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 10 July 1996 by my hon. Friend the then Minister for Local Transport and Road Safety, Official Report, column 204.

Rail Services

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the responses to the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising passenger service requirement consultation draft for Great Eastern Rail services supported the proposals in the draft specification; and if he will place in the Library copies of all responses received. [2218]

Mr. Watts: Consultation responses from local authorities and rail users' consultative committees focus on changes sought to draft passenger service requirements rather than explicitly confirming support for those elements of the draft PSR which are considered to be satisfactory. OPRAF made a number of changes from the consultation draft of the Great Eastern PSR as a consequence of representations made by consultees. The changes are described in a document which was circulated to consultees when OPRAF published the final PSR.

OPRAF has no explicit agreement with consultees that enables it to make public their submissions, by placing them in the Library or by other means. The hon. Member may wish to approach consultees direct on this matter. I will write to the hon. Member with details of consultees.

Railway Stations

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many railway stations have been (a) opened and (b) re-opened over the last 10 years. [2039]

Mr. Watts: My Department's records show that since 1986 there have been 144 railway stations opened and 26 stations re-opened.

M20 (Ashford)

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the latest vehicle flow on the M20 motorway at Ashford. [1999]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Mr. Lawrie Haynes to Sir Keith Speed, dated 5 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question about traffic flows on the M20 at Ashford.

The Highways Agency does not have traffic counters on the M20 between Junction 9 (Ashford East) and Junction 10 (Ashford West). However, the 1995 Annual Average Daily Traffic flow on the adjoining section between Hollingbourne and Ashford (Junctions 8–9) was 18,500 eastbound and 18,400 westbound.

Highway Clearance

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers highway authorities have to charge (a) vehicle owners and (b) property owners for clearing the highway following an accident or obstruction; and what limits are placed on the levels of such charges. [2576]

Mr. Watts: Section 149 of the Highways Act 1980 enables highway authorities to require the removal of any thing deposited on the highway so as to constitute a nuisance, or to do it themselves and recoup the costs from the person responsible, but this may not be sufficient to cover all situations in which debris needs to be removed.

My Department proposes shortly to lay regulations under section 150 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 that will, among other things, explicitly enable local highway authorities to recoup costs incurred in connection with the clearance of accident debris. The charge will be recoverable from the person responsible for the deposit of the debris.

A38

Sir Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects (a) design and (b) other preparatory work to commence on the proposed A38 trunk road improvement between Carkeel and Stoketon Cross; and if he will make a statement. [1633]

Mr. Watts: The A38 Saltash to Stoketon Cross improvement scheme remains in the main trunk road programme. It will be brought forward when funds allow.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2613]

Mr. Bowis: Main operational systems have been assessed and either replacement projects are being or will be programmed or rectification costs are or will be the subject of commercial negotiation. Where systems are being replaced, the cost effect of the millennium date change is not separately identified. A number of assessment projects are addressing the remainder of the Department's systems and cost estimates will be available only when decision are taken on the treatment of each system.

Air Traffic Control

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amount spent in the last three months on (a) lawyers, (b) accountants, (c) consultants and (d) other professionals in consultations relating to privatisation of the national air traffic control service. [12]

Mr. Bowis [pursuant to his answer, 29 October 1996, Official Report, c. 100]: The Department of Transport spent about £4,000 plus VAT on legal fees in connection with this issue, with no expenditure under the other sub-headings. In addition, the Civil Aviation Authority spent approximately £25,000 plus VAT on legal fees and approximately £125,000 plus VAT on other consultants.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Lord President of the Council what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2607]

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 13 June 1996, Official Report, column 290.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2612]

Mr. Streeter: The Department is continuing its assessment of the impact of the millennium date change on its computer systems. Until this work is complete, it will not be possible to estimate the likely costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Attorney-General what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department, with particular reference to those operated by the Crown Prosecution Service. [2619]

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service has identified all current CPS software systems which need to be checked for the millennium problem. An analysis of the staff effort needed for testing suggests that about one man year of work is involved. Work is also under way to identify other costs, such as replacement of outdated hardware.

The Serious Fraud Office estimates that a few man months of work will be required to make the necessary changes to its systems, if it becomes apparent that those systems will still be required in the new millennium. A number of those systems may in fact be replaced before the year 2000.

In the case of the Treasury Solicitor's Department and Government Property Lawyers, no significant cost effects are expected.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

International Criminal Court

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government preparations for attendance of a UN plenipotentiary diplomatic conference in late 1998 to discuss the establishment of an international criminal court. [1881]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We are active participants in the preparatory process to consider the establishment of an international criminal court. However, a date has not yet been set for a conference to consider a statute for such a court. We will make preparations for such a conference once a date has been set.

Torture

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Mexican Government over their use of torture. [1927]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have made clear our concerns to the Mexican Government, who acknowledge the problem and are seeking to resolve it. We are supporting a police reform programme being implemented by the Ministry for Public Sector Reform, in order to help raise human rights awareness throughout the various police forces.

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Turkish Government regarding the implementation of the Council of Europe recommendations regarding torture. [1931]

Mr. David Davis: We have urged the Turkish authorities to implement the recommendations made following the visits of the European committee for the prevention of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment to Turkey, and to publish three reports. We welcomed the Turkish Government's decision to invite the committee to make a further visit to Turkey in August to look at prison conditions.

Heads of Government Summit

Sir Anthony Durant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy regarding the proposals contained in recommendation 1303 (1996) of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe relating to a second summit of Heads of State and Government of the Council of Europe; and if he will make a statement. [2205]

Mr. David Davis: We accept that a second summit would serve a useful purpose. We expect a decision on whether or not to hold such a summit in the second half of 1997 in Strasbourg to be made at the 99th session of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on 7 November. We take full note of the items listed in recommendation 1303 (1996) as potential elements for a draft declaration following a second summit, but we believe that any draft text should evolve after further consideration by member states, in consultation with the Parliamentary Assembly.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages and disadvantages of each repeal. [1396]

Mr. Hanley: This Department issues very few rules and regulations. There are no plans to repeal any rules or regulations by the end of 1996.

Morwenstowe Interception Station, Bude

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what classification and status the Morwenstowe interception station at Bude in Cornwall has been given; at what cost it was built; who paid for it; who owns the radomes and equipment; what flags it flies; how many personnel work there and from what organisations; and if he will identify the name, nationality and employer of its commander. [2154]

Mr. Rifkind: The composite signals organisation station at Morwenstowe is directly subordinate to GCHQ. It is Government policy not to provide details about the operations or expenditure of the security and intelligence agencies, or about their staff.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Foreign Minister of South Africa in respect of Lockerbie. [2416]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: None.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2615]

Mr. Hanley: In line with central guidance, this Department has completed an initial study which shows that up to 60 per cent. of its software applications may be affected. Further study is taking place to determine the risks and costs. The Overseas Development Administration is taking similar action. We estimate that all problems will be resolved and that systems will be fully 2000-resilient by 31 March 1999.

Argentina

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Ministers authorised the reassessment of the military embargo against Argentina which led to the supply of naval engine parts; and which Ministers were informed of the outcome of this reassessment and when. [1065]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 29 October 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the statement in this House on 24 October by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The advice given by the Department of Trade and Industry to Rolls-Royce on the licensability of the Tyne engine and components did not constitute either a variation or a relaxation of the embargo, nor did it reflect any reassessment of policy on the embargo.

TREASURY

National Debt

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the principal factors underlying the changes in the levels of the national debt since November 1990. [899]

Mr. Waldegrave: Changes in national debt principally reflect the level of Government borrowing, which increased substantially in the recession in the early 1990s. The public sector borrowing requirement has since fallen; the latest forecast for 1996–97 is for a PSBR as a per cent. of gross domestic product of half its peak level in 1993–94.

Beer

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to restrict the amount of beer for personal consumption which can be imported from the rest of the EU into the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [1165]

Mr. Oppenheim: Under the provisions of the Excise Duty (Personal Reliefs) Order 1992, based on Council directive 92/12/EEC, travellers may bring into the UK alcohol, purchased for their own use, duty and tax paid in another EU country, without further liability to UK duty and tax. There is no restriction on the quantity of such goods that an individual can purchase. The directive, however, provides indicative levels, agreed by all member states, which can assist Customs officers in determining whether goods are in fact intended for commercial use—for beer the level is 110 litres. Although there is no fiscal frontier, a person holding such goods may be challenged by a Customs officer anywhere in the UK, and must be able to satisfy the officer that goods in excess of the indicative levels are not for a commercial purpose.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to equalise the duty on beer with that applying in other European countries; and if he will make a statement. [1166]

Mr. Oppenheim: The Government would like to see some movement towards the equalisation of duty rates on beer within the EU through the mechanism of the European Commission's biennial review of the minimum rates of excise duty. The next review is due by the end of 1996. Meanwhile, in reaching his Budget decisions, the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes a range of factors into account, including the rates of duty applied by our near neighbours in the European Union.

Public Sector Debt

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present size of the net public sector debt; and what was the equivalent figure in (a) November 1990 and (b) May 1979. [809]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Debt figures are not available on a monthly basis; published figures record the stock of debt at the end of each financial year. A provisional estimate of net public sector debt at end March 1996 of £323 billion was published in the "Summer Economic Forecast". Equivalent figures for end March 1991 and end March 1979 were £154 billion and £91 billion respectively. Such comparisons are not particularly meaningful since they take no account of the impact of inflation or the size of the economy. As a per cent. of money GDP, net public sector debt in 1996 was somewhat lower than in 1979.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the net public sector debt per income tax payer; and what was the figure in (a) November 1990 and (b) May 1979. [812]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Debt figures are not available on a monthly basis; published figures record the stock of debt at the end of each financial year. Based on the provisional estimate of net public sector debt at end March published in the "Summer Economic Forecast", NPSD per income tax payer at end-March 1996 was £12,700. Equivalent figures for end-March 1991 and end March 1979 were £5,900 and £4,300 respectively. Such comparisons are not particularly meaningful since they take no account of inflation. Real net public sector debt per income tax payer was marginally lower in 1996 than in 1979.

Transport Fuel Duty

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received from road haulage organisations on the current level of transport fuel duty; and if he will make a statement. [1748]

Mr. Oppenheim: I and my ministerial colleagues have received numerous representations from individuals and companies involved in road haulage. I saw representatives of the Road Haulage Association as recently as 29 October.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals his Department is currently evaluating with regard to local exchange trading systems and the Inland Revenue; and if he will make a statement. [2306]

Mr. Jack: The Inland Revenue is not aware of any particular problems with local exchange trading systems and has no plans to evaluate these schemes.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of LETS and the Inland Revenue; and if he will make a statement. [2305]

Mr. Jack: Traders who operate within a local exchange trading system are taxable on their trading profits, just like traders who operate outside of such a scheme.

Ministerial Visit (Switzerland)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the purpose of his visit to Switzerland between 2 and 4 December 1994. [2208]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My visit to Switzerland was a private one made at my own expense.

Unremunerated Work

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the Government plan to take forward the commitment, given in the global platform for action resulting from the fourth UN world conference on women, to measure unremunerated work which is outside the usual national account conventions. [2923]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Office for National Statistics is working to construct a satellite account on the household, in line with recommendations in the 1993 UN system of national accounts. Part of this project is theoretical and will be overseen by an interdepartmental working group on satellite accounts. The rest of the project would involve asking people how they use their time, to find out how much unpaid work is done. At present, ONS is designing a pilot survey which would take place in 1997. An article on time use data in the construction of household accounts appeared in the July edition of Economic Trends.

European Monetary Union

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of recent progress towards European monetary union. [703]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 30 October 1996]: The Florence European Council stated that economic and monetary union will start, in accordance with the EC treaty, on 1 January 1999, but it is too early to make realistic and certain assessment of progress and there are still considerable uncertainties. The decision on which countries are adjudged to meet the conditions to join EMU in 1999 will not be made by Heads of Government until early 1998, based on an assessment by the council of Economic and Finance Ministers, ECOFIN, at that time.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the latest date by which the United Kingdom will need to make a decision on whether to participate as a founder member of European monetary union if the existing timetable is adhered to; and if he will make a statement. [811]

Mr. Clarke: [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The existing timetable is still based on the assumption that EMU will start on 1 January 1999 although that is open to considerable uncertainty in practice. Protocol No.11 to the EC treaty provides that in the event of EMU starting on 1 January 1999, the United Kingdom may notify its intention to move to the third stage before 1 January 1998.

Government Financial Deficit

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the ability of the United Kingdom to reduce its general Government financial deficit to below the 3 per cent. level necessary to meet the Maastrict treaty convergence criteria. [810]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The summer economic forecast projected a general Government deficit in the UK of 3 per cent. in 1997–98. Updated forecasts will be published with the Budget, on 26 November 1996.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) UK receipts from CAP as a proportion of UK gross domestic product, and (b) Scottish receipts from CAP as a proportion of Scotland's gross domestic product. [1534]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 31 October 1996]: The following figures refer to 1994 gross domestic product, as that is the last year for which a figure for Scottish gross domestic product is currently available. UK receipts from CAP represented 0.4 per cent. of UK GDP, excluding the UK continental shelf. Scottish receipts from CAP represented 0.6 per cent. of Scottish GDP.

Venture Capital

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the size of each company invested in by a venture capital trust, together with the sum invested and (b) the number and size of companies in which more than one venture capital trust has invested, together with the number of venture capital trusts which have invested in each. [1225]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 4 November 1996]: We expect the venture capital trusts to give information of the type requested in their annual reports.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the past five financial years. [1268]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Expenditure on advertising, public relations and official hospitality by HM Treasury in the last five financial years is included in the published running costs.

Car Parking

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the revenue which would be raised by the treatment of car parking space provided to employees as a taxable benefit; and if he will make a statement. [1622]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Before 1988, the benefit of employer-provided workplace car parking was taxable under the general rules for valuing benefits in kind. This benefit was exempted in 1988, on practical grounds, at a cost then estimated at £5 million a year. The revenues that would now be raised by specific charging rules would depend on those rules—for example, the valuation mechanism and any exclusion for low-value parking or infrequent users.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

EU Maternal and Child Health Budget Line

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many and which projects have been funded by the EU maternal and child health budget line for (a) 1994, (b) 1995 and (c) 1996; and what is the total amount of funding allocated for these projects; [2008]

(2) what is the total amount of commitment appropriation for the EU maternal and child health budget line (B7–5047) for (a) 1994, (b) 1996 and (c) 1997. [2007]

(3) which agencies and non-governmental organisations are responsible for projects funded by the EU maternal and child health budget line for (a) 1994, (b) 1995 and (c) 1996; in which countries the projects are conducted; and what is their duration. [2009]

Dr. Liam Fox: The projects funded are as follows:

1994

1. Commonwealth Regional Health Community Secretariat: support for Commonwealth reproductive health programme in east, central and southern Africa, duration 40 months.
2. Marie Stopes International (UK): testing the effectiveness of a community based network in Bolivia, duration 26 months.
3. Marie Stopes International (UK): studies on a family life education programme and a family planning education programme in Kenya, duration 20 months.
4. International Planned Parenthood Federation Resources Development Department: expanding family planning services in the Caribbean—Belize, Guyana, St. Lucia—in the wider context of reproductive health, duration 28 months.

1995

This budget line had no appropriations for that fiscal year.

1996

1. University of Wales: review of three maternal and child health projects funded by the EC, duration five months.
2. Walter Kessler: study on the problems of integrating Maternal and Child Health into financial health programmes, duration 14 months.
3. Commonwealth Regional Health Community Secretariat: operation research to demonstrate the impact of a package of low cost and sustainable intervention to reduce perinatal, neonatal and maternal mortality and morbidity in selected districts in Zimbabwe, duration 28 months.

The total amount committed for the EU maternal and child health budget line was 2,306,250 ECU for years 1994 to 1996. No funds are committed for 1997.

Kenya

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what human rights considerations are applied in selecting candidates from the Kenyan military and police for training. [2295]

Dr. Liam Fox: Candidates for training are nominated by the Kenyan Government. We examine candidates' professional qualifications.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of United Kingdom trainers currently training the Kenyan police have been training them since 1991. [2296]

Dr. Fox: None.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which years the Kenyan police have received training in the United Kingdom since 1991. [2299]

Dr. Fox: Since 1991, 26 members of the Kenyan police have received training in the United Kingdom: five in 1991, one in 1992, four in 1995, and 16 in 1996.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what human rights elements have been included in the training of Kenyan police since 1991. [2284]

Dr. Fox: A number of trainees attended the international commanders course at the Bramshill police training college in the UK which includes a specific component on human rights. In addition, we are currently helping the Kenyan police force develop two in-country training courses: a senior management training course which concentrates on the responsibility and accountability of the police to the community; and a course on the care and treatment of the public and prisoners. Both courses are concerned with awareness of human rights issues.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what human rights components were included in the training of Kenyan military personnel during 1995 in the United Kingdom and Kenya. [2283]

Dr. Fox: The detail of our bilateral training programmes for military personnel is regarded as confidential between Governments. We have no reason to believe that our training programmes have anything other than a positive impact on human rights practices in other countries.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and what grade of Kenyan military personnel trainees were trained during 1995 in the United Kingdom and Kenya. [2282]

Dr. Fox: The detail of our bilateral training programmes for military personnel is regarded as confidential between Governments.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Horticultural Training

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what Government training schemes available for (a) school leavers, (b) people unemployed, (c) people unemployed for over six months but under 12 months, (d) people unemployed for over 12 months but under two years and (e) people unemployed for over two years include a significant proportion of training in horticultural skills, stating for each the number of places available and what percentage that is of the total number of places offered on other available schemes; and if she will make a statement. [1680]

Mr. Paice: Training and enterprise councils operate three main programmes on behalf of the Department for Education and Employment. The training delivered through each of these is geared to local labour market needs. Youth training offers the opportunity for 16 and 17-year-olds to receive training leading to a recognised vocational qualification of at least NVQ level 2 or equivalent. Modern apprenticeships are a similar scheme with an upper age limit of 25 in which to complete the programme. Training for work is aimed at people between the ages of 18 and 63 who have been unemployed for six months or more, although other disadvantaged groups, for example, people with disabilities and people needing literacy or numeracy training, have immediate eligibility regardless of the length of unemployment. From these programmes, the following figures are given:

England and Wales — April to June 1996

	Starts in horticultural trades	Percentage of all starts
Youth training	260	1
Training for work	640	2
Modern apprenticeships	20	Less than 1

Source:
YT, TfW, MA Starts databases.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what research she has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned regarding the educational value of horticulture; and if she will make a statement; [1593]

(2) what research she has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned regarding training schemes for teaching organic methods of horticulture; and if she will make a statement. [1657]

Mr. Paice: We have not evaluated or commissioned research in this area.

Local Education Authorities (Capital Spending)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the capital spending by each local education authority in each of the last six years for which figures are available; and what have been the Government capital allocations to each local education authority in each of those years and in each subsequent year for which allocations have been made (a) in cash terms and (b) in real terms. [2123]

Mrs. Gillan: As the information is contained in a number of tables, I will write to the hon. Member and place copies in the Library.

Pupils (Behavioural Problems)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list, consequent to the duties laid on local education authorities in clause 26 of the Education Bill requiring them to publish the arrangements they make in relation to pupils with behavioural problems, (a) how such problems shall be defined and by whom, (b) who shall determine the extent and nature of the necessary physical and human arrangements and (c) how such is to be financed. [2326]

Mr. Forth: We intend that all of these matters will be determined by local education authorities. But each of them may need to feature in the guidance which my right hon. Friend will issue, and on which we plan to consult widely over coming months.

Teachers (In-service Training)

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will review the practice of conducting in-service training during school working days; and if she will make a statement. [2006]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects governing bodies and head teachers to organise in-service training for their staff in a way which causes the least possible disruption to their pupils' education. Since 1 September 1995, governing bodies have been able to pay teachers for attending training at weekends and during school holidays using funds which would otherwise be spent on supply cover for courses during school hours.

Schools Access Initiative

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what provisions have been made for the continued funding of the schools access initiative. [2206]

Mrs. Gillan: No decision has been taken yet on whether to repeat the schools access initiative in 1997–98. The decision will be taken in light of the overall resources available for education at the end of the public expenditure survey round.

Departmental Information

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list in date order the information sent by her Department to (a) primary, (b) special and (d) grant-maintained schools during the academic year 1995–96. [1624]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is given in the following table. It is not possible to give separately the figures for special schools. Since this period, the Department has taken steps to reduce significantly the amount of written material that it sends to schools. Although schools will continue to receive automatically essential information, for example, on the law, it is now for them to decide what other information they want and to order it from a twice-termly list of recent publications.

Schools (Money Reserves)

Mr. Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money local education authority schools in Suffolk and Norfolk had in reserve, deposit and holding accounts (a) as a total amount and (b) as a percentage of the total available to be spent on schools in each of the last three years. [2048]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following table shows in column 1 for Norfolk and column 3 for Suffolk, the total financial balances, net of any deficits, held at the end of each year by the schools covered by each local education authority's scheme for the local management of schools. The figures have been derived from the LMS outturn statements produced by the LEAs for the relevant years. Columns 2 and 4 show, for each LEA respectively, the balances expressed as a percentage of the general schools budget—less capital expenditure and capital finance costs—shown at the beginning of each year in the LMS budget statement.

1995–96[1]	7,929	3.9	10,916	5.2

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by her Department. [2617]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has made an initial assessment of 5,000 days effort for the 1997–98 financial year. A project has been set up to identify all the Department's computer systems which will be impacted by the millennium date change. This projet will provide detailed costings covering all the work needed up to the millennium and take forward those changes where they are cost justified.

Youth Unemployment (Cambridgeshire)

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of 18 to 24-year-olds in the constituency of South-East Cambridgeshire are unemployed; and if he will make a statement. [980]

Mr. Paice [holding answer 29 October 1996]: The Office for National Statistics does not provide claimant unemployment rates by age below national level, and considers that sample sizes in an area as small as a parliamentary constituency would be too small for reliable estimates of unemployment to be made from the quarterly labour force survey. However, data from the 1991 census show an unemployment rate of 7.7 per cent. for 18 to 24-year-olds in the constituency of South-East Cambridgeshire.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for acknowledging his error in stating—Official Report, 22 May 1996, column 274—that one in four 18 to 24-year-olds in South-East Cambridgeshire are unemployed. I am happy to accept that his misleading remark was made accidentally.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by her Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1288]

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies, we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be inappropriate for us to request this information from staff and difficult to justify the collection of such data.

The Department is, however, able to give information on the number of staff who have received child care assistance.

Subsidised places are provided at four playschemes and two nurseries at the DFEE head office sites. Two hundred and twenty-one female and 101 male staff have used the play schemes or nurseries in the past 12 months.

Staff can claim additional child care expenses arising from attendance at a residential training course or from disruption to normal work routine. Thirty-five women and nine men have claimed additional child care expenses from the Department in the past 12 months.

The Department also offers a range of provisions which can help staff balance home and home and work responsibilities:

Career breaks enable staff to take up to five years off work to cope with domestic responsibilities.

Paid and unpaid special leave is available to allow carers to deal with emergency child care cover.

Staff can apply to have a flexible work pattern such as part time, job sharing and home working.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many women are currently employed by her Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1255]

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The DFEE excluding executive agencies currently employs 2,662 women. This is 53 per cent. of the Department's total employees.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Drugs)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the overall cost to the Prison Service of introducing mandatory drug testing including capital investment involved in building appropriate facilities and (b) the cost to the Prison Service per drug test, indicating (a) Prison Service expenditure and (b) costs billed to non-Prison Service contractors, excluding capital investment involved in building appropriate facilities. [1500]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 5 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the costs of introducing mandatory drug testing and of the tests themselves.

The total cost of introducing mandatory drug testing was £940,840. The cost of a mandatory drug test is £45.32. More detail is given in the attached tables.

Introducing mandatory drug testing

Building work and equipment[1]	266,000
First phase staffing costs	36,000
Staff training	551,000
Headquarters project staffing and expenses	87,840
Total	940,840

[1]This represents centrally allocated funds. In a few cases where only minor alterations were necessary or the work was done as part of a larger building project, the costs were borne by individual establishments. These costs could only be calculated at disproportionate expense.

Cost of a mandatory drug test

Equipment	1.02
Courier	0.99
Laboratory Analysis[1]	2.37
Staff costs	40.94
Total	45.32

[1]This is for the initial screen test which all samples undergo. 8.6 per cent. of samples undergo a further, confirmatory test at a cost of £28.82.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will respond to the recommendations in the report of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs on "Drug Misusers and the Prison System—An Integrated Approach". [1755]

Miss Widdecombe: We expect to do so soon.

Training Periods

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the specific training period for (a) a probation officer, (b) a fireman and (c) a prison officer. [1953]

Mr. Sackville: Under the new arrangements for the recruitment and qualifying training of probation officers, there will not be a specific training period. A flexible training programme is being devised which will allow training to be geared to the needs of individual recruits, taking into account their skills and experience. This will make it easier for a broad range of applicants to apply for appointment as a probation officer as they will not have to undertake the two-year social work diploma course required under the previous arrangements.

Home Office guidance recommends a minimum of 14 weeks' training for recruit firefighters.

Newly recruited prison officers undertake 13 weeks' initial training, including a nine-week residential course.

Immigrants (South African)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many immigrants and returnees from South Africa entered the United Kingdom in (a) 1970, (b) 1980, (c) 1985 and (d) each year from 1990 to 1995, broken down by ethnic origin where available. [1948]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on migrants, including temporary migrants, from South Africa is given in table A, and information on South African citizens who have been accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom is given in table B. Information on their ethnic origin is not available.

Firearms

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the value of the retail trade in handguns of more than .22 calibre. [1480]

Miss Widdecombe: We have made no estimate of this.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he has received concerning the temporary dismantling of self–loading pistols and revolvers proposed in Lord Cullen's report at paragraph 9.106; and if he will place that advice in the Library. [2020]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Advice from firearms experts at the Forensic Science Service is reflected in paragraphs 109 to 115 of the Government's evidence submitted to Lord Cullen's inquiry. A copy is in the Library. A copy of further advice from the Forensic Science Service confirming the view that the design of some self–loading pistols will make the operation to remove the slide assembly substantially more difficult than in others and the difficulties involved in removing the cylinder of a revolver has been placed in the Library.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those guns which are not capable of dismantling in the manner described in Lord Cullen's report, paragraph 9.106. [2021]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 November 1996]: I understand from the Forensic Science Service that varying degrees of difficulty and potential damage apply to all self–loading pistols and revolvers.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many guns have been surrendered as a result of the prohibitions introduced by the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988; how many claims for compensation remain to be settled; and what was the total cost of compensation paid to date. [2022]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The Department received nearly 3,000 claims relating to around 3,600 firearms under the Government buy-in scheme for weapons which became prohibited by virtue of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988. A total of £620,000 was paid in relation to those claims. The Department has considered all claims made under the scheme and advised claimants of the outcome. Offers have been made to all claimants entitled to receive compensation.

Children's Certificates

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children's certificates have been issued to licensed premises in each county or metropolitan authority in England and Wales. [1482]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is contained in table 2 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Liquor Licensing Statistics Children's Certificates: England and Wales, January 1995–June 1996", a copy of which is in the Library.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many and what percentage of (i) burglaries, (ii) homicides, (iii) robberies, (iv) instances of violence against the person and (v) sexual offences involved the use of (a) a gun and (b) a knife or sharp instrument for (1) 1985, (2) 1995 and (3) the last year for which figures are available; [1655]

(2) how many offences involving the use of a knife there were in the last year for which figures are available. [1654]

Mr. Maclean: The following table shows the number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales in which firearms were reported to have been used and as a percentage of all notifiable offences of that type:

[2] Less than 0.05 per cent.

The available information on offences involving the use of knives relates to 1988 and 1989 and is from an ad hoc survey concerning offences of violence against the person, robbery, aggravated burglary and sexual offences recorded by the police in which knives were involved. The results were published in table 2.24 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1989". A copy of this publication is in the Library.

In addition, it is known that in offences currently recorded as homicide, 97 involved the use of a sharp instrument in 1985—35 per cent. of currently recorded homicide offences. The provisional figures for 1995 are 192 and 41 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people were proceeded against for having an article with a blade or point in a public place; and how many were found guilty for the last year for which figures are available; [1653]

(2) how many people were proceeded against for possession of an offensive weapon; and how many were found guilty for the last year for which figures are available. [1652]

Mr. Maclean: Information for 1995, which is provisional, is given in the table.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many crimes ended in a court conviction in England and Wales in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995; [2229]

(2) how many crimes ended in a caution in England and Wales in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995. [2230]

Mr. Maclean: Information readily available centrally on the number of offenders found guilty or cautioned in each of the years 1993, 1994 and 1995 is shown in the table.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were cleared up by the police in England and Wales in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995. [2231]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is given in the following table:

Number of recorded offences cleared up in England and Wales

Fire and Rescue Authorities

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to introduce legislation to protect fire and rescue authorities against legal action of the sort taken in the case of Digital v. Hampshire Fire and Rescue Services; [1939]

(2) what assessment he has made of the financial and legal consequences for fire and rescue services of the judgment in the case of Digital v. Hampshire Fire and Rescue Services. [1940]

Mr. Sackville: Once the outcome of the appeal proceedings is known, the Government will decide whether there are any implications which fire authorities in general ought to consider and, if so, will circulate advice accordingly.

Tattooing and Skin Piercing

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the operation of the law relating to the tattooing of under-16s, and what are his reasons for deciding against the introduction of an age limit for other forms of skin piercing. [1946]

Mr. Maclean: The Tattooing of Minors Act 1969 prohibits the tattooing of anyone under the age of 18. The Government have received no evidence to suggest that the law provides inadequate protection for children in regard to other forms of skin piercing and have no current plans for a statutory age limit in this area. The Law Commission is, however, looking at the general issue of tattooing, piercing and other forms of body decoration, as part of its study of consent in the criminal law, and the Government will give careful consideration to the recommendations which they make in their final report.

Recidivism

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many criminals have been convicted of a third or subsequent serious violent or sexual offence following two previous such convictions since 1990; and if he will make a statement. [2448]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend wrote to my hon. Friend on 1 November. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [1395]

Mr. Howard: The timetable for the laying of draft deregulation orders is a matter to be agreed between the Government and the Deregulation Committee, but we hope the Committee will receive draft deregulation orders on the following before the end of 1996:

- Licensing Act 1964: simplifying procedures on liquor licence transfers;
- Gaming Act 1968: allowing payment by debit cards in casinos and bingo halls;
- Gaming Act 1968: allowing advertising for bingo, betting shops and on-site amusement with prizes machines;
- Licensing (Occasional Permissions) Act 1983: simplifying the procedures for, and extending the number of occasional permissions for, non-profit making bodies;
- Licensing Act 1964: allowing off-licences to obtain occasional licences.

Stray Dogs

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what guidance is issued to police authorities in circumstances where dogs are presented as strays with regard to (a) the identification of the owner and (b) the placing of the animal in suitable care; [1546]

(2) how many dogs were placed in kennels by the police in the last year for which figures are available; and at what cost; [1547]

(3) how police authorities select kennels for the purpose of housing stray dogs; and what criteria are applied to the length of time the animals are kept at public expense. [1548]

Mr. Maclean: The policing of stray dogs is an operational matter for the police using their powers provided under the Dogs Act 1906, as amended. Guidance was issued to the police following amendments to this Act contained in the Environmental Protection Act 1990. A copy of the joint Department of Environment, Welsh Office and Home Office circular—Home Office circular No. 5/1992—is available from the Library.

The additional information requested is not available centrally.

Boot Camp (Thorn Cross)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost of setting up the boot camp at Thorn Cross; what is the cost per inmate; and what is the staffing ratio. [1669]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Doug Hoyle, dated 5 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the cost of setting up the boot camp at Thorn Cross, the cost per inmate and the staffing ratio.

The start up costs were about £1.75 million for construction and about £160,000 for other costs, mainly staff recruitment and training. The expected cost per inmate place for the current financial year, calculated by dividing the full year's anticipated running costs by the full inmate population, is £27,600. The personal officer to inmate ratio is 1:3.5.

Internet Pornography

Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions have taken place between his Department and the Internet Service Providers Association on the issue of child pornography; what proposals have been made to him for the creation of a mechanism to prevent the transmission of pornographic material; and if he will make a statement. [2050]

Mr. Sackville: On 23 September, my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology and I welcomed the setting up of an independent industry body to tackle the problems of illegal material, particularly child pornography, on the Internet. This followed discussions between our two departments, the police and representatives of Internet service providers.

The new body, the Internet Watch Foundation, will establish a "hotline" so that users can report the presence of child pornography in a newsgroup. The foundation will determine whether particular newsgroups carry child pornography, then forward the information to the relevant service provider, who will trace the originator and request that it is removed. Details will be passed to the police—or to the National Criminal Intelligence Service, if the originator is abroad. It will also encourage Internet service providers to ensure that their users provide new material with a contents rating before placing it on the Internet, and that these ratings are compatible and can be identified by computer software being introduced to the market.

This is an important step forward, although more work needs to be done by the industry. We shall be closely monitoring developments in this area.

Criminal Records Database

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what fee was paid to the PCL group for the contract to transfer pre-1981 criminal records to the national computer's Phoenix database; what percentage of the contract was carried out by the PCL group; and how many records were transferred. [2419]

Mr. Maclean: PCL was paid £8.8 million, excluding value added tax, under the keying contract.

The contract specified two main measures, of which one was 55 per cent. complete and the other 80 per cent. complete when it was terminated by mutual consent.

About 320,000 criminal records have been added to the Phoenix database, and work on back record conversion is continuing.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of pre-1981 criminal records have been transferred to the national computer's Phoenix database. [2423]

Mr. Maclean: All criminal record data held on the police national computer were transferred to the Phoenix database on 22 May 1995. These included 2.8 million records originating before 1981 consisting of name and criminal record office number.

Paedophile Register

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the impact on the date of implementation of a national register of paedophiles of the termination of the contract for transferring pre-1981 criminal records to the national computer's Phoenix database by the PCL group. [2421]

Mr. Maclean: The termination of this contract will not affect the implementation of the national register of paedophiles.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the award of a contract to implement a national register of paedophiles. [2422]

Mr. Maclean: The register will be held as part of the Phoenix database of the police national computer.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the cost of effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2604]

Mr. Howard: My Department is aware of the problem. The Department's information technology service provider, Sema group, has produced the report to which I referred in my previous reply on 17 June 1996, Official Report, column 302. The business areas in my Department have been considering the report and are now entering into discussions with suppliers on action plans, taking into account other developments and the likelihood of systems still being in place at the time of the millennium date change. As the plans are developed, costs will be assessed.

Departmental Actions (Court Rulings)

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions since May 1993 courts have deemed his Department had acted illegally; on what dates the rulings were made and in relation to which cases. [843]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 29 October 1996]: No central record is kept of the outcome of all the cases against the Home Office since May 1993, which include judicial review applications, writ actions, industrial tribunal cases and county court cases.

Voting Register

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much is being spent in the current financial year on national advertising campaigns to encourage people to register to vote; and what was the equivalent figure in real terms for each year since 1978–79. [1461]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 4 November 1996]: In the current financial year, £700,000 is being spent on electoral registration advertising.

In previous years, the actual spend was as follows, with equivalent figures in brackets, calculated in 1995–96 prices using the gross domestic product deflator.

	Actual spend £	Equivalent figure £
1982–83	87,000	160,000
1983–84	113,000	199,000
1984–85	126,000	211,000
1985–86	150,000	239,000
1986–87	300,000	463,000
1987–88	260,000	381,000
1988–89	306,000	420,000
1989–90	452,000	580,000
1990–91	468,000	557,000
1991–92	614,000	686,000
1992–93	606,000	650,000
1993–94	620,000	646,000
1994–95	650,000	666,000
1995–96	815,000	815,000
1996–97	700,000	685,000

My Department's records of advertising expenditure for the years before 1982–83 do not provide a breakdown between individual campaigns. The work involved in identifying costs of electoral registration advertising for those years would incur disproportionate costs.

The budget for television advertising spots, media spend and agency fees in 1996–97 is nearly the same as that for 1995–96. The difference between the years shown in the table is primarily because of production savings achieved this year through re-use of the 1995–96 commercial. Research showed it to be an effective advertisement capable of continuing to get the message across. After allowing for this, the real terms advertising spend was £685,000 in 1996–97 compared with £700,000 in 1995–96. Last year, general awareness of registration publicity among people surveyed rose from 29 per cent. pre-campaign to 61 per cent., post. This year, it rose from 20 per cent. pre to 70 per cent. post.

Repatriations

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when documents concerning the application by John Blair to be repatriated to a prison in the Irish Republic were sent to the appropriate authorities in the Republic; when he expects John Blair will be repatriated; and if he will make a statement; [1972]

(2) when Harry Duggin and Joe O'Connell applied to be repatriated to a prison in the Republic of Ireland; if the necessary documents have been referred to the appropriate authorities of the Republic; when he expects both prisoners will be repatriated; and if he will make a statement. [1973]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The necessary documentation relating to Mr. Blair's repatriation request was referred to the Republic of Ireland on 18 September 1996. Referral of an application does not mean that repatriation will necessarily take place. Repatriation is as well as of the prisoner, following consideration of all the relevant information.

Mr. Duggin's request was originally made on 18 September 1995 and Mr. O'Connell's on 19 July 1995. However, neither request could be considered until the Republic of Ireland brought the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons into force in the Republic on 1 November 1995. Both these requests remain under consideration and have not been referred to the Republic.

Prisons

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give an estimate of the number of places for prisoners in Her Majesty's prisons in each of the years 1996 to 2006. [52]

Miss Widdecombe: I will write to the hon. Member.

Learco Chindamo

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the immigration status of Learco Chindamo; and what power exists to deport him at the end of his sentence. [1091]

Mr. Kirkhope: It is not our normal practice to disclose the immigration status of individuals. In accordance with domestic and international law, the Secretary of State has power to deport a serious offender on completion of his sentence if it would be in the public interest to do so.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Argentina (Naval Engine Spares)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the initial advice he gave to Rolls-Royce following its request of October 1993 for approval of an export licence for naval engine spares to Argentina; and when that advice was given. [1066]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 29 October 1996]: The company made no such request in October 1993. In a letter dated 20 October 1993, the company requested advice on the licensability of the Tyne RM1 engine and its components. After carrying out a detailed technical and legal assessment in consultation with MOD experts, my Department advised, in a letter dated 2 June 1995, that, irrespective of the destination, the company would require a licence under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 to export components and assemblies specially designed to fulfil the requirements imposed by the combat environment of a warship. A licence would be required to export these military components or entire Tyne engines in which they were included.

My Department also advised the company that under the terms of the order it would not require a licence to export other Tyne components that were not specially designed or modified for military use, or engine modules and sub-assemblies which did not include the military components, unless they had been modified from components for an aeroengine, in which case a licence would in certain circumstances be required. This assessment did not constitute either a variation or a relaxation of the embargo on sales of military equipment and arms to Argentina announced on 3 April 1982. Before this advice was received, the company submitted two applications, dated 17 December 1993 and 29 August 1994, for a licence to supply the Argentine Navy with engines and components specially designed or modified for military use. These applications were refused in letters from my Department dated 24 June 1994 and 24 January 1995 respectively.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the first occasion on which he received a request from Rolls-Royce to consider approving export licences for naval engine spares for Argentina; and what response he gave. [1067]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 29 October 1996]: Computerised records before January 1991 are not readily available. Since then my Department has received two applications from Rolls-Royce for export licences with respect to proposals to supply the Argentine Navy with engines and components specially designed or modified for military use. The first such application was dated 17 December 1993, and both applications were refused. My right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) announced to the House by written answer on 16 January 1991, Official Report column 521, that the Government had decided to allow a limited supply of essential maintenance spares for vessels deployed as part of the Argentine contribution to the Gulf as an exception to the embargo. On 18 October 1990, Rolls-Royce had applied for a licence to supply an Argentine naval vessel with parts for the Olympus engine and, under the provisions of the export control legislation in force at that time; a licence was issued to the company on 6 March 1991 for the supply of these parts; a limited supply of spares was also provided for the same purpose by the Ministry of Defence.

Exports

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the change in the value of (a) EU and (b) United Kingdom exports and for other OECD countries since 1987; and how British exports have fared in this context. [1651]

Mr. Nelson: The information requested is in the following table:

Growth in UK, EU15 and other OECD[1] exports of goods since 1987[2]

	US$ billion		Per cent. change
	1987	1995	1987–95

Fireworks

Mr. Snape: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what response he has received to his discussion paper on firework control issued in August 1996; what plans he has to introduce new statutory measures to control the use and sale of fireworks; and if he will make a statement; [2273]

(2) what plans he has to review the control and sale of fireworks. [2272]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, North (Ms Walley) on 28 October, Official Report, column 112 in which I gave details of the review of fireworks.

A large number of businesses and organisations responded to the public discussion document. As expected, a wide range of views and suggestions were put forward and I am giving careful consideration to all the points made. If it appears that additional measures would be appropriate I will consult on specific proposals early next year.

Coal Production

Mr. Trickett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many tonnes of coal were produced in Britain (a) in the current year, (b) in 1979 and (c) in 1990 utilising (i) opencast and (ii) deep mine production methods. [2212]

Mr. Page: The information requested is given as follows:

Thousand tonnes

(a) 1995	16,369	35,150
(a) 1996[1]	10,795	22,172

Uranium Tailings

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total volume of uranium tailings currently created by the processing of uranium for use in the British nuclear energy programme; and in which countries the stocks of uranium mining tailings are (a) stored and (b) disposed of. [2125]

Mr. Page: Uranium tailings are a by-product of uranium mining and arise at the site of mining. No uranium mining is carried out in the United Kingdom. The question of tailings and their storage and disposal is a matter for the uranium mining companies concerned.

Nuclear Industries

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the conclusions reached by the European Commission in its report on nuclear industries in the European Union (COM/96) 339, 25 September 1996, paragraph 6, page 23, in respect of the presence of plutonium in the civilian nuclear fuel cycle. [2126]

Mr. Page: The Government agree that there are many considerations which determine fuel choice in the civil nuclear sector. It is a matter for the owners of the plutonium to decide how it is utilised. Mixed oxide fuel incorporating plutonium oxide is one option, subject to meeting the appropriate regulatory requirements including those in respect of safeguards.

Company Density Statistics

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the company density by sector per 10,000 of the population in each of the last three years, using VAT data in (a) the London borough of Lewisham, (b) the South London training and enterprise council—SOLOTEC, (c) the wider central London area, (d) Greater London and (e) the rest of southern England. [2301]

Mr. Page: I will place a copy of the data in the Library of the House.

Business Start-Ups

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the business start-up rate by sectors and in total, per 10,000 of the population, using VAT data in (a) the London borough of Lewisham, (b) the south London training and enterprise council—SOLOTEC, (c) the wider central London area, (d) Greater London and (e) the rest of southern England for the latest available period for which data are available and the equivalent period in (i) 1995 (ii) 1994 and (iii) 1993; and if he will indicate the number of deregistrations in each period. [2348]

Mr. Page: I will place a copy of the data in the Library of the House.

Compensation (Terrorist Acts)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to review the rights to claim compensation for loss suffered as a result of damage to property by terrorist acts in Britain. [2309]

Mr. Nelson: There is no need to consider any compensation arrangements as insurance is available against losses arising from damage caused to property by acts of terrorism in Great Britain.

Diesel Engine Emissions

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what reports he has received of problems in obtaining investment in the United Kingdom for industrial research and development in respect of removing particulates from the exhaust emissions of diesel engines; and if he will make a statement. [2043]

Mr. Greg Knight: My Department has not received any reports of problems of this kind.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to the paper, "Regional Policy, Review of the Assisted Areas of Great Britain", if he will place in the Library a statement on the process informing his decision in determining development area and intermediate area status, including the specific weightings attached to the factors considered in the case of the Workington travel-to-work area. [2015]

Mr. Greg Knight: The Government published the background document, "Regional Policy, Review of the Assisted Areas of Great Britain", on 23 July 1993. This document set out the basis for the map of the assisted areas introduced on 1 August 1993. The Government have no plans to publish additional information about the decisions taken on individual travel-to-work areas for the purposes of that map.

Brazilian Mahogany

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cubic metres of Brazilian mahogany were imported annually from 1990 to 1995. [2465]

Mr. Nelson: The UK imported 62,168 cu m of mahogany from Brazil in 1990, and 45,762 cu m in 1991. In 1992 the United Kingdom trade classification no longer identified mahogany separately from other non-coniferous woods.

On 16 November 1995, Brazilian mahogany was listed in appendix III of the convention of international trade in endangered species of wild flora and fauna. Between then and 25 October 1996 CITES import permits received and verified by HM Customs and Excise indicate that 10,141 cu m were imported into the UK.

Business Assistance

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many (a) individuals and (b) companies have been assisted by (i) the Isle of Wight business link and (ii) his Department in the last three years. [2567]

Mr. Page: Business links are private sector partnerships, not Government bodies. National statistics on businesses using business link are available in the quarterly "Report on Business Link and Business Link Regional Supply Network Management Information" and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House. Local statistics are a matter for local business link partnerships and I will ensure that the chief executive of business link Isle of Wight is aware of my hon. Friend's question.

Information on the number of individuals and companies assisted by my Department in the last three years can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Non-prescription Drug Pricing

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on proposals to change the basis for pricing non-prescription drugs in shops. [622]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Director General of Fair Trading announced on 18 October that he was seeking leave of the restrictive practices court to apply for a discharge of the medicaments order made by the court in 1970 in respect of resale price maintenance on certain medicines. The Secretary of State has no statutory role of discretion in relation to the director general's application or in relation to the court's consideration of the matter.

Coal Stocks

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what volume of coal was taken from stock for the purposes of electricity generation in 1995–96; and what was the total volume of stocks remaining on 1 April. [2337]

Mr. Page: Between the beginning of April 1995 and the end of March 1996, stocks of coal at power stations fell by 3.5 million tonnes to stand at 6.4 million tonnes. Stocks of coal held by coal producers also fell by 3.5 million tonnes over this period to stand at 5.5 million tonnes at the end of March 1996 but it is not possible to state exactly what proportion of these stocks were delivered to the electricity industry. However, it is known that 77 per cent. of supplies from the coal industry—that is, stocks plus newly mined coal—were delivered to power stations during this period.

Research Councils

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the estimated cost of guaranteeing the pension rights of employees on privatisation of research council laboratories; and who bears these costs. [2468]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Privatisation does not increase the costs of the pension entitlements of research council employees, which are the responsibility of the relevant pension scheme. It may however result in the crystallisation of some existing staff pension liabilities, and these considerations will be taken into account in the relevant prior options reviews.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the legal fees incurred so far by (a) Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council, (b) Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council, (c) Medical Research Council, (d) Natural Environment Research Council and (e) Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council in the course of the prior options review of their laboratories; if these costs are borne out of current budgets; and what assessment he has made of the effect of meeting such charges on the funding of research by the research councils. [2467]

Mr. Taylor: BBSRC, EPSRC, MRC, NERC and PPARC have so far incurred no legal fees in the course of the prior options reviews of the research establishments they sponsor.

Following my announcement in April that the Government accepted the conclusions and recommendations of the prior options review of the Royal Observatories, PPARC has incurred legal fees amounting to £270,000 in taking forward implementation of the recommendations.

Such charges form part of the normal administrative expenditure of the research councils, and therefore feed into the councils' established planning systems.

Chernobyl

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his letters of 12 June and 27 September on the European Union funded report on options for dealing with the sarcophagus at Chernobyl, what action is being taken. [1004]

Mr. Page: Results of the European Union funded study are expected shortly. Action will be decided in the light of discussions of the study's findings with the Ukrainian Government.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements have been made to ensure that contracts signed with British Nuclear Fuels plc by foreign customers for the production of mixed oxide—MOX—nuclear fuel at the Sellafield MOX plant include a stipulation that plutonium contaminated wastes arising from the MOX manufacture are returned to the country of origin of the external contract for the fuel. [2140]

Mr. Page [holding answer 4 November 1996]: BNFL has confirmed that there will be no additional quantity of plutonium remaining in the UK as a result of contracts with foreign customers for the production of MOX nuclear fuel at the Sellafield MOX plant.

"The Social Chapter: British and Continental Approaches"

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many copies of his Department's publication, "The social chapter: British and Continental Approaches", have been printed; what was the cost (a) per copy and (b) in total; and how many requests his Department has received for copies. [1232]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 4 November 1996]: A total of 40,000 copies of the booklet have been printed. The printing cost per copy was approximately 32p, and the total printing cost £12,840. The total costs including design, storage and distribution is approximately £17,000. The text was prepared internally and it is not possible to quantify the staff costs involved. In addition to the original distribution of approximately 18,500 booklets, my Department has to date—30 October—received a further 244 requests for more than 6,000 booklets.

A smaller number of copies are being prepared in French, German, Italian and Spanish for distribution in other EU member states. The estimated cost of these booklets is £6,500.

Public Relations

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much his Department spent on (a) advertising, (b) public relations and (c) entertainment in each of the last five financial years. [1261]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Total departmental spend on advertising is not held centrally and could be produced only at disproportionate cost. The advertising expenditure from centrally managed budgets for the years in question is as follows:

1991–92: £966,000
1992–93: £1,139,000
1993–94: £784,000
1994–95: £561,000
1995–96: £1,088,000.

While DTI has no expenditure on public relations from centrally managed budgets, its information directorate is responsible for providing information about my Department's policies and activities to businesses, the public and the media. It does this through a wide range of communications means including news releases, answering inquiries from the media, publicity campaigns, briefings, exhibitions and publications.

For the expenditure on official hospitality I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 16 October 1996, Official Report, columns 955–56.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1244]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 4 November 1996]: On 29 October the DTI, excluding its executive agencies, employed 2,665 female staff, which is 44 per cent. of the total of staff employed.

I have asked the chief executives of the DTI's executive agencies to respond directly to the hon. Member.

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about the employment of women in The Insolvency Service.

Letter from J. C. Octon to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

In the absence of the Chief Executive I am replying for the Patent Office to your Parliamentary Question about the number of women currently employed by the Department of Trade and Industry. Below are the figures for the Patent Office:-

Total number of established staff as at 1 October 1996: 725

Number of women employed: 284

Women as a percentage of employees: just over 39%

I hope this information is helpful.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November, 1996:

I have been asked to answer the question you raised on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency.

Currently 116 women are employed in the Agency, representing 22 per cent. of employees.

Letter from John S. Holden to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

You recently tabled a Parliamentary Question for the President of the Board of Trade asking how many women are currently employed by his Department and what proportion this is of the total. I am responding as Chief Executive of Companies House Executive Agency.

Companies House currently employs a total of 1,056 staff, of which 679 (64.3%) are women.

Letter from Zélie Armstrong to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory to your question about the number of women employed and the proportion of the total. This agency employs 17 women. This represents 34% of the total number of staff employed.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1278]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies, we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be inappropriate for us to request this information from staff and difficult to justify the collection of such data. The Department provides some assistance with child care, but is unable to monitor what proportion of staff who are parents have received such assistance.

I have asked the chief executive of the DTI's executive agencies to respond direct to the hon. Member.

Letter from John S. Holden to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

I have been asked to reply as Chief Executive of Companies House Executive Agency to your recently tabled Parliamentary Question for the President of the Board of Trade, asking about the provision of childcare assistance for mothers and fathers within DTI.

Companies House operates a holiday playscheme in Cardiff during the Easter and summer school holidays. During last Easter and this summer, 12 mothers and 5 fathers, and 27 mothers and 3 fathers, respectively, made use of this facility.

Companies House does not keep information on which members of staff are parents. It is therefore, not possible to provide you with the proportions of staff the above figures represent.

Letter from Zélie Armstrong to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory to your question about the number of women and men who are parents and receive help with childcare from this Agency. NWML contributes towards the management of a joint nursery at Teddington. The facility is available to all staff who wish to use it.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about what proportion of women who are mothers and men who are fathers who are employed by The Insolvency Service have received any assistance from the Service with childcare.

The Insolvency Service does not collect statistics specifically showing the parental status of staff. This is personal information which would be supplied by members of staff on a voluntary basis and it would be difficult to justify the formal collection of such data. I am therefore unable to give an overall accurate assessment as requested.

The Service provides a facility whereby members of staff may apply for reimbursement of additional childcare costs incurred as a result of a temporary change to their working routine, or if they are attending Insolvency Service training courses. However such claims are not separately recorded. Staff who have domestic responsibilities involving childcare may also apply for periods of special leave without pay or for a career break—although this is not financial assistance.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

I have been asked to answer the question you raised on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency.

The Radiocommunications Agency does not keep records of what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers.

Two members of staff took advantage of the DTI playscheme.

Letter from Paul Hartnack to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 5 November 1996:

I am replying for the Patent Office to your Parliamentary Question to the President of the Board of Trade about childcare.

I am unable to give you information about the proportion of staff who are parents since the Patent Office does not have this information readily available and could generate it only at disproportionate cost. The Patent Office is, however, sensitive to the needs of parents and has obtained access to a number of places in an on site nursery. We also operate a holiday play scheme during the Easter and summer periods. Both the nursery and play schemes are subsidised by the Patent Office. The Patent Office is also sympathetic to requests for special leave without pay to allow parents to be with their children during school holidays and to requests for special leave with pay to meet short term domestic needs.

The figures on usage for the nursery and play schemes are detailed below for the last 3 years:

	Nursery		Playscheme
	Male	Female	Male		Female
	Number	Number	Number		Number
			Easter	Summer	Easter	Summer
1994	2	6	4	4	5	8
1995	2	8	3	4	4	6
1996	2	7	1	3	4	4

I hope this information is useful.

PRIME MINISTER

Union Flag and Royal Standard

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has for Wales to be represented on (a) the Union flag and (b) the royal standard. [2188]

The Prime Minister: The Union flag is representative of all parts of the United Kingdom. Wales, as an integral part of the United Kingdom, is therefore represented by the Union flag. Similarly, the royal standard representing the sovereign of the United Kingdom applies to Wales as much as to every other part of the Union.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 5 November. [1005]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 5 November. [1006]

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what guidance is given to doctors by the Benefits Agency medical services regarding the conduct of all work tests for incapacity benefit; what is the time estimated for each test; what medical examinations, tests or procedures are undertaken during the test; what account is taken of (a) general practitioners' and (b) consultants' reports as part of the test; and what monitoring is undertaken of the doctors who carry out the tests. [1350]

Mr. Burt: The administration of incapacity benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr George Foulkes, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what guidance is given to doctors by the Benefits Agency Medical Services regarding the conduct of the All Work Tests for Incapacity Benefit (IB), what is the time estimated for each test; what medical examinations, tests or procedures are undertaken during the test; what account is taken of (a) general practitioners' and (b) consultants' reports as part of the test; and what monitoring is undertaken of the doctors who carry out the tests.

All doctors, who are already experienced in this area of work, undergo four days of theoretical training plus one supervised examination session, and have to demonstrate a satisfactory standard before being approved by the Secretary of State to carry out IB assessments. This training covers in detail all aspects of carrying out All Work Test assessments. In addition to the training, all doctors are issued with a copy of the "IB Handbook for Medical Services Doctors", which acts as an aide memoir on the contents of the training course. A copy of this publication is available in the Library of the House of Commons.

A national study of examination session timings carried out in May 1996 has shown that the average time for an All Work Test assessment by a BAMS doctor is 47 minutes. This includes time spent interviewing and examining the customer and writing the report.

For an All Work Test assessment, the doctor gathers whatever evidence is appropriate to enable him or her to make an objective and impartial assessment of the customers abilities and a limitations in all the functional areas relevant to their disabling condition. This evidence will usually include interviewing the customer about their perception of the effects of their condition on their ability to carry out everyday activities; observation of the customers behaviour at the examination centre; and formal clinical examination of the relevant system or part of the body.

The BAMS doctor's role for the All Work Test is to provide an independent impartial assessment of the customer based on their clinical judgement taking into account evidence provided by the customer, their own doctor and their consultant, where available. It is the Adjudication Officer who, in deciding entitlement to benefit, will take into account all available evidence, including any from the client's GP or consultant.

Following initial training, the first three assessments carried out by the BAMS doctor are monitored, and must reach a satisfactory standard for the doctor to be approved to carry out IB assessments. The work of all doctors is subsequently monitored by BAMS; monitoring is by random or targeted study of completed reports, and also in response to any work returned by Adjudication Officers as being of an unsatisfactory standard.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what written representations he has received from (a) clients, (b) legal representatives, (c) hon. Members and (d) others regarding all work tests and incapacity benefit at the Ayr benefit office for the most recently available 12-month period. [1345]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: One representation has been received from an hon. Member.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many written representations he has received from hon. Members regarding all work tests and incapacity benefit in respect of each Benefit Agency office in Scotland for the most recently available 12-month period. [1344]

Mr. Mitchell: Eleven representations have been received from hon. Members between November 1995 and 17 October 1996.

Benefit Offices

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of reports by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration for each of the benefit offices in Scotland for the last five years and this year to the latest available date. [1347]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is in the table.

Cold Weather Payments

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cold weather payments were paid in each year since 1993–94. [1879]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is set out in the table:

1994–95	11
1995–96	7,200

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many cold weather payments would have been paid if cold weather payments had been triggered after (a) three and (b) five consecutive days in a period of seven days in the years 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96; [1926]

(2) how many times cold weather payments would have been made at each weather station used to calculate cold weather payments, if cold weather payments had been triggered after (a) three and (b) five consecutive days in a period of seven days in each year since 1993–94. [1925]

Mr. Evans: The information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Industrial Deafness

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he next plans to review criteria for industrial deafness disablement benefit. [1936]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council advises the Government on the prescription of diseases for the purposes of industrial disablement benefit. The council continually monitors the scientific literature with regard to all occupational diseases, including those already on the prescribed list such as occupational deafness.

Benefits Agency Helpline

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the annual cost, for the last year in which figures are available, for the operation of the Benefits Agency freephone helpline; and what are the projected costs in the current year. [187]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what was the annual cost, for the last year in which figures are available, for the operation of the Benefits Agency freephone helpline; and what are the projected costs in the current year.

The Benefits Agency freephone helpline closed on 12 July 1996. The budget allocation for 1995/96 was £6.3 million and the projected expenditure for this current year, taking account of the closure, is £2 million. These figures have been rounded.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Benefits Agency (South Yorkshire)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the Benefits Agency offices which are scheduled for closure in South Yorkshire under the change programme. [2138]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is an operational matter for Peter Mathison, chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mrs. Helen Jackson, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if he will list the Benefits Agency offices which are scheduled for closure in South Yorkshire under the change programme.

Yorkshire Area Directorate (AD), along with the rest of the BA and the Department of Social Security, is currently undertaking a radical reappraisal of its services and the way they are delivered. The Change Programme aims to restructure the way we deliver our business, producing administrative efficiencies whilst maintaining our quality of service. We are directing our resources to where they are needed most. However, Yorkshire AD remains committed to providing a high level of service to its customers and equal access to the benefit system for all members of the public.

The Benefits Agency offices in South Yorkshire which are currently under consideration for closure are Wath, Maltby, Dinnington and Stocksbridge. Closure of the first three offices is awaiting Ministerial decision, the proposals for Stocksbridge are still in the consultation stage.

With the advent of Job Seekers Allowance, unemployed customers have access to enquiry facilities throughout South Yorkshire, including six Employment Services Job Centres in the Sheffield area, as well as in Wath, Maltby and Dinnington.

Benefits Agency (Emergency Services)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if the review of out of office hours emergency services provided by the Benefits Agency is now complete; what consultations with outside bodies he has conducted during the review; and what instructions he has issued concerning the future operation of such services; [1974]

(2) how many people requested help from the out of office hours service operated by the Benefits Agency this year, to date, and in each of the last five years; what was the total cost of operating the service during that period; and what was the total number of staff designated to the service in each year; [1976]

(3) what discussions he (i) has had and (ii) plans to have with (a) the Association of County Councils, (b) the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and (c) the Association of Directors of Social Services concerning the future operation of the out of office hours service by the Benefits Agency; [1977]

(4) what estimates he has made of the impact on local authorities of ending the out of office hours service operated by the Benefits Agency; and what financial assistance he will offer to local authorities to provide additional services for the public seeking emergency help. [1975]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration of income support is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Max Madden, dated 4 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking:

"if the review of out of office hours emergency services provided by the Benefits Agency is now complete; what consultations with outside bodies he has conducted during the review; and what instructions he has issued concerning the future operation of such services".

"what discussions he has (i) had, and (ii) plans to have, with (a) the Association of County Councils, (b) the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and (c) the Association of Directors of Social Services concerning the future operation of the out of office hours service by the Benefits Agency."

"what estimates he has made of the impact on local authorities of ending the out of office hours service operated by the Benefits Agency; and what financial assistance he will offer to local authorities to provide additional services for the public seeking emergency help."

"how many people requested help from the out of office hours service operated by the Benefits Agency this year, to date, and in each of the last five years; what was the total cost of operating the service during that period; and what was the total number of staff designated to the service in each year."

The review of the Out-of-Hours Service (OOHS) is not complete. A consultation exercise to assess the impact of a reduction or withdrawal of the OOHS was conducted during August and early September. This involved consultations with representatives from Department of Health, Local Authorities, the Scottish Office and welfare agencies. The results of the exercise are now being evaluated.

In the course of the review meetings were held with the Department of Health, on 21 August and with representatives from the Association of County Councils and the Association of Directors of Social Services, on 22 August. Although invited, there is no record that the Association of Metropolitan Authorities were represented at the later meeting.

Until the review is complete the impact on the local authorities cannot be assessed. Further meetings to assess the financial implications have been arranged with Department of Health, Department of the Environment and the Scottish Office.

I have provided the available information on the number of OOHS referrals and the administration costs for the last five years. It should be noted that a referral means a contact by the customer or a third party. Approximately 50% of the referrals require a visit. Figures about the success or otherwise of these visits are not maintained.

The information on the number of staff designated to the service can only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Period	Number of referrals
1 October 1991 to 30 September 1992	21,709
1 October 1992 to 30 September 1993	42,722
1 August 1993 to 31 July 1994	47,958
1 August 1994 to 31 July 1995	48,744
1 April 1995 to 31 March 1996	54,868

Financial year	Administration costs £ million
1992–93	0.561
1993–94	0.987
1994–95	1.720
1995–96	1.754
1996–97	1.834

These figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

Benefit Payment Cards

Sir David Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for the extension of benefit payment by plastic card. [2741]

Mr. Lilley: The first benefit payments under the new payment card scheme have been successfully made to a small number of child benefit customers in the Stroud area. Payments are being made using both the new payment card and new benefit encashment systems. Co-operation with our private sector supplier, ICL-Pathway, has enabled us to deliver these in less than six months from the award of contract.

Ten post offices have so far been automated to enable card payments to be made. From this we will progress to live trials at a further 190 post offices from April next year. When all aspects of the new systems have been fully tested we will push ahead quickly, automating an average of 300 post offices per week from next summer.

The payments in Stroud represent the first step in a huge programme which will affect about 20 million people who collect DSS benefits through post offices in the UK. In view of the scale and importance of the changes we intend to trial the systems thoroughly with child benefit before paying further benefits by card. We will be taking account of our experience of child benefit before implementing these changes and I shall be making a further announcement in due course.

Lone Parents

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the change in the number of single parents dependent on state benefits since 1979. [1243]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is in the table.

Number of lone parent recipients[1]

Benefit[2]	1979	1995
Supplementary benefit—income support[3]	306,000	1,061,000
Family income supplement—family credit[4]	42,000	290,000
Rent allowance—housing benefit[5]	n/a[6]	894,000
Rate rebate—council tax benefit[5]	n/a[6]	959,000

Notes

[1] All figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.

[2] There may be a small overlap between income support and family credit, but this would not be significant. There are considerable overlaps between housing benefit and council tax benefit and between these benefits and both income support and family credit.

[3] Supplementary benefit was replaced by income support in April 1988.

[4] Family income supplement was replaced by family credit in April 1988.

[5] For the purposes of income support, housing benefit and council tax benefit, lone parents have been identified as those awarded the lone parent premium in the assessment of benefit.

[6] Housing benefit and council tax benefit were not in payment in 1979. There is no information on the number receiving help through income-related rent allowances and rates rebates.

It should be noted that the figures for each year cannot be totalled because more than one benefit may be in payment at the same time.

Sources

1. Supplementary benefit annual statistical inquiry—November 1979.
2. Income support quarterly statistical inquiry—November 1995.
3. Social security statistics 1980.
4. Family credit 5 per cent. sample of all awards.
5. Housing benefit management information system, annual 1 per cent. sample inquiries, with and without income support, taken at the end of May 1995.

The growth in the number of lone parents dependent on state benefits largely reflects the increase in the lone parent population. The Government's strategy has been to improve systematically work incentives, and the success of this strategy has been confirmed by independent research. The growth in the number of lone parents on income support has slowed since 1992, while the number in work and on family credit continues to grow steadily. Latest figures show that there are now around three lone parents working and receiving family credit for every 10 on income support, compared with just over one for every 10 in 1979. This is despite continuing growth in the number with young children.

We have also recently announced that a major new scheme–parent plus–will be piloted from April 1997. This scheme will offer advice and help to up to 100,000 lone parents on income support who wish to get back into work. Different approaches will be tested to establish which is most cost effective.

ENVIRONMENT

Aquifers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the principal cause of the pollution of aquifers in the United Kingdom; and how many have been sterilised since 1990. [900]

Mr. Clappison: A recent Environment Agency study suggested that landfills are the most numerous point sources of pollutants affecting aquifers and that chlorinated solvents from a variety of sources may cause the most serious contamination. No aquifers have been wholly taken out of service or sterilised since 1990. Remedial action has been taken in some cases.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to increase the penalties for fly–tipping following the introduction of the landfill tax. [1147]

Mr. Clappison: We have already taken steps to ensure that the penalties for fly-tipping are severe. The maximum penalties for waste-related offences are set out in the table:

Offence	Magistrates' court	Crown court
Sections 33(1)(a), (b) or (c) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 Unlawful deposit, recovery or disposal of non–special waste	Imprisonment for six months and/or a fine of £20,000	Imprisonment for two years and/or an unlimited fine
Sections 33(1)(a), (b) or (c) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 Unlawful deposit, recovery or disposal of special waste	Imprisonment for six months and/or a fine of £20,000	Imprisonment for five years and/or an unlimited fine
Special Waste Regulations 1996 Regulation 18 Unlawful movement of handling of special waste	A fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale	Imprisonment for two years and/or an unlimited fine
Section 34(6) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 Breach of the duty of care or Regulations on retention etc. of documents	A fine of £5,000	An unlimited fine
Section 1(1) Control of Pollution (Amendment) Act 1989 Unlawful transportation of waste	A fine of £5,000	n/a
Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994: Regulation 20(5) Failure to register as a waste broker	A fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale	n/a

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what extra help he is proposing to make available to local authorities to counter the problem of fly-tipping following the introduction of the landfill tax. [1148]

Mr. Clappison: The main security against fly-tipping is an adequate regulatory framework. Regulations implemented on 1 May 1994 introduced a new waste management licensing system. These controls, along with section 34 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the associated duty of care for waste which came into force on 1 April 1992, provide a strong regulatory framework to support the tax.

The Environment Agency is the competent authority for the purposes of waste management licensing. The agency has both resources and expertise to advise on the legal and sound management of waste, to investigate offences and to carry out enforcement action. The Government's guidance to the agency on its objectives and contribution to sustainable development clarifies its role in this area. Ministers expect the agency to review procedures for preventing and handling cases of fly-tipping and to use its enforcement powers.

The duty of care, which is a self-regulating system, is an important weapon in the fight against fly-tipping since it requires that waste is passed only to a person authorised to accept it. This helps to identify the person who commits an offence, as consignments of waste can be tracked through the system of transfer notes completed by all parties involved in any waste transfer. Powers to enforce the duty are not specific to the Environment Agency, and it is open to any organisation or individual to bring a prosecution where they consider that the duty has been breached. The penalties which can be imposed for offences relating to waste are severe.

To help minimise the impact of fly-tipping, section 59 of the 1990 Act provides local authorities with the means to effect the removal of illegally deposited waste and to eliminate or reduce the consequences of the deposit. Section 59(6) and (8) provides for the reimbursement in part or in full of the costs incurred.

Basking Sharks

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will include basking sharks in the next tranche of species for the biodiversity action plans. [1156]

Mr. Clappison: No. Basking sharks were not among the 286 species which the UK biodiversity steering group recommended should be included in the second tranche of species action plans to be produced within the next three years. The Government endorsed the steering group's recommendations in the response published in May 1996.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will submit a proposal for an appendix 11 listing under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species for the protection of basking sharks, in time for the next CITES conference in June 1997; and if he will make a statement. [1157]

Mr. Clappison: We have no plans to include such a proposal among the United Kingdom's initiatives for the next CITES conference.

Conservation

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how he plans to consult the public about the third tranche of candidate special areas of conservation in accordance with the EC habitats and species directive; [1195]

(2) if the third tranche of sites will include candidate special areas of conservation for the great crested newt, triturus cristatus. [1196]

Mr. Clappison: A third tranche of candidate special areas of conservation was forwarded to the European Commission on 14 October 1996. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on Wednesday 16 October 1996, Official Report, columns 1073–74. A second public consultation on possible special areas of conservation is planned to commence shortly—this will include possible sites for the great crested newt. The House will be informed and details will be placed in the Library in due course.

Biodiversity Convention

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Government's objective at the conference of the parties to the biodiversity convention in November. [1209]

Mr. Clappison: The Government attach much importance to achieving progress under the convention on biological diversity, and the UK will be participating fully in the forthcoming conference of parties. My right hon. Friend hopes to attend the ministerial segment of the meeting, when he intends to encourage the setting of national objectives and the monitoring of progress under the convention. Other UK priorities include securing progress on the assessment and monitoring of biodiversity, including promoting taxonomy; the conservation and sustainable use of agricultural and forest biodiversity; and the need to improve the operation of the convention, for example by prioritising activity under it and moving to a less concentrated cycle of meetings.

Plutonium

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what environmental impact assessments have been conducted (a) on the storage of separated plutonium at (i) Sellafield and (ii) Dounreay and (b) on the transport of plutonium by air in (x) metal, (y) oxide and (z) nitrate solution forms from and to (1) Carlisle, (2) Wick, (3) Herne and (4) other airports licensed to handle plutonium cargoes. [1817]

Mr. Clappison: The plutonium stores at Sellafield and Dounreay were constructed prior to the introduction of the 1985 Council directive on the Assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment (85/337/EEC)—the environmental impact assessment directive. Questions on the transport of radioactive materials are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with (a) his Japanese counterpart, and (b) Japanese officials about the environmental appraisal of the interim storage of plutonium separated from reprocessed Japanese spent fuel at Sellafield; and what contribution (i) the Environment Directorate of the European Commission, (ii) the Health and Safety Directorate of the European Commission and (iii) the Health and Safety Department of EURATON made to the environmental assessment of plutonium storage at (1) Sellafield and (2) Dounreay. [1832]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 4 November 1996]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has had no consultations with Japanese Ministers or officials about the interim storage of plutonium separated from reprocessed Japanese spent fuel at Sellafield. All nuclear sites, including Sellafield and Dounreay, are subject to regulations governing health and safety, the protection of the environment and the safeguarding of nuclear materials. Questions about the contribution made by the European Commission should be referred to the Commission itself.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what plans the United Kingdom has to put onto the agenda of (a) the United Nations General Assembly and (b) the United Nations Environment Programme the issue of the environmental implications of the planned extended use of mixed oxide plutonium–based nuclear fuel in reactors; [1819]

(2) what plans he has to raise at the next European Environment Council meeting the environmental implications for (a) European Union member states and (b) non-European Union member states trading with the United Kingdom in nuclear fuels of the extension of the use of mixed oxide nuclear fuel in the European Union. [1820]

Mr. Clappison: The Government have no plans to place the environmental implications of the extended use of mixed oxide nuclear fuel on the agenda for the United Nations General Assembly or the United Nations Environment Programme, or to raise the issue at the next European Environment Council meeting.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which reports have been placed before the EU Environmental Council on the implications for environmental protection of the decision of the Transport Council in October to accept a new code of control covering irradiated nuclear fuel. [1818]

Mr. Clappison: No reports have been placed before the EU Environment Council on this matter.

Polluted Mines

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of (a) the range of toxic contaminants, (b) the quantities of polluted water and (c) the methods of remedy available at closed coal mines; and which bodies are responsible for funding the clean-up of polluted mine water. [1816]

Mr. Clappison: The Environment Agency monitors discharges from abandoned coal mines and their impact on receiving waters. Such discharges can contain a range of substances, of which the most common is iron. The quantity of water discharged is highly variable, according to location, geology and season. A typical range is 200 to 15,000 cu m per day. The selection of methods used to treat mine water discharges depends on site-specific factors such as the nature of the mine water and the amount of land available near the discharge.

Liability for water pollution from abandoned coal mines varies according to the local circumstances, but we have said that we expect the Coal Authority to go beyond its strict legal duties and seek to achieve the best environmental results within its available resources. On this basis, the Coal Authority is currently pumping and treating mine water in several locations. In addition, the authority, in consultation with the Environment Agency, is assessing the best options for the remediation of a number of other sites where the environmental impact is most serious. I understand that the information resulting from this assessment will be used to identify a programme of specific projects for which finance will be sought from the Government.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what conditions designed to guarantee the (a) quality, (b) impartiality, (c) independence and (d) integrity of the work of the Building Research Establishment will be imposed on organisations submitting a bid to purchase the Building Research Establishment. [2250]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: We will require prospective purchasers to demonstrate that BRE would under their ownership remain capable of providing the Government with high-quality, independent and impartial research and development and advice across a broad range of building and construction disciplines. BRE's reputation for integrity derives in large part from its staff, who will transfer with the business.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on what criteria he reached his conclusion that the construction industry's proposals for a national centre for construction did not provide a satisfactory basis for the future of the Building Research Establishment; [2252]

(2) in what respects the proposal from the construction industry for the establishment of a national centre for construction failed to meet the criteria he laid down. [2253]

Mr. Jones: The decision we had to take was whether the proposals put forward on behalf of the construction industry—the package of proposals, including the national centre for construction, the arrangements for BRE within the national centre and the Construction Industry Council's indicative offer—offered a basis on which to take forward single tender sale negotiations that would demonstrably result in the best arrangements for the taxpayer. We did not feel that the package as a whole did that.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what factors led him to select February 1997 as the target date for the privatisation of the Building Research Establishment. [2251]

Mr. Jones: It is important for both its staff and its customers that the uncertainty about future ownership of BRE should be ended as soon as practicable. February 1997 is the earliest practicable date for completing the transfer of BRE to the private sector.

Harmful Substances (Smuggling)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent studies his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated in respect of the smuggling into and out of the United Kingdom substances harmful to the environment or contrary to protocols protecting the natural environment; and if he will place copies of these studies in the Library. [2278]

Mr. Clappison: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise are currently carrying out an assessment of the extent to which UK imports and exports of chlorofluorocarbons and other ozone-depleting substances may be in breach of UK and EC restrictions.

Rock Characterisation Facility

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to make a decision on the planning appeal for the construction of a rock characterisation facility at Longlands farm, Gosforth, Cumbria; [2386]

(2) when he expects to receive the planning inspector's report relating to the inquiry into the construction of a rock characterisation facility at Longlands farm, Gosforth, Cumbria. [2385]

Mr. Jones: The Planning Inspectorate has advised that it expects to send the report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in mid-December. Until we have received and considered the report, I cannot say when the decision on the appeal might be made.

Disablement Facilities Grant

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the disabled facilities grant. [2464]

Mr. Clappison: Mandatory disabled facilities grants are retained under part I of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996, which is due to come into force during December. The new provisions will extend the availability of disabled facilities grants, and new means test regulations will ensure that only the resources of disabled persons and their spouses—or parents in the case of disabled children—will be taken into account.

Sewers

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many critical sewers were (a) renovated and (b) replaced in each area in England and Wales in each of the 10 years immediately before the privatisation of the water industry; and how many critical sewers have been (i) renovated and (ii) replaced in each year since privatisation. [1888]

Mr. Clappison: The information was not collected centrally prior to privatisation or in 1989–90, and figures for 1990–91 are not available on a consistent basis. Figures for 1991–92, 1992–93 and 1993–94 are still subject to verification on a company-by-company basis and will be made available in December this year by the Director General of Water Services when the July returns are placed in the public domain. The figures for the last two years, which have been published by the Director General of Water Services, are contained in the tables:

Water Mains

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many kilometres of water mains were (a) renewed and (b) relined in each area of England and Wales in each of the 10 years immediately before the privatisation of the water industry; and how much has been (i) renewed and (ii) relined in each year since privatisation. [1887]

Mr. Clappison: The information was not collected centrally prior to privatisation or in 1989–90, and figures for 1990–91 are not available on a consistent basis. Figures for 1991–92, 1992–93 and 1993–94 are still subject to verification on a company-by-company basis and will be made available in December this year by the Director General of Water Services when the July returns are placed in the public domain. Cyclotetramethylenetetra-nitramine

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what environmental impact assessment has been (a) undertaken and (b) commissioned by his Department into cyclotetramethylenetetra-nitramine. [1834]

Mr. Clappison: As far as I am aware, an environmental impact assessment into cyclotetramethylenetetra-nitramine has neither been undertaken nor commissioned by this Department.

Water Efficiency Plans

Mr. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make arrangements for the water efficiency plans to be (a) made publicly available to hon. Members and (b) placed in the Library; [2287]

(2) what consultation has taken place with consumer, industry and environmental bodies during the compilation of the water efficiency plans; [2289]

(3) if he will list the water undertakers which have submitted their water efficiency plans to the Director General of Water Services; and if they are publicly available; [2286]

(4) when he plans to report on the water efficiency plans. [2288]

Mr. Clappison: The Director General of Water Services has received water efficiency plans from all the companies and will be reporting on them in due course. It is for each water company to publish its plan and disseminate it to its customers.

The director general asked the companies to prepare their plans in consultation with the Environment Agency and the Office of Water Services customer service committees. They are also assisting the director general in his assessment of the plans.

The companies will report on their plans in their July returns to the director general. The first reports will be included in the 1997 returns.

British Coal (Land Transfers)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what recent discussions he has held about the transfer of land to English Partnerships for British Coal; when such a transfer will be completed; and if he will make a statement; [2334]

(2) when he expects the transfer of land from British Coal to English Partnerships to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [2335]

Sir Paul Beresford: An announcement will be made shortly.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2616]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department is aware of the potential problems to departmental computer systems that may be caused by the millennium date change. As previously stated when answering the same question in June of this year, our replacement programme for older systems should ensure a high level of 2000 compliance. Notwithstanding this we are undertaking a study taking guidance from colleagues in CCTA-CITU which will produce a year 2000 compliance audited inventory of systems to form the basis of a costed departmental year 2000 programme. The Department is also working with others as a participant of the year 2000 public sector group.

Global Warming

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the impact of global warming on the sea level in Hampshire in each of the last five years. [1971]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 4 November 1996]: My Department published an independent "Review of the Potential Effects of Climate Change on the UK" in July 1996 which provides an assessment of how climate change could affect the UK. The review suggests a global sea level rise of up to 19 cm by 2020 and a range of 26–50 cm by 2050 against a 1961–1990 baseline, with more rapid sea level rise along the East Anglian and south coasts taking into account projected vertical land movements. Only global assessments of the effects of climate change on sea level rise are available.

Air Pollution

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the contracts which his Department has placed with consultants to investigate air pollution since 1979. [2285]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Detailed summary documents of the research undertaken to investigate air pollution between the years 1990 and 1995 have been placed in the Library of the House. For the years 1979 to 1990, a list of contracts has been collated and a copy also placed in the Library of the House. This list may not be complete, as this information can be collected only at disproportionate costs.

SCOTLAND

Farmers' Income

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the changes in farmers' income in real terms for each month since January 1990; and if he will make a statement. [1590]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The Scottish Office operates the farm accounts surveys, which collects information on farm incomes in Scotland on an annual basis. This information is published each year in "An Economic Report on Scottish Agriculture", "Agriculture in the United Kingdom", "Farm Incomes in the United Kingdom" and "Farm Incomes in Scotland", all of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Algrade Trust

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of the investigations by (a) the police and (b) the Scottish Charities Office into the affairs of the Algrade trust and the application of public and other funds by that trust. [2135]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The police inquiries are continuing. The case against Robert Herriott has been reported by the procurator fiscal and is being considered by Crown counsel. The accounts of the Algrade trust have been completed by the accountants. Some further minor inquiries require to be done by the investigators at the Crown office, after which a decision will be made on whether any action is appropriate under the supervision of charities legislation.

A1

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of plans for dualling the A1 road between Haddington and Dunbar; and when he intends the construction work to start. [2136]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Department published revised draft orders on 28 June this year following changes to the original scheme design and a second draft compulsory purchase order was published on 25 October.

A number of objections to the proposals have been received, which Scottish Office officials are seeking to resolve. It is difficult to forecast at this stage the time needed for the completion of the statutory procedures.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2606]

Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 21 May, Official Report, columns 152–54 which set out all support from public funds given to Health Care International (Scotland) Ltd. in actual and in March 1996 prices. There has been no additional support to HCI from public funds since then.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he estimates the Scottish fishing industry will reach the targets laid down in the current multi-annual guidance programme; what additional (a) grants and (b) other public funds will be made available to the fishing industry when this target is reached; and if he will make a statement. [1543]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 4 November 1996]: We estimate that the UK fishing industry will be close to the targets laid down in the current multi-annual guidance programme when that programme ends on 31 December 1996. Details of the next multi-annual guidance programme remain under discussion. It is too early to say what changes in public expenditure may result.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the loss to the Scottish fishing industry in terms of decommissioning grants and other assistance due to the fact that the United Kingdom has not reached the targets laid down in multi-annual guidance programme 3; and if he will make a statement. [1544]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Decommissioning grants are provided in order to help meet the targets laid down in MAGP 3. The Scottish fishing industry has benefited from substantial UK public sector assistance for that purpose, with support from the European Union.

The fact that the UK Government may not provide certain other types of grant assistance does not affect the overall volume of resources available for EU structural spending, which has been fixed for the period 1994 to 1999. There is thus no quantifiable loss to the Scottish fishing industry.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conditions must be met by a fisherman seeking to access grants towards the building of a new fishing vessel; and if he will make a statement. [1462]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 4 November 1996]: In view of the overcapacity of the fishing fleet, fishermen in Scotland do not have access to grants towards the building of new fishing vessels.

East Ayrshire Community Hospital

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received the alternative proposals for funding the East Ayrshire community hospital from the Ayrshire and Arran community health trust; when he expects to announce his decision; and if he will make a statement. [1488]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 November 1996]: I received the full business case from the Ayrshire and Arran community health trust on 2 September. However, the preferred bidder sought time to revise the bid and was given until 1 November to submit final figures in support of his bid. I expect to be able to announce my decision shortly.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of the Government's proposed changes to the rules for the reclaim of VAT on local authorities in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [2045]

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from The Scotsman newspaper about the public supply of published health and safety reports covering activities at the Dounreay nuclear plant since 1975; and if he will make a statement. [2363]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 4 November 1996]: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what instructions he gave in respect of the release of data contained in the report on "Environmental Radioactivity in Caithness and Sutherland" part 4 to the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment relating to the investigation into the incidence of childhood leukaemia in the Thurso area in 1988; and if he will make a statement. [2365]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton [holding answer 4 November 1996]: My right hon. Friend gave no instructions on this matter. The data contained in the report were available to COMARE at the time of its deliberations about the Dounreay site.

Sir John Wheeler: Police forces in Great Britain currently access the Northern Ireland criminal records system by direct contact with the RUC criminal records office.

The RUC can access criminal records in Great Britain via police national computer—Phoenix—terminals located in Northern Ireland.

There are no plans to bring a single United Kingdom system, although methods of improving access to Northern Ireland criminal records by forces in Great Britain are currently under consideration.

Belfast Airport (Sale)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on whose advice and by what criteria the price of Belfast international airport at Aldergrove was set when originally sold; and by what actual and percentage amount that price was bettered when the airport was subsequently sold. [1202]

Mr. Moss: The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland engaged the services of consultants for the privatisation process. Details of the appointment remain commercial in confidence. The valuation exercise formed part of that process. The criteria used to value the airport were those applicable to a transaction of this type.

The airport was sold by means of a trade sale in a competitive bidding situation which generated a considerable degree of price tension. The purchase price was £32.75 million and the Government withdrew a further £15.51 million in cash from the former company, giving a total return on the transaction of £47.9 million.

We understand that in August 1996 TBI plc acquired the shares in Belfast International Airport Holdings Ltd.—BIAHL—for £72.4 million. In addition, BIAHL paid a dividend of £4.5 million to shareholders. As part of the deal, TBI repaid £28 million of BIAHL's bank borrowings and transaction costs of £2 million. This resulted in a total purchase consideration of £106.9 million.

This figure represents an increase of £59 million on the amount received by Government from the sale of Northern Ireland Airports Ltd. In percentage terms, the increase is equivalent to 123 per cent.

Area Plans

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if the reviews of the area plans in respect of the Down and Newry and Mourne district council areas will be included in the Planning Agency's business case for the financial year 1997–98; [2384]

(2) what is the time scale for the commencement and execution of the work required in respect of the Down and Newry and Mourne area plans; [2402]

(3) what factors led to the exclusion of the area plans for the Down and Newry and Mourne district council areas form the Planning Agency's business case for the financial year 1996–97; [2383]

(4) when he expects the reviews of the area plans in respect of Down and Newry and Mourne district councils to take place; [2417]

(5) if he will make a statement on the adequacy of resources for the (a) review and (b) preparation of the area plans for the Down and Newry and Mourne districts. [2418]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to a Planning Service under its chief executive, Mr. T. Stewart. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 5 November 1996:

Mr. Moss has asked me to reply to your questions about the Down and Newry and Mourne Area Plans.

Only Development Plans which were to be adopted in 1996/97 were included in the Agency's Business Plan for that year. The position will be the same for the 1997/98 Business Plan. When drawing up the development plan programme for 1997/98 and future years, the programming of work on both plans will be taken into account. The work programme will be established in accordance with competing priorities and the available resources.

Although the notional end date for the Down Area Plan is late 1997 and for the Newry and Mourne Area Plan late 1999, they will remain material planning considerations in the determination of any planning applications submitted after those dates.

Tuberculosis Vaccination

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of school leavers in Northern Ireland have been vaccinated against tuberculosis; and if he will make a statement. [1627]

Mr. Moss: The information is not available in the form requested; however, I would refer the hon. Member to the statistical information contained in the publication "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics 1 April 199—31 March 1994" issued by the Department of Health and Social Services which is available in the Library. The Government recommend that BCG vaccine to protect against tuberculosis should be routinely offered to all school children between the ages of 10 and 14 years.

Prisoners (Terrorist Offences)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is his policy in relation to the (a) release, (b) transfer, and (c) repatriation of prisoners detained in Northern Ireland and convicted of terrorist offences; and if he will make a statement; [2051]

(2) how many prisoners detained in Northern Ireland and convicted of terrorist offences have been (a) released, (b) transferred, (c) notified of their release by the end of 1996 and (d) repatriated to prisons in the Republic of Ireland since August 1994; [2143]

(3) in what way the criteria for approving applications by prisoners convicted of terrorist offences and detained in Northern Ireland for (a) release, (b) transfer and (c) repatriation to the Republic of Ireland differ from those applied in other parts of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [2144]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject of these questions has been delegated to the Northern Ireland Prison Service under its chief executive, Mr. Alan Shannon. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Alan Shannon to Mr. Max Madden, dated 5 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to respond to the 3 Parliamentary Questions you tabled about policies with regard to the release, transfer and repatriation of prisoners detained in Northern Ireland, who have been convicted of terrorist offences.

Determinate sentence prisoners in Northern Ireland are released automatically once their full sentences, with the appropriate period of remission, have been served. A prisoner may only be released earlier in exceptional circumstances where the Royal Prerogative of Mercy is exercised. The statistical information you are seeking on releases since 1 August 1994 and prospective releases by 31 December 1996 is not readily available in the format requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. However I can confirm that since 17 November 1995, 160 scheduled offenders have been released on licence, between the half way and two thirds part of sentence, as a result of the changes in remission rules brought in by the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentence) Act 1995.

The release on licence of life sentence prisoners is at the discretion of the Secretary of State who is advised by the Life Sentence Review Board. Since 1 August 1994 58 life sentence prisoners convicted of terrorist related offences have been released on licence and a further 4 prisoners with provisional release dates are expected to be released by 31 December 1996.

The transfer of prisoners between the 3 UK jurisdictions on either a permanent or temporary basis is governed by the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 and administered according to criteria announced in Parliament in 1992. Since 1 August 1994 2 prisoners convicted of terrorist offences in Northern Ireland have transferred to England & Wales; one permanently and the other on a temporary basis.

The repatriation of prisoners from or to Northern Ireland is governed by the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984. Repatriation may be considered where the country to which application is being made is a signatory to the Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons or to the Commonwealth Scheme for the Transfer of Convicted Offenders or has a separate bilateral agreement with the United Kingdom. No prisoners convicted in Northern Ireland have been repatriated to the Republic of Ireland and the Northern Ireland Prison Service is not in receipt of any applications from prisoners seeking repatriation. However one prisoner who was convicted in England, but detained temporarily in Northern Ireland on an intra-UK transfer, was subsequently repatriated to the Republic of Ireland on the authority of the Home Secretary.

You have asked in what way the criteria for approving applications for release, transfer and repatriation differs from those applied in other parts of the United Kingdom. Intra-UK transfers and repatriations are governed by the same legislation and criteria in all 3 UK jurisdictions.

On the question of release each jurisdiction has separate legislation and powers. In Northern Ireland there is no system of parole or discretionary release for determinate sentence prisoners who are released automatically at the completion of their sentences with remission. The procedure for reviewing the sentences of life sentence prisoners also differs from that in other jurisdictions and I attach an explanatory memorandum which illustrates in detail the life sentence review process in Northern Ireland.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2608]

Sir John Wheeler: Northern Ireland Departments are progressing the audits of their computer systems to determine which systems will continue to be in operation as year 2000 approaches and the amount of work that will be necessary to make them compliant. The audits will include an assessment of costs, priorities and time scales.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many civil servants are employed in the drafting and production of statutory instruments. [1683]

Mr. Freeman: Civil servants in many areas of government are involved from time to time in preparing and drafting statutory instruments relating to their areas of work. The staff time spent on this is not recorded separately and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Rendering Facilities

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspectors are currently appointed by the Government to ensure existing (a) legislation and (b) guidelines are met with regard to rendering facilities; and if he will make a statement. [432]

Mrs. Browning: All veterinary staff employed by the Department are appointed as veterinary inspectors under the Animal Health Act 1981 and are empowered to carry out inspections at rendering facilities. A total of 356 veterinary inspectors are employed at present. In addition, 152 technical staff are currently appointed by the Department and they, too, are able to carry out inspections.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the procedure for registering as a rendering facility. [424]

Mrs. Browning: Owners of premises wishing to operate a rendering facility must submit an application to the appropriate MAFF animal health divisional office. The premises are then inspected by State Veterinary Service staff to ensure that the hygiene, structural and processing requirements set out in EC directive 90/667, as amended, and implemented in Great Britain by the Animal By-Products Order 1992, as amended, are met before approval to operate a rendering plant is granted.

Operators wishing to process specified bovine material must be similarly approved but under the Specified Bovine Material (No. 3) Order 1996.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the dates on which those rendering plants which deal exclusively with cattle culled in the 30–month scheme began dealing solely with such cattle; if he will indicate for each the products they were previously rendering; and if he will make a statement. [434]

Mr. Baldry: Details of when those rendering plants processing solely over-30-month scheme—OTMS—material, and in some cases specified bovine material from cattle under 30 months also, began to take OTMS carcases and the material that they processed immediately before that date are listed below:

Name of company	Date started rendering OTMS carcases	Material previously rendered
Canterbury Mills Ltd.	May 1996	SBM and other animal waste
Granox Ltd.	May 1996	SBM and other animal waste
J. G. Pears (Newark) Ltd.	October 1996	animal waste other than SBM
J. L. Thomas Ltd.	May 1996	animal waste other than SBM
Peninsular Proteins Ltd.	May 1996	animal waste other than SBM
Prosper de Mulder and Sons Ltd.(Hartshill)	October 1996	animal waste other than SBM

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all rendering facilities that render mammals without producing mammalian meat and bonemeal; and if he will make a statement. [430]

Mrs. Browning: In Great Britain, the following premises are approved under the Animal By-Products Order 1992, as amended, to part render mammalian by-products, the proteinaceous end product from which must be sent to an approved full renderer for further processing.

ABP Ltd., Shrewsbury

Croda Colloids Ltd., Market Harborough

D. S. Cooper Ltd., Huddersfield

Mitchell By-Products Ltd., Bradford

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all rendering facilities, indicating for each whether they render (a) exclusively cattle culled under the 30-month scheme, (b) exclusively cattle not included in the 30-month scheme and (c) both cattle within the 30-month scheme and cattle not within the scheme; and if he will make a statement. [433]

Mr. Baldry: Of the plants rendering cattle by-products in Great Britain the following are processing:

(a) Over-30–month scheme cattle, and in some cases specified bovine material from under-30–month cattle, on an exclusive basis:

Canterbury Mills Ltd., Canterbury

Granox Ltd., Widnes

J. G. Pears (Newark) Ltd.

J. L. Thomas Ltd., Exeter.

Peninsular Proteins Ltd.

Prosper de Mulder and Sons Ltd., Hartshill.

On (b), no rendering plant in Great Britain is exclusively processing cattle which are under 30 months of age. Generally plants processing non-SBM from cattle under 30 months of age also process other clean offals—for example, from pigs, sheep, and so on. The plants falling into this category—that is, plants which operate without processing OTMS cattle carcases or SBM are as follows:

ABP Ltd., Shrewsbury

Chambers Ltd., Huddersfield

D. S. Cooper Ltd., Huddersfield

Croda Colloids Ltd., Market Harborough

A. Hughes (Skellingthorpe) Ltd., Skellingthorpe

J. Knights Ltd., Silvertown

Mitchell By-Products Ltd., Bradford

Pimlotts Ltd., Norwich

Smith Brothers, Manchester

Sykes, Castleford

Waddington, Bradford

Dundas Chemicals Ltd., Dumfries

McIntosh Donald Ltd., Aberdeen

On (c), the following Great Britain rendering plants are processing OTMS carcases and SBM from cattle under 30 months of age in dedicated rendering lines and, separately, non-SBM in dedicated clean rendering lines:

Fats and Proteins (UK) Ltd., Lancaster

Gilberts Animal By-Products Ltd., Stafford

Dundas Bros Ltd., Aberdeen

William Forrest and Son (Paisley) Ltd.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the conditions required to be met prior to approval being granted to a rendering facility; and if he will make a statement. [425]

Mrs. Browning: Prior to approval being granted under the Animal By–Products Order 1992, rendering plants must meet the range of hygiene, constructional and processing requirements set out in schedule 4 to the order.

Prior to approval being granted under the Specified Bovine Material (No.3) Order 1996, rendering plants must meet the range of hygiene, constructional and processing requirements set out in schedule 1 and article 18 of the order.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the names and locations of rendering plants that (a) produce and (b) do not produce mammalian meat and bonemeal in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [423]

Mrs. Browning: In Great Britain, the following premises are approved under the Animal By–Products Order 1992, as amended, to render fully mammalian by–products and could therefore produce mammalian meat and bonemeal:

Canterbury Mills Ltd., Canterbury
Chambers Ltd., Huddersfield
Fats and Proteins (UK) Ltd., Lancaster
Gilberts Animal By-Products Ltd., Stafford
Granox Ltd., Widnes
Hughes (Skellingthorpe) Ltd., Skellingthorpe
J. G. Pears, (Newark) Ltd.
J. Knights Ltd., Slivertown
J. L. Thomas Ltd., Exeter
Lloyd Maunder Ltd., Cullompton
Peninsular Proteins Ltd., Exeter
Pimlotts, Norwich
Prosper de Mulder and Sons, Hartshill
Smith Brothers, Manchester
Sykes, Castleford
Waddington, Bradford
Dundas Brothers Ltd., Aberdeen
Dundas Chemicals Ltd., Dumfries
McIntosh Donald Ltd., Aberdeen
William Forrest and Son (Paisley) Ltd.

In Great Britain, the following premises are approved under the Animal By–Products Order 1992, as amended, to part render animal by–products or render materials other than mammalian by–products—for example fish, poultry—and do not, therefore, produce mammalian meat and bone meal:

ABP Ltd., Shrewsbury
Alba Proteins Ltd., Penrith
Chaettles Ltd., Nottingham
Croda Colloids, Market Harborough
D. S. Cooper Ltd., Huddersfield
F. Howard Jones and Sons Ltd., Gwent
Grampian Ltd., Aberdeen
Grimsby Fish Products Ltd., Grimsby
Interfish Ltd., Plymouth
Marshall Foods Ltd., Perthshire
Mitchell By-Products, Bradford
Shetland Fish Ltd., Shetland
Sun Valley Ltd., Hereford
United Fish Ltd., Aberdeen.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many Government inspections during (a) 12 June to 12 July, (b) 12 July to 12 August and (c) 12 August to 12 September 1996, were carried out to ensure existing (i) legislation and (ii) guidelines have been met with regard to rendering facilities; and if he will make a statement. [431]

Mrs. Browning: The number of inspection visits made by State Veterinary Service staff to rendering plants during the periods concerned are:

12 June 1996 to 11 July 1996: 87
12 July 1996 and 11 August 1996: 72
12 August 1996 to 11 September 1996: 91

Casualty Animals

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received relating to the reluctance of contractors to pick up bulls as casualty animals; and if he will make a statement. [468]

Mrs. Browning: No such written representations appear to have been made.

Feline Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the incidence of reported feline spongiform encephalopathy for each month since 1990; and if he will make a statement. [454]

Mrs. Browning: The number of feline spongiform encephalopathy cases confirmed by date of clinical onset for each month since 1990 at 29 October 1996 is:

	January	February	March	April	May	June	July	August	September	October	November	December

1996[1]	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—

[1] Data incomplete.

Note:

1. The data do not include five cases confirmed in 1996 for which detailed information is not yet available.
2. Previous figures supplied for numbers of FSE cases have been on the basis of year of administrative confirmation and not on the basis of date of clinical onset of disease as is the case with those in the table. It would not be appropriate to provide monthly figures by the month of confirmation because of the time lag between suspicion and confirmation. The above figures will therefore not necessarily reflect previcus figures given.

Organophosphate Dips

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what liaison there is between his Department, the Department of Health and the Ministry of Defence on the subject of organophosphate dips and their use; and if he will make a statement. [1857]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on 28 October 1996, Official Report, column 52. In addition, I have held a series of meetings with Baroness Cumberlege, Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Health.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2605]

Mr. Boswell: We are currently in the process of assessing the resources required to address the problems faced by computer systems when handling the millennium date change.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the current requirements on local veterinary inspectors to conduct an examination of all sheep and goats being exported; and if he will make a statement. [1981]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The local veterinary inspector responsible for completing an export health certificate for sheep and goats is required to certify that, within 48 hours of loading, they were inspected and showed no clinical sign of disease. For the purposes of export certification, the terms inspection and examination are considered to be synonymous. The instructions to local veterinary inspectors specify that the pre-export examination or inspection of animals should consist of visual appraisal and, if deemed appropriate, physical examination.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many copies of certificate EC 618 have been issued by his divisional veterinary managers during (a) July, (b) August and (c) September in the county of Kent to local veterinary inspectors certifying live sheep for export destined for further fattening. [1983]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The information requested is as follows:

(a) July: 251

(b) August: 204

(c) September: 233

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the working procedures of the export health certificate, Council directive 91/68/EEC, for the export of sheep for further fattening and the current certificate issued by his Department for the export of sheep for further fattening. [1982]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 November 1996]: The official health certificate issued by my Department for sheep and goats for further fattening consigned to other European Union member states is known as EC2747. The certificate fully reflects the conditions in the model health certificate laid down in Council directive 91/68/EEC. Specific notes for guidance and checklists are provided to local veterinary inspectors to enable them to complete certificate EC2747.

Quarantine

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will take steps to set up a trial scheme with a view to replacing current quarantine regulations with a passport for pets system; [2366]

(2) if he will make guide, hearing and appropriate police and customs dogs exempt from current quarantine regulation subject to the microchip identification, vaccination, and blood testing in a passport for pets system. [2367]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Last year, in reply to the Agriculture Committee, the Government said that they would continue to monitor our current quarantine regulations with a view to replacing them if alternatives offering the same degree of protection became available.

We are now looking at the matter, taking account of the most recent information. If new moves are decided upon an announcement will be made.

WALES

Arable Area Payments Scheme

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many agricultural holdings and what area of agricultural land in hectares came within the arable area payments scheme in each county in Wales in (i) 1995 and (ii) 1996. [773]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 28 October 1996]: The information for 1995 is given in the table. The equivalent figures for 1996 are not yet available.

Brain Injuries

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional provision of rehabilitation services for brain injured patients in Wales he has made in the current year; what variations in provision there have been since 1994; and if he will make a statement. [1746]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Provision of rehabilitation for brain injured patients is a matter for health authorities. In response to the Welsh Affairs Committee report on severe head injuries, the chairmen and chief executives of health authorities in Wales have established a steering group to consider the main recommendations. My Department is currently awaiting a full report.

Nursery Vouchers

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the total costs of implementing the nursery voucher scheme in Wales. [1492]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 16 October 1996, Official Report, column 984.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on the proposed levels of hill livestock compensatory allowances for 1996–97; and if he will make a statement. [1856]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My right hon. Friend and I have received representations from individual farmers, industry bodies and Members of Parliament. The farming unions in particular have made detailed representations, including expressing appreciation of the early announcement that across the UK there would be an additional £60 million for cattle payments in 1997. We are now considering, with Ministers from all the agriculture departments, the representations that we have received before making final decisions on rate levels for 1997.

Farmers' Incomes

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the changes in farmers' incomes in real terms for each month since January 1990; and if he will make a statement. [1585]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Data on farm incomes are collected through the farm business survey on an annual basis. They are published in "Farm Incomes in the United Kingdom", 1994–95 being the latest edition, a copy of which is held in the Library of the House.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many grant-maintained schools there were in Wales in (a) 1993, (b) 1994, and (c) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [1742]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information requested is presented in the following table.

Number of grant-maintained schools in Wales[1]

Year	Primary	Secondary	All schools
1993	4	7	11
1994	5	11	16
1995	5	11	16

[1] At 1 September each year. On 1 September 1996 St. Brigid's school in Denbighshire became the first independent school in Wales to opt into the grant-maintained system.

Bala to Dolgellau Road

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the road improvement works on the main Bala to Dolgellau road at Drws Y Nant are going to be put in hand; and if he will make a statement. [1854]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 24 January 1996, Official Report, column 297.

Elderly People

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the current service provision for elderly people with long-term continuing health care needs. [1934]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Assessment of provision for all persons with long-term continuing health care needs is a matter for determination by health authorities.

Health Trust Funding

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many health trusts in Wales have reported their dissatisfaction with their levels of funding; and if he will make a statement. [1864]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: NHS trusts are operationally independent and receive no direct revenue funding from the Welsh Office. All trust income is earned through contracts with commissioners of health care including health authorities and GP fundholders. It is for trusts to determine, together with their health commissioners, what is the appropriate level of funding.

Millennium Date Change

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2609]

Mr. Hague: An assessment of the effect of the millennium date change has been undertaken. I do not expect there to be any major costs involved in ensuring that my Department's computer systems can cater for the year 2000.

HEALTH

Dental Services

11. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for improving dental care in Norfolk and Cambridgeshire; and if he will make a statement. [619]

Mr. Malone: The general dental service reforms that I announced on 12 June will bring improvements in dental care generally. Funding to improve the availability of national health service dentistry has recently been approved for Cambridge and Huntingdon health authority.

24. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the proposed new local contracting arrangements for NHS dentistry. [634]

Mr. Malone: The White Paper, "Choice and Opportunity", set out the Government's proposal to introduce local flexibility in the delivery of national health service primary care dental services. We intend to introduce a Bill this Session. It will enable health authorities and providers to propose local arrangements for securing services targeted at local needs. These arrangements will be piloted and evaluated. Participation will be by volunteers and the existing system will remain for dentists who wish to work under it.

26. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists are practising in Berkshire; and how many of them are taking on new adult national health service patients. [636]

Mr. Malone: The information is contained in the table.

General dental service: number of dentists[1][2] practising in Berkshire health authority and number of dentists[1][3] who had additions to their register

Number of dentists practising at 30 June 1996	Number of dentists with an addition to their register in the year to 31 December 1995[3]
284	269

[1] Includes principals, assistants and vocational trainees.

[2] Some dentists have a contract with more than one health authority. The number of dentists practising includes all dentists who practise in Berkshire as well as in other authorities.

[3] The additions to the register include instances of patients registering with a dentist after a break in attendance and reinstatement of registrations which had been cancelled in error.

The count relates to registrations for which payments were authorised during the year. Payments are made one month in arrears.

Zinc-based Dental Amalgams

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has initiated into the safety of the use of zinc-based dental amalgams; and if he will make a statement. [1859]

Mr. Malone: None. While some dental amalgams contain a small proportion of zinc, we are not aware of any in which zinc is a main constituent.

NHS Waiting Lists

12. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on national health service waiting lists in Dorset in relation to those in the rest of England. [620]

Mr. Horam: I am pleased to say that the national health service in Dorset has continued to maintain an excellent position on hospital waiting times. The latest figures show that only 1 per cent. of Dorset health authority residents on a waiting list are waiting longer than six months, the lowest proportion for any health authority in England. No Dorset resident was waiting more than 12 months for treatment.

Small Community Pharmacies

13. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide assistance to small community pharmacies. [621]

Mr. Malone: The essential small pharmacy scheme already provides financial support to pharmacies located more than 1km from the next nearest pharmacy and which dispense fewer than 18,432 national health service prescriptions in a year.

Health Care Facilities (Yorkshire)

14. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve health care facilities in Yorkshire hospitals. [623]

Mr. Horam: We are improving health care facilities in a number of hospitals in Yorkshire. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State saw some excellent examples of this recently when he visited Huddersfield Health Care National Health Service Trust.

Victoria Hospital, Lichfield

15. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will visit the Victoria hospital, Lichfield; and if he will make a statement. [624]

Mr. Horam: I have no plans to visit the Victoria hospital in the foreseeable future. However, my hon. Friend the Minister for Health visited the Victoria hospital, Lichfield on 2 June 1995, where he was most impressed with the improved and new facilities.

Fireworks Injuries

16. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost to the NHS of injuries by fireworks in the last year for which figures are available. [625]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available. However, information requirements are kept under continuous review.

Asthma

17. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent research his Department has carried out into possible links between diesel exhaust emissions and asthma; and if he will make a statement. [626]

Mr. Horam: The Government have evaluated a range of research related to possible health effects of air pollution, including diesel emissions. The reports of the expert advisory committee on the medical effects of air pollutants, "Asthma and Outdoor Air Pollution" and "Non-biological Particles and Health", were published in autumn 1995. Copies are available in the Library.

Health Care (Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the Manchester health authority and family practitioners committee about health care in Manchester. [629]

Mr. Horam: I met representatives of the former Manchester Health Commission and community health councils in January to discuss the difficult challenges that Manchester faces.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department is taking to reduce the mortality rate from breast cancer. [630]

Mr. Horam: The Government are fully committed to reducing deaths from breast cancer, which is why we have made the reduction in breast cancer mortality a "Health of the Nation" target. We have a national breast screening programme and continue to fund research in this area. In 1995 we published the "Policy Framework for Commissioning Cancer Services" to help improve the quality of cancer services and issued further guidance to purchasers in July 1996 with the specific aim of making further progress on breast cancer outcomes.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase breast cancer services; [1234]

(2) what plans he has to increase the provision of mobile breast cancer services. [1239]

Mr. Horam: The provision of breast cancer services is a matter for individual health authorities in the light of local priorities and available resources.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much was spent by his Department on breast cancer services in each of the last six years; and how much is planned to be spent in (a) 1996 and (b) 1997; [1235]

(2) what was the average expenditure, in the last financial year, on detecting and treating each case of breast cancer. [1242]

Mr. Horam: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve awareness of breast cancer among young people at school. [1236]

Mr. Horam: We have no plans at present. Higher priority is given to health messages more relevant to young people at school, since there are no appropriate behavioural changes for young people that would reduce their risk.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide assistance to general practitioners to deal with the medical, emotional and practical problems caused by breast cancer. [1237]

Mr. Horam: "Guidelines for referral of patients with breast problems", produced jointly by the national health service breast screening programme and the Cancer Research Campaign on behalf of the Department of Health's advisory committee on breast cancer screening was issued to general practitioners in January 1996. A summary of "Improving Outcomes in Breast Cancer: Guidance for Purchasers", published by the NHS executive in July 1996, was sent to all general practitioners in October. Both these publications will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated regarding the detection and treatment of breast cancer. [1238]

Mr. Horam: The United Kingdom Health Departments, along with the Medical Research Council and the two major cancer research charities—the Cancer Research Campaign and the Imperial Cancer Research Fund—are currently funding four studies into breast cancer screening costing at least £5 million over five years. The trials are being co-ordinated by the United Kingdom Co-ordinating Committee on Cancer Research, UKCCCR. The Department of Health's contribution is expected to be some £2.4 million.

The Department's policy research programme also funds the cancer screening evaluation unit—CSEU—at the Institute of Cancer Research by some £420,000 per year. The CSEU is undertaking work into two of the above UKCCCR trials. These are a trial of breast screening of women from age 40 and a trial of the early detection of breast cancer. The CSEU is also undertaking work on the national breast cancer screening record, and is evaluating the results of two pilot studies into breast screening for women aged 65 to 69. When the current CSEU contract comes to an end in December 2000, the Department will have invested some £7.3 million in the unit.

In addition, the NHS research and development programme is currently undertaking 12 studies into breast cancer at a cost of some £1.2 million.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on breast cancer services by (i) France, (ii) Germany and (iii) the Netherlands in the most recent year for which figures are available. [1240]

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected routinely.

Health Authority Deficits

21. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to ascertain the likely financial deficits of district health authorities for each financial year until 1999–2000. [631]

Mr. Horam: The current year forecast outturn positions of health authorities are the subject of regular monitoring by the national health service executive. The forecast positions for each health authority, as at quarter one 1996–97, were recently placed in the Library. Future year projections are not routinely collected.

27. Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of current health authority deficits in the present financial year. [637]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 17 October 1996, Official Report, columns 1104-105.

NHS Trusts (North Thames Region)

22. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the chairman of North Thames region and with the Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority and Redbridge and Forest NHS trusts about their performance as published in league tables [632]

Mr. Horam: The Secretary of State regularly meets regional chairman to discuss the performance of the national health service in their region. Redbridge Healthcare NHS Trust and Forest Healthcare NHS Trust are working with Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority to improve their performance.

Incontinence Products

23. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the full cost to the NHS in the current financial year of the removal of zero rating from incontinence products. [633]

Mr. Burns: Under the Value Added Tax Act 1994, schedule 8, group 12, item 2(g), incontinence products are zero rated only when supplied directly to a disabled person or to a charity which makes them available to disabled persons. As the national health service falls into neither of these categories, supplies of these products are, and always have been, standard rated. Since there is no change, there will be no associated increased cost for the NHS. It is only through a temporary relaxation in the interpretation of the VAT regulations by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise that the NHS has been able temporarily to claim a VAT reimbursement on these products.

Prescription Charges

25. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the level of the prescription charge in 1979 at current prices. [635]

Mr. Malone: At 1996–97 prices, the prescription charge at 1 January 1979 would have been £0.52, actual charge £0.20, until 16 July, when it increased to £1.18, actual charge £0.45.

Mixed Wards

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy on mixed wards in NHS hospitals. [627]

Mr. Horam: It is for health authorities and trusts to decide whether and, if so, how to use mixed sex accommodation, but they must respect the dignity and privacy of patients.

Private Finance Initiative

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals in England processing PFI bids have reached the preferred bidder stage; and what proportion of the total number of bids this figure represents. [1123]

Mr. Horam: Information is collected centrally on the first wave of major private finance initiative schemes with a capital value of £10 million or more. There are 33 in total and, of these, 22 schemes have reached preferred bidder stage.

Specialist Registrars

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many specialist registrar posts there are in England and Wales for (a) oncology, (b) palliative care and (c) pathology; and how many of these posts are currently vacant. [1122]

Mr. Malone: The phased introduction of the new specialist registrar grade commenced on 1 April 1996 in six specialties. Transition on oncology, palliative care and pathology commenced on 1 October 1996. Transition to the new grade in all specialties will be completed on 1 April 1997. The most recent census data—30 September 1995—do not include any information about the specialist registrar grade. The only available information relates to the previous grades for registrar.

Surgeons and Anaesthetists

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) surgeon and (b) anaesthetist vacancies there are at each grade in England [1110]

Mr. Malone: The annual medical work force census gathers data, as at 30 September each year, on vacancies by grade and specialty. These refer to posts which were vacant for whatever reason on the actual day of collection. Figures for England, as at 30 September 1995, are shown in the table.

Whole-time equivalent

	Consultant	Staff grade	Senior registrar	Registrar	Senior house officer
All surgical specialties	140	20	40	70	60

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected centrally.

Long-term Care

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a summary of the responses to his consultation paper on long-term care; if he will list the organisations and individuals who responded; and if he will put a copy of the responses in the Library. [1821]

Mr. Burns: The Department of Health received 598 responses to the consultation exercise launched by the publication of "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age".

Of these, 319 responses commented on the consultation paper itself. Copies of these will be placed in the Library, except where respondents asked for them to be treated as confidential. The other responses commented on media reports or the Department's own summary of the consultation paper. The table shows the source of the different comments.

(2) at what age children are offered vaccination against tuberculosis in schools; [1563]

(3) if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on vaccination against tuberculosis. [1564]

Mr. Horam: The Government recommend that BCG vaccine to protect against tuberculosis should be routinely offered to all school children between the ages of 10 and 14 years. This policy is based on the recommendation of the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation, which advises the UK health departments on immunisation. The committee has reviewed this recommendation and advised that the schools immunisation programme should continue. Ministers have endorsed this and a statement to this effect was made in the House, on 4 July 1996, Official Report, column 493; health authorities were advised of this recommendation in July 1996. In addition, immunisation continues to be offered to certain high-risk groups outside the routine school programme, including babies born to parents from countries with a high prevalence of tuberculosis. It is estimated that over the two years 1994–95 and 1995–96 around 73 per cent. of school leavers had been given a BCG vaccination.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many registered homeless people have died from tuberculosis in the United Kingdom in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement; [1565]

[3] England and Wales figures for 1993 and 1994 represent the number of deaths occurring in each year. All the other figures are the number of deaths registered in the year. Also, new procedures for coding cause of death in England and Wales from 1993 mean that figures for 1993 onwards may not be exactly comparable with earlier years.
[4] Provisional.

ONS statistics on infectious diseases do not identify registered homeless people separately. National data on rates of tuberculosis infection amongst homeless people are not available.

The United Kingdom has an excellent record of tuberculosis control. The Government are strengthening policies to protect the health of the nation against this disease.

Ministers established an interdepartmental working group on tuberculosis with the remit to consider policies for tuberculosis control in the UK and to recommend best practice. The first two reports of the group, one of which deals with tuberculosis and homeless people, have been published and generally welcomed as important steps towards improvements in the control of tuberculosis in the UK.

The Government have also taken several initiatives to improve the access of homeless people to health care, including funding of primary health care projects.

[1954]

Mr. Burns: Physical punishment is a matter for parents and for negotiation between them and their child minders. Copies will be placed in the Library.

The United Kingdom was appointed as the rapporteur with France as the co-rapporteur for the assessment of this product. The initial assessment was therefore made by the Medicines Control Agency and advice obtained from the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

The final assessment and opinion were given by the Committee on Proprietary Medicinal Products and the authorisation to market Riluzole was given by the European Commission according to the procedure set out in regulation 93/2309 EC. This marketing authorisation is binding across all 15 member states of the European Union.

The summary of product characteristics defines the indications and use of the product and a European public assessment report describes the evaluation of the product and is available from the European Medicines Evaluation Agency at 7 Westferry Circus, Canary Wharf, London E14 4HB.

Sir John Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the minimum level of service necessary to run (a) a minor accident treatment service unit and (b) a medical receiving room. [2145]

Mr. Maclean: No. It is already a requirement that shotguns must be stored securely.

Young Offenders

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the Government's policy in respect of eliminating the remanding of youths in prison. [2315]

Mr. Maclean: We are committed to ending the remand of 15 and 16-year-old boys to Prison Service establishments as soon as there are sufficient secure local authority places to accommodate them. A building programme of 170 new secure places is under way for this purpose. The first places came on stream last December and all additional places will be available during 1997.

Gun Clubs

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost to gun clubs of the increased security measures which will be required as a result of the Government's proposals. [1479]

Miss Widdecombe: The proposals will result in increased costs for clubs which choose to become licensed pistol clubs. The level of costs involved will depend on the extent of their existing security arrangements. These costs cannot currently be quantified.

General Election Campaign

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details of the present expenditure limits which candidates may not exceed in a general election campaign; and what plans he has to increase these limits before the next election. [1679]

Mr. Sackville: The current maximum amounts for candidates' election expenses at a general election are set out in the Representation of the People (Variations of Limits of Candidates' Election Expenses) Order 1994. Those limits are as follows. Consideration is being given to increasing these levels before the next general election in line with inflation movements since they were last increased in 1994.

Parliamentary general election	£	Plus pence per elector
County constituency	4,642	5.2
Borough constituency	4,642	3.9

Involuntary Manslaughter

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to respond to the Law Commission report, "Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter", with particular reference to its implications for health and safety at work. [2012]

Mr. Maclean: The Law Commission's report on involuntary manslaughter raises some important but complex issues, which the Government are still considering. A major element of that consideration is whether a failure to ensure the health and safety of persons employed in or affected by a company's activities should constitute a new offence of corporate killing. We will announce our response to the report in due course.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages and disadvantages of each repeal. [1403]

Mr. Howard: I do not propose to repeal any regulations by the end of 1996, but on present plans the Licensing Act 1964 will be amended by the end of this year. Amendments to a number of other Acts should be made in the new year.

The aim of each amendment will be to reduce rather than increase compliance costs, so a compliance cost assessment is not required. We do, however, seek to estimate approximate savings wherever possible. The cost of undertaking a CCA varies from case to case, but it is generally modest. Because part of the cost falls on the businesses consulted, a full CCA would be inappropriate for measures designed to reduce business burdens.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers are currently in detention; how many of them are detained in HM prisons; how many asylum seekers have been detained at the port of entry since July; and if he will make a statement. [1763]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 1 October 1996, a total of 864 persons, who had sought asylum at some stage, were detained, of whom 343 were held in Her Majesty's prisons.

A total of 642 persons who had sought asylum at ports between 1 July and 30 September 1996 are recorded as having been placed in detention during that period.

Merseyside Police Authority

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to enable the Merseyside police authority to recruit more police officers in the years 1997 to 2000. [2472]

Mr. Maclean: It is for the police authority and the chief constable to determine the number of police officers in the force, having regard to the resources available to them. On the present basis of allocation, Merseyside police authority's share of the additional funds being made available for the recruitment of 5,000 extra officers in England and Wales would be sufficient for it to recruit 110 constables between April 1997 and March 1999.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) speed cameras and (b) live speed cameras are currently installed in the UK. [2061]

Mr. Maclean: The deployment of speed cameras is an operational matter for chief officers of police and highway authorities. The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Modern Apprenticeship Scheme

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people have taken up places on the modern apprenticeship scheme since the scheme was created. [2591]

Mr. Paice: As of August 1996, the latest date for which information is available, 46,100 had started on modern apprenticeships in Great Britain.

Teacher Education Allocations

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to control the increase in administration costs in respect of teacher education allocations; and what is her estimate of the increase in those costs in 1996–97. [2243]

Mr. Forth [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The Teacher Training Agency has reformed the allocations methodology in order to reward quality and increase the value for money obtained from its annual investment of over £160 million in initial teacher training. The agency's total running costs, which also cover the promotion of teaching as a career, the development of national standards and training for headteachers and teachers, and work on the new national curriculum for initial teacher training, are planned to increase by some £0.6 million in 1996–97. This reflects increased activity in pursuit of the agency's statutory objectives of raising the standards of teaching and improving the quality and efficiency of training.

School Budgets

Mr. Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many local education authorities in East Anglia increased the amount spent on administration and reduced the amount spent on schools in the last year for which information is available. [2049]

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The following table sets out changes in spending on schools and on administration, in cash and in percentage terms, between 1993–94 and 1994–95, the latest years for which data are available. The table also shows the relevant pupil numbers. Figures are given for Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire and Essex LEAs. Pupils in, and expenditure on, grant-maintained schools in these areas are not included.

Teachers Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she received the Government Actuary's report on the teachers superannuation scheme for the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1991; what estimates she has made of the contributions required to meet liabilities; if she will place a copy of the report in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [2471]

Mrs Gillan: My right hon. Friend received the Government Actuary's report on 21 October 1996. The Department asked for the report to be drawn up on the basis that the cost of future premature retirements would be met directly by employers. On that basis, the report recommends the introduction from 1 April 1997 of a combined contribution rate of 13.2 per cent. of salaries—6 per cent. from employees and 7.2 per cent. from employers. The Government Actuary has indicated that if the cost of premature retirement continued to be borne by the scheme, the combined contribution rate would be 14.8 per cent. of salaries. The report was included as part of a package setting out proposals for the reform of the early retirement provisions of the teachers superannuation scheme, issued on 22 October 1996. I am placing copies of the consultation package in the Library. My right hon. Friend will lay the report formally before the House when she has taken decisions following the consultation.

Remploy

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how Remploy has performed against its 1995–96 annual performance agreement. [3088]

Mr. Paice: Now that Remploy has published its report and accounts for 1996 and audited figures are available, my noble Friend the Minister of State has today confirmed that Remploy has exceeded its 1995–96 APA targets. The targets and achievements are contained in the following table:

	Target	Achievement
The average number of disabled people employed by Remploy	at least 9,200	9,334
Average number of disabled people employed in factories	no more than 7,200	7,144
The number of disabled employees to move from Remploy factories to Interwork having been employed there for at least one year, or from Interwork or factories to open employment	at least 125	177
The unit cost of Interwork to be	no more than £4,500	£4,242
Remploy to keep within a unit cost target (operating deficit per disabled worker) of	£10,400	£10,175
Choices programme' to be in place in every factory	By end March 1996	Available in all factories

' The choices programme is a programme designed to give new recruits to Remploy, as well as the company's existing employees, the opportunity, guidance and training to plan a career best suited to their individual needs.:
Copies of Remploy's 1996 annual report and accounts have been placed in the Library.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the progress made on piloting arrangements for education and training undertaken by people receiving jobseeker's allowance. [3089]

Mr. Forth: We have submitted proposals to the Social Security Advisory Committee. These are being discussed by the committee today. Copies of the papers submitted to the committee have been placed in the Library.

The pilot would provide different arrangements for education and training undertaken by people receiving jobseeker's allowance. The pilots are intended to start, subject to parliamentary approval, in April 1997.

In addition, we announced on 10 October the intention to extend the project work pilot approach to up to 100,000 people, in all parts of the country. The areas in which project work will began to operate early next year will be announced tomorrow.

DUCY OF LANCASTER

Draft Legislation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make it his policy for all draft legislation to carry a compliance cost assessment relating to public and private sectors. [2723]

Mr. Freeman: The Government require a compliance cost assessment for all draft legislation likely to affect business. The purpose of the assessment is to assess the costs likely to fall on business. Other costs, such as any cost to the public sector, must be included in the regulatory appraisal which must also be prepared for all legislative proposals likely to affect business. Guidance booklets on compliance cost assessment and regulatory appraisal are available in the House Libraries as follows:

"checking the Cost of Regulation: A Guide to Compliance Cost Assessment"

"Regulation in the Balance: A Guide to Regulatory Appraisal Incorporating Risk Assessment".

Crown Copyright

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has for the future administration of Crown copyright. [3220]

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to announce that my Department will be co–ordinating an inter–departmental review of the future management of Crown copyright, with the following terms of reference:

"To review the management of Crown copyright with a view to facilitating the growth of new information services both in printed and electronic formats, in line with the Government's policy of maximising public access to official information, and subject to the continuing need to protect the taxpayer's interest and the integrity of Crown copyright material."

Following this internal review, the Government propose to publish next year a Green Paper inviting views from interested parties.

Electronic Services

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the progress which has been made on the Government's proposals to use information technology to deliver Government services electronically to (a) businesses and (b) individuals. [3241]

Mr. Freeman: I informed the House on 11 July 1996 that the Government intended to produce a Green Paper on this subject. I have today presented to Parliament a Command Paper, Cm 3438, entitled "government.direct—A Prospectus for the Electronic Delivery of Government Services". This paper sets out the Government's vision for the delivery of Government services to business and the citizen in the electronic age, harnessing the power of the information revolution to ensure that Government services are provided in the most effective and efficient way, making use of advanced technology to improve the quality of service and the value provided to the taxpayer.

The vision set out in the Green Paper describes how access to Government can be made via personal computers, electronic terminals in public places and via ordinary TV sets. Three pilot projects are also launched today which exemplify the possibilities for the future.

This Command Paper is a first step in a new phase of this Government's continuing public service reforms. It heralds an era where Government services will be more accessible and easy to use than ever before. They will be more convenient, quicker in response and less costly to the taxpayer. The benefits to the citizen, to business and ultimately to the competitiveness of this country will be considerable.

The Command Paper is intended to stimulate debate and to encourage reaction and comment from all interested parties. The Government want to develop this new revolution in public services in line with public demand and acceptance.

WALES

Environment Report

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to publish a report on the environment. [3180]

Mr. Hague: The "Environment in Wales Fifth Report", which is being published by my Department today, gives an overview of the state of the Welsh environment. It also provides details of the initiatives which are under way, or planned and places a particular emphasis on progress toward achieving sustainable development. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of both Houses.

School Security

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional resources have been given to each local authority in Wales to meet the recommendations of the Government working party on school security. [1491]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Measures to improve school security have been included in the grants for education, support and training programme for 1997–98. The overall level of local authority funding has yet to be determined.

Tir Cymen

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what financial provision he has made for the expansion of Tir Cymen over the next six months; what was the figure for the previous six months; and if he will make a statement; [1587]

(2) what plans he has in respect of the expansion of Tir Cymen over the next six months; and if he will make a statement. [1586]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Countryside Council for Wales was given £5.36 million grant in aid for Tir Cymen for the financial year 1996–97. The future shape of support measures for environmental conservation on farms is being considered by the agri-environment working group announced by my right hon. Friend in the rural White Paper. The Welsh Office Agriculture Department plans to issue a consultation paper later this year.

Cattle Cull

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made in ensuring that Welsh farmers are given access to the approved abattoirs authorised under the 30-month cattle cull scheme; and if he will make a statement. [1752]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Intervention Board executive agency is ensuring that an appropriate proportion of cattle from Wales is slaughtered each week in both Welsh and English abattoirs.

A5

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when are the necessary remedial works on the A5 between Betws-y-Coed and Corwen at Padog bends planned to be undertaken; and if he will make a statement. [1739]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The north Wales trunk road Agency, as agent of the Welsh Office, is currently engaged on the design of the retaining wall remedial works.

It is planned to undertake the works in 1997 on completion of the necessary procedures, including land acquisition.

Elderly People

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to encourage local authorities and health authorities in Wales to agree criteria plans for continuing health care needs of elderly people. [1933]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In line with guidance already issued, from 1 April this year health authorities should have in place policies and eligibility criteria for continuing health care which have been agreed with local authorities and GP fundholders.

A470

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when is the scheduled completion date for the current road improvement works on the A470 between Blaenau Ffestiniog and Betws-y-Coed; and if he will make a statement. [1751]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Cancoed to Minffordd section of the A470 Lledr valley improvement is programmed for completion in autumn 1997.

Farmers' Incomes

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assistance and advice is available to members of the farming community who seek to diversify operations in order to supplement income; and if he will make a statement. [1851]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, through the rural Wales objective 5b programme, 1994 to 1999, assists farming households to develop alternative sources of income and employment opportunities on and off the farm and includes provision for capital grants, advice and training. The Leader II programme also acts as a stimulus to encourage farmers to develop new and innovative enterprises.

The processing and marketing grant scheme provides support towards the capital cost of adding value to agricultural raw materials in the food sector.

The marketing development scheme provides grant aid to farmers and producer groups to undertake feasibility studies to explore food diversification projects.

Local Management of Schools

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress he is making in reviewing Conwy local education authority's LMS scheme; and if he will make a statement. [2003]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Approval of Conwy LEA's local management of schools scheme was conditional on the resolution of certain concerns about the authority's resource allocation formula. These are still under review.

Welsh Language Speech Therapy

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on (a) the level of provision of Welsh-medium speech and language therapy for children in Wales, (b) the number of trained Welsh-medium speech therapists and (c) the establishment of a Welsh-medium speech therapy course at colleges in Wales. [1764]

Mr. Hague: The level of provision of Welsh-medium speech and language therapy for children in Wales is for health authorities to determine taking into account the health needs of their areas and their own assessment of priority. Information on the number of trained Welsh-medium speech therapists in Wales is not held centrally. Responsibility for training, including the provision of a Welsh-medium course rests with individual higher education institutions. A specific bilingual option for students during the third year of study already exists at the University of Wales institute, Cardiff.

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the current policy for accepting patients from Powys at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital. [1765]

Mr. Hague: This is a matter for the Dyfed/Powys health authority and the trust concerned. Currently the agreement reached is that all patients should be admitted in accordance with the Welsh patients charter standards.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [2473]

Mr. Hague: None.

School Class Sizes

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many and what percentage of five, six and seven-year-olds were in classes of 31 or more, for 1995 and provisionally for 1996, per education authority and in Wales. [2425]

(2) what percentage of primary schools pupils were in classes of 31 or more for each year since 1990 (a) in Wales and (b) per authority; and what was the percentage change between 1995 and 1996. [2478]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information requested is not collected centrally. Data are collected about the number of classes by size band of class, but no data are collected about the exact number of pupils, or the age of pupils, in those classes. The following table shows the number of ordinary classes in maintained primary schools, by size band.

DEFENCE

Tornado Aircraft

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of Tornados have been grounded for each month of the last two years for failing to be in airworthy condition. [1154]

Mr. Soames: During the last two years the Tornado fleet has met all of its operational commitments and has not been grounded. RAF aircraft are only permitted to fly if it is judged safe for them to do so. To achieve and maintain this high safety standard all aircraft are subject to regular detailed engineering examination and assessment, and are subject to a rigorous scheduled maintenance programme. Although this work ensures the highest standard of safety, it does mean that the aircraft are unavailable to fly while the necessary work is being carried out. Allowance is made for this in the aircraft establishment figures. Those aircraft operating at the front line require scheduled minor maintenance. Minor faults which are discovered are usually rectified at the unit so that the aircraft can be available to fly at the earliest opportunity.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the adequacy of private refurbishment contracts of Tornado aircraft. [1155]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The overall performance of private contractors in carrying out maintenance work for the RAF is good—many of them helped build the aircraft in the first place. All first-line maintenance of operational fast-jet aircraft continues to be done by RAF trades men. However, some of the deeper maintenance of these aircraft is carried-out by contractors.

We attach great importance to ensuring that contractors deliver work of the necessary quality. Contracting procedures are focused on achieving this and contracts are placed only with those suppliers who have been assessed by an accredited body to an appropriate quality management standard. The MOD aims to place full responsibility for the quality of products and services with its contractors.

Holy Loch (Pollution)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the types and quantities of radioactive or other toxic substances which have been found in the cleaning of the seabed of the Holy Loch; and if he will make a statement on the purpose of this exercise. [1501]

Mr. Soames: There is no longer a defence requirement for Holy Loch. My Department plans, therefore, to clear debris from the bed of the loch to a suitable standard to allow responsibility for it to be transferred back to the appropriate civil authorities. We have received a number of local requests to carry out such a clearance.

No clearance work has yet started. We have agreed to carry out an environmental assessment of the impact of the clearance process on the local area before any such work is undertaken, and to make public its results. Our plans have been discussed fully with the local authority and environmental agencies.

Levels of radioactive contamination in the loch are extremely low. The report of a survey carried out by the defence radiological protection service and the US Navy in 1992 concluded that there is no public radiological hazard associated with the debris, or its removal. These conclusions have been confirmed by subsequent annual surveys. No toxic materials have been identified in the various visual surveys which we have carried out in preparation for the clearance operation.

Organophosphate Dips

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what liaison there is between his Department, the Department of Health and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the subject of organophosphate dips and their use; and if he will make a statement. [1865]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food yesterday.

Army Vehicle Depot

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has in respect of the rail head at the Army vehicle depot at Ludgershall. [2224]

Mr. Soames: We intend to retain part of the Army vehicle depot at Ludgershall after its closure in March 1997 to provide railhead facility for land command units. The development of a railhead facility close to the Salisbury plain training area would facilitate future operational deployments and enhance pre-deployment training, as well as having had significant advantages for routine training, including a significantly reduced requirement for the use of public roads by heavy equipment transport vehicles.

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was his Department's initial estimate of the costs of moving military air traffic control from West Drayton to the new national en-route centre at Swanwich; and what is the current estimate of the costs. [2589]

Mr. Soames: A detailed estimate was one of the stipulated products of a project definition study carried out by Lockheed Martin. The estimate that has resulted is dependent on a number of other factors currently being studied, and is commercially sensitive.

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to announce the future location of military air traffic control. [2588]

Mr. Soames: The Ministry of Defence places great importance on the joint and integrated nature of air navigation service provision by National Air Traffic Services Ltd. and the Ministry of Defence. The Ministry of Defence endorsed the National Air Traffic Services Ltd. two-centre strategy and is participating fully in the review of that strategy which aims to identify the most efficient and cost effective means of providing air navigation services. An announcement will be made once that review has been concluded.

Environment Manual

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to update his Department's 1991 environment manual. [2585]

Mr. Soames: A revised version of my Department's environment manual was published in October 1996 and is currently being distributed. A copy will be placed shortly in the Library of the House of Commons.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [1402]

Mr. Soames: The MOD is not a regulator of business and has not, therefore, identified any such rules or regulations. My Department continues to contribute to the deregulation initiative by focusing efforts on relieving unnecessary administrative burdens on suppliers, streamlining contracts procedures, and improving communications with industry.

Bowman Programme

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the slippage in the estimated time of the signing of the contract for the Bowman programme; and what is the latest estimated date for the granting of a contract. [1552]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The project definition phase of the Bowman programme is essentially complete and development standard equipment is currently being tested in field trials. Arrangements for proceeding to the production phase are under consideration and a decision on the way ahead will be taken as soon as possible. The estimated date of contract signature for production will depend upon the outcome of our considerations but it is unlikely to be before early 1999. This would represent a slippage of about 15 months compared with the date envisaged at the beginning of the project definition phase.

Airborne Warning and Communication Aircraft

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many offset contracts have been placed after the agreement to purchase AWAC aircraft; and what is the total amount of these contracts. [1553]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Following the signature of the AWACS contract with the Boeing defence and space group in November 1986 some 250 United Kingdom companies have received contracts which discharged Boeing's industrial participation obligation of US$1.57 billion.

Offset Purchasing Agreements

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action is being taken by his Department (a) to monitor the amount and completion of offset defence purchasing agreements and (b) to assess the percentage of the agreements that are made as opposed to the amount agreed at the signing of the purchasing contract. [1631]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Companies with offset obligations are required to submit reports to my Department every six months, detailing relevant contracts awarded to the United Kingdom defence industry during the reporting period. A full audit of these reports is conducted in order to establish the validity of the claims and to ensure that the companies are complying with the terms and conditions of their offset commitment. All obligations entered into have been achieved within the period agreed.

Trained Soldiers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the establishment total of trained soldiers (a) at 1 October 1996 and (b) planned to be at 1 April 1997, including Gurkha trained personnel but excluding trained Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service) troops. [2486]

Mr. Soames: Manpower requirements are set at 1 April for each year. The requirement for trained British and Gurkha soldiers but excluding Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service) personnel at 1 April 1996 and the planned requirement at 1 April 1997 are as follows:

1 April 1996: 108,000.

1 April 1997: 106,200.

Radioactive and Toxic Waste

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list each site in the United Kingdom and overseas territories where his Department has stored or located (a) radioactive or (b) toxic waste since 1966. [2622]

Mr. Soames: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Apache Helicopter Order

Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what benefits have resulted to British industry from the order for 67 Apache attack helicopters. [2480]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The order for Apache attack helicopters will lead to significant benefits for British industry. Work worth some £2 billion will be undertaken in the United Kingdom and it is estimated that over 180 firms will receive contracts. The scope of the project and its high technology nature will provide excellent opportunities for British companies to benefit through the demonstration of their capabilities and cost effectiveness.

Helicopter Flying School

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the defence helicopter flying school. [3032]

Mr. Soames: In my answer of 9 March 1995, Official Report, column 350–51, I outlined our plans, arising from the defence costs study, for the formation of a single, tri-service school with a strong contractorised element to provide those aspects of helicopter basic flying training common to the three services. The school will be established at RAF Shawbury and will commence training on 1 April 1997. I am now pleased to announce that we have awarded a 15-year contract to FBS Ltd. for the operation of the DHFS under contractor-owned, Government-operated arrangements.

FBS is a joint venture, UK company, comprising FR Aviation, Bristow Helicopters and SERCO and was formed specifically to bid for this contract. Collectively, the company has extensive experience of working with the services; Bristow Helicopters and SERCO already provide services to Middle Wallop and RAF Shawbury respectively.

The school will have the capacity to train approximately 230 pilot, navigator and crewmen students a year from our three services as well as a number from overseas. The helicopter fleet will consist of 38 AS350 Squirrel single engine and 9 Bell 412 twin-engine helicopters. Seventy-six military and 45 civilian flying instructors will be employed at the school. FBS will be responsible for the provision and maintenance of the helicopter fleet, all ground-school and support facilities and the provision of the civilian flying instructors.

The DHFS project has been procured in line with the private finance initiative, thus demonstrating the Government's strong resolve to continue to achieve value for money in defence support and to concentrate resources on the front line. The formation of the DHFS, utilising more modern equipment and taking advantage of the efficiencies brought about through contractorisation will provide a value for money, high quality training facility for HM forces well into the future. Compared with the current system of delivering training this represents a saving of some £80 million over 15 years.

Fixed Telecommunications System

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about his Department's proposals for the introduction of a defence fixed telecommunications system. [3033]

Mr. Portillo: Good communications are crucial to the efficient and effective operation of the armed forces. The defence fixed telecommunications system—DFTS—will provide, in a single UK-wide network, the telecommunications link and exchanges required by all defence users. It will integrate and rationalise the five existing UK networks, and provide connections to commercial networks and to those of allies. It will also reduce current equipment and manpower costs while achieving important operational benefits.

The invitation to tender invited bidders to consider solutions based on the principles of the Government's private finance initiative to enable the MOD to transfer to the private sector the ownership, operation and maintenance of the network and thus relieve the MOD of the economic risks associated with changing technology and patterns of usage. The contractor will therefore assume responsibility for providing services at the required levels of performance. Two consortia submitted best and final offers.

I am now able to announce that, subject to the satisfactory conclusion of contractual negotiations, I have approved the implementation and commercial management of DFTS services, under a 10-year contract with the INCA consortium, led by British Telecommunications plc, in conjunction with Lockheed Martin, OASIS and GEC-Marconi.

Under the PFI arrangements, INCA will make maximum use of the infrastructure serving other customers. The contract will be worth in the region of £700 million, which makes it the MOD's biggest PFI deal so far. Taut contractual arrangements will be negotiated to provide incentives for INCA to meet required levels of performance. We estimate that this will result in savings to the MOD well in excess of £100 million.

The implementation of the DFTS will entail placing under commercial management the work currently undertaken by staff in some 1,200 military and civilian posts at about 100 defence establishments throughout the UK. Detailed arrangements for this will be agreed during contracts negotiations.

Meteorological Office

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what levels of accuracy have been achieved by the meteorological office over each of the last 10 years; [2586]

(2) what was the income from the marinecall weather line in the most recent period for which was figures are available. [2587]

Mr. Arbuthnot: These are matters for the chief executive of the Meteorological Office. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. C. R. Hunt to Mr. Barry Field, dated 6 November 1996:

I am replying to your Questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about the Meteorological office's income from out Marinecall service and our overall forecast accuracy over each of the last ten years, as these matters fall within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Meteorological Office.

The income to the Meteorological Office form the Marinecall telephone weather line in the twelve month period to September 1996 was some £239,000.

Turning to forecast accuracy we only have strictly comparable figures, expressed as a composite index of forecast performance (the most useful measure), for each of the last nine years. The data are set out below. You will note that there has been marked progress in the quality of your forecasts.

1987–88: 87.48

1988–89: 92.10

1989–90: 98.56

1990–91: 98.94

1991–92: 100.95

1992–93: 105.43

1993–94: 110.48

1994–95: 114.18

1995–96: 120.88

I hope this gives you the information you need.

Advances of Pay (House Purchase)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many members of the (a) Army (b) Royal Air Force and (c) Royal Navy had applied for an interest-free advance of pay for house purchase as at 1 October; [1465]

(2) what annual budget has been set aside for his Department's interest-free advance of pay for house purchase scheme, and if he will make a statement. [1466]

Mr. Soames: The long service advance of pay scheme—LSAP—provides an interest-free advance of pay up to a maximum of £8,500 to assist personnel with house purchase. The advance is repaid over 10 years or a lesser period if personnel have less that 10 years to serve. The LSAP scheme has been available in the Navy since 1963, but on 1 August 1996 it was extended on a limited basis to the other two services primarily as a result of the demise of the married quarter discount sales scheme. The number of Army and RAF personnel who applied for an advance between 1 August 96 and 1 October 96 was as follows:

Army: 335

RAF: 224.

It is not known how many personnel in the RN have applied for an LSAP since 1963. However, there were 9,321 loans outstanding on 1 October 1996.

The scheme in the Royal Navy is cost neutral with repayments broadly matching advances. A total of £6 million per annum has been earmarked to fund the scheme over the early years in the Army and Royal Air Force. However, the net outlay will reduce as repayments increase and the scheme in these two services is expected to be cost neutral after 10 years' operation.

ENVIRONMENT

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the county councils' legal responsibilities and duties under the relevant legislation during the transition of services to unitary authorities. [1088]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Government expect the local authorities involved in local government reorganisation to use their best endeavours to ensure a smooth transition of responsibilities to the unitary authorities. Most regulations are intended to facilitate this, for example by carrying over the powers, rights or liabilities of one authority to its successor.

However, there are also specific legal responsibilities and duties placed on councils during the transition. Those which apply to county councils are listed; they are made using powers either in the Local Government Act 1992 or the Superannuation Act 1972.

The Local Government (Compensation for Redundancy) Regulations 1994 (SI 1994/3025) set out the level of compensation which shall be paid to an employee between the ages of 18 and 50 who is made redundant during the period between the making of an order for a structural change and 18 months after the reorganisation takes place. The regulations also contain requirements regarding the notification of and payment of compensation.

The Local Government Changes for England (Property Transfer and Transitional Payments) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995/402) require that authorities affected by reorganisation use their best endeavours to make agreements for the transfer of property, rights and liabilities, and the provision by county councils of information to facilitate such agreements.

The Local Government Changes for England (Miscellaneous Provision) Regulations 1995 (SI 1996/1748) require all the local authorities involved in a structural change and their officers to co–operate with each other so as to facilitate the reorganisation. The county council must also supply a successor authority with all information which it may reasonably request for the purpose of reorganisation.

Those regulations also provide that from the time of the elections to the successor authority which are provided for in the structural change order until the reorganisation, any requirements for the county council to prepare budgets or plans or consult any person shall pass to the successor authorities. This applies to the county council's functions in the areas of the future unitary authorities.

The Local Government Reorganisation (Compensation for Loss of Remuneration) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995/2837) require a local government employer to pay compensation for loss of remuneration—detriment—in certain circumstances related to reorganisation.

Charter of Local Self-Government

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government will sign the Council of Europe's charter of local self-government. [1950]

Sir Paul Beresford: As stated in the White Paper, "Government Response to the Report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Relations Between Central and Local Government 'Rebuilding Trust'", which was laid before the House on 4 November, the Government do not believe that a case has been made out demonstrating the need for the United Kingdom now to adopt this charter.

Permaculture

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's definition of permaculture; and if he will make a statement. [1594]

Sir Paul Beresford: There is no statutory definition of permaculture.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the Permaculture Association (UK); and if he will make a statement. [1595]

Sir Paul Beresford: No correspondence has been received from an organisation of this name. However, representations have been made by the Permaculture Association (Britain) on the draft revision to planning policy guidance note 7, "The Countryside—Environmental Quality and Economic Development". We have received more than 400 responses to this consultation document. These are being considered carefully at present.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage permaculture within national parks; and if he will make a statement. [2353]

Mr. Clappison: The Government are committed to the concept of sustainable development in their rural planning policies. One of the key principles is to encourage environmentally-friendly economic activity while conserving the character of the countryside. It is for the national park authorities, as the local planning authorities for their areas, to determine issues of land use planning and to consider individual planning applications in the light of their wider responsibilities.

Financial Derivatives

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidelines are issued to local authorities about the use of financial derivatives. [1681]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department has not issued guidelines to local authorities about the use of financial derivatives. Local authorities are under a general fiduciary duty to their taxpayers to act prudently in investing funds. They should also have regard to the capital finance regulations and professional treasury management codes, as appropriate. Capital finance and approved investment regulations provide a strong incentive for authorities to make only very secure investments such as bank and building society deposits or gilts.

Timber

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to promote the greater use of timber in the construction industry; and if he will make a statement. [1759]

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend, the Minister for Construction and Planning launched Timber 2005 in February this year. This is a research and innovation strategy to promote the use of timber in construction. The Department of the Environment is now working with industry during its implementation. I am arranging to place a copy of the strategy in the House Library.

Under-Secretary of State (Committees)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the Cabinet committees and sub-committees on which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford), serves. [1989]

Sir Paul Beresford: I currently serve on one Cabinet sub-committee, EDL(L)—the ministerial sub-committee on London.

Construction Contracts

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will seek to amend section 108 of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 to provide that there is an obligation on all parties to submit to an adjudicator's decision; and if he will make a statement; [2193]

(2) if he will monitor the operation of section 110 of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 in respect of set-off procedures; and if he will make a statement; [2197]

(3) if he will monitor the operation of section 108 of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 in respect of procedures subsequent to the adjudicator's decision; and if he will make a statement. [2195]

(4) what plans he has to monitor the operation of part II of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 in respect of (a) off-site fabrications, (b) design by (i) contactors and (ii) specialist contractors and (c) process work, with particular reference to privatised utilities; and if he will make a statement; [2191]

(5) if he will bring forward proposals to amend the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 in order to provide for trust funds to protect contractors and sub-contractors against the insolvency of parties higher in the contractual chain; and if he will make a statement; [2194]

(6) what plans he has to monitor the operation of part II of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 in respect of maintenance and repair work; and if he will make a statement; [2190]

(7) if he will monitor the operation of section 113 of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 as regards the application of the provisions of the scheme for construction contracts; and if he will make a statement; [2196]

(8) if he will monitor the operation of section 108 of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 in respect of adjudication and the application of the Arbitration Act 1996; and if he will make a statement. [2192]

Mr. Clappison: The fair construction contract provisions in part II of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 have not yet commenced. The Government have no plans to amend legislation which received careful consideration during its passage through Parliament last Session. A means of monitoring the effect of the new legislation was outlined in the cost compliance assessment which was published in February 1996. A copy was placed in the Library.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) in which parliamentary constituencies there are opencasting sites in operation; [2216]

(2) in how many parliamentary constituencies there are opencasting sites in operation. [2249]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many acres of land are currently the subject of opencast methods of extracting coal; and what proportion of this land was formerly green belt; [2210]

(2) how many acres of land are currently subject to planning applications for opencast coal extraction; and what proportion of this land is currently green belt. [2209]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not held centrally. Statistics are published annually for the County Planning Officers' Society by Durham county council.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has made of the cost to public funds (a) of local authorities and (b) of his Department of planning applications for opencast mining. [2214]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department has no information about the costs to local authorities of processing planning applications for opencast coal mining; costs to the Department would occur only in the event of a planning application being called in for determination by the Secretary of State and this is an extremely rare occurrence.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many, and which, parliamentary constituencies have opencast applications (a) pending and (b) at the appeal stage. [2213]

Sir Paul Beresford: Information about opencast planning applications is not held centrally. Information about appeals is recorded only under the local planning authority and not parliamentary constitiuencies. The current outstanding appeals are as follows:

Cheshire 1, Staffordshire 1, Wakefield 1, Nottinghamshire 1, Durham 3 and Derbyshire 1.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals have been heard by his inspectors in which opencast developers have sought to reverse local authority refusals of planning permission in each of the last five years; and what is his Department's estimate of the cost to public funds of these appeals. [2215]

Sir Paul Beresford: The figures are as follows: 1992, 11; 1993, 12; 1994, 20; 1995, 4; and 1996, 9. Information concerning the cost of these appeals to the taxpayer is not available.

Hereford and Worcester SSA

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total standard spending assessment for Hereford and Worcester county council, in both cash and real terms, for each year since 1990–91, after allowing for changes in statutory responsibilities and boundaries. [2187]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested on Hereford and Worcester's standard spending assessment in cash and real terms is as follows. The adjusted figures are comparable with the year immediately following and take into account changes in function and geographical responsibilities. The figures in real terms have been rebased using the gross domestic product deflator for 1995–96.

£ million

	SSA in cash terms	SSA in real terms
1990–91	317.834	377.959
1991–92	374.058	418.040
1992–93	397.044	425.812
1992–93 adjusted	363.391	389.720
1993–94	372.565	388.404
1993–94 adjusted	379.948	396.101
1994–95	388.036	397.423
1994–95 adjusted	359.668	368.369
1995–96	364.554	364.554
1995–96 adjusted	372.168	372.168
1996–97	384.187	375.733

Information on standard spending assessments from 1990–91 onwards in cash and real terms for all local authorities has already been placed in the Library.

Young Homeless

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's estimate of the number of young people who were homeless in 1995. [2038]

Mr. Clappison: Local authorities in England accepted responsibility to secure accommodation for 3,620 homeless households in priority need with a vulnerable young person, and 1,700 young single people not in priority need, under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 Housing Act in 1995.

Policy Initiatives

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the results of his policy initiatives (a) freedom of the cities and (b) initiative and trust councils. [2011]

Sir Paul Beresford: We have no plans for a freedom of the cities initiative or for a trust councils initiative.

Rural Development

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research he has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned of low-impact development in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [2342]

Sir Paul Beresford: No such research has been commissioned or evaluated. The draft revised planning policy guidance note 7, "The Countryside—Environmental Quality and Economic Development" aims to integrate the development necessary to sustain the rural economy with protection of the countryside.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions since 1973 nuclear safety inspectors from Euratom have visited United Kingdom nuclear plants to conduct an environmental audit, pursuant to the provisions of the health and safety article 35 of the Euratom treaty; and if he will place in the Library copies of all environmental reports forwarded by nuclear plant operators to the European Commission under articles 36 and 37 of the Euratom treaty. [2117]

Mr. Clappison: Experts appointed by the European Commission have visited the United Kingdom on two occasions to verify the operation and efficiency of facilities for the monitoring of environmental radioactivity, in accordance with article 35 of the Euratom treaty. Following both visits, to the north of Scotland in May 1993 and to Cumbria in December 1993, the Commission concluded that the relevant monitoring facilities were operated in an efficient and satisfactory manner.

Information supplied under article 36, on the levels of radioactivity to which the United Kingdom public is exposed, is published periodically in a Commission document entitled, "Environmental Radioactivity in the European Community". I have arranged to place the last two issues of this document, covering the years 1984 to 1990, in the Library. The next edition, covering 1991, is due to be published shortly and I shall place it in the Library once it is available.

Submissions under article 37 Euratom are regarded as private communications of technical data between the Government and the Commission and are not normally in the public domain. However, I shall seek the agreement of the Commission and the current owners of the facilities concerned to placing in the Library copies of the submissions of data relating to decommissioning of Windscale advanced gas-cooled reactor 1995, Sizewell B 1992, THORP 1991, Windscale waste vitrification plant and vitrified product store 1989, Torness 1986 and Heysham B 1986.

Darwin Initiative

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the species included in the Darwin initiative and those currently under consideration for inclusion. [2566]

Mr. Clappison: The main aim of the Darwin initiative is to fund United Kingdom biodiversity institutions in collaborative projects with countries rich in biodiversity but lacking sufficient financial resources or capacity. The projects are varied and it is not possible to list all the species covered. There are projects which concentrate on the taxonomy of one particular species. Others study the options for sustainable use of several species. There are also projects carrying out inventories of all the species in a specific area such as a nature reserve. So far the range of species has been wide, from parasitic wasps to seahorses and from rare ferns to fungi.

We have recently called for applications for fifth round of funding to start from April 1997. We will consider all proposals which fit the principles of the initiative and which are received by 29 November 1996. I have sent my hon. Friend our Darwin information package.

Local Elections

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what mechanism he is proposing for aligning parish council and local council election dates. [2592]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Local Government and Rating Bill proposes amendments to the Local Government Act 1992 which will enable the Secretary of State by order to alter permanently the cycle of parish council elections where there is, or is to be, a unitary county council.

Coalfield Areas (Regeneration)

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his proposals for the regeneration of areas affected by coalfield closures; and if he will make a statement. [2924]

Mr. Gummer: British Coal non-operational properties will be transferred to English Partnerships which will take forward their regeneration, reclamation and development. English Partnerships has prepared a detailed investment plan, including a development strategy for each site. The aim is to achieve area regeneration, environmental improvements and secure new employment opportunities in the coal closure areas. Receipts from sales will be used to fund the costs of reclaiming and servicing other sites in the portfolio. A total of 2,250 acres of land will be reclaimed for residential, commercial and retail uses and a further 2,750 acres will be developed for forestry, leisure and agricultural purposes. About 55,000 jobs will be created and £850 million of private sector investment attracted.

A managed disposal strategy will ensure that the market is not flooded with development land. In this way considerable benefits will accrue to the coalfields communities in the next 10 years.

This is a challenging programme for English Partnerships but it has already shown itself capable of the challenge. The agency has quickly established itself as a key player in economic and physical regeneration throughout England with its activity carefully directed to achieve the maximum impact in areas of greatest need. I am convinced that the benefits for the coalfields communities will be considerable and that this new agreement ensures the best possible future for the coalfield sites in the north of England.

Regeneration will start immediately on a number of the sites including Agecroft in the north-west, Dawdon in the north-east, Glasshoughton in Yorkshire and the Humber and Manton Wood in the east midlands.

English Partnerships will receive £12.5 million from British Coal in a detailed agreement which has, as a key requirement, a balanced package where the cost of meeting enforceable liabilities and reclaiming sites to a minimum standard is offset by the positive value within the portfolio. The arrangements provide for an appropriate allocation of liabilities and risks between English Partnerships and British Coal.

I am today laying details of the sites being transferred in the House and copies will also be available in the Library.

City Pride Initiative

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to extend the city pride initiative. [2925]

Mr. Gummer: I am today announcing a challenge to seven new areas to join the successful city pride initiative. The seven areas are:

Bristol;

Leeds;

Liverpool, Birkenhead, Wallasey and Bootle;

Newcastle upon Tyne;

Nottingham, Ashfield, Broxtowe, Gedling and Rushcliffe;

Plymouth;

Sheffield.

City pride has already forged partnerships in Birmingham, London and Manchester in an unprecedented way. Local people have come together with a vision for their areas and have agreed the practical steps for achieving that vision. City pride has already produced considerable benefits in terms of a shared understanding between public and private sector partners about the opportunities, priorities and needs of their areas. I want to challenge other great industrial or port cities of regional importance to match this achievement.

I am writing today to the civic leaders in these seven areas to invite them to come forward with city pride proposals. I want them to develop a vision for their areas and set out the steps needed to achieve it.

Each of the seven areas is served by a Government sponsor Minister, whose responsibilities include encouraging regeneration initiatives in their area and providing a link with Whitehall Departments. I know that sponsor Minister colleagues will be working closely with the civic leaders of their areas to make city pride a success. Part of their task will be to encourage central Government programmes to work effectively alongside the local vision.

Before working up a full prospectus, city pride areas will need to satisfy four conditions. First, city pride partnerships must show that they have the capacity to deliver what they promise to local people, including a clear understanding of what each partner is prepared to contribute. Secondly, there must be a clear vision and planned targets, with an emphasis on achieving results and effective arrangements for tracking progress. Thirdly, the geographical area and population which city pride is intended to cover should be defined and be appropriate to the vision. Fourthly, there must be arrangements for involving and accounting to local people in achieving city pride goals.

I am not ruling out other areas coming forward with city pride proposals, but putting together a successful city pride prospectus and making it work requires a good deal of concentrated effort on the part of areas themselves and by Government offices for the regions and we therefore need to limit numbers. There is, of course, nothing to stop other areas from applying city pride principles, and, indeed, some are already doing so.

Contracted-out Services

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the impact on local authority contracted-out services of the restrictions placed by Customs and Excise on the ability of bodies to recover VAT retrospectively; what is the estimated cost to local authorities and if he will make a statement. [2620]

Sir Paul Beresford: No assessment has been made of the estimated cost to local authorities of this proposed change. If approved, the changes limiting the repayment of VAT to three years will apply equally to both the public and private sector. Local authorities should have proper accounting arrangements to recover VAT, whether contracted out to the private sector or performed in-house.

Business Rate Relief

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to make independent petrol retailers eligible for business rate relief. [2635]

Sir Paul Beresford: Independent petrol retailers in rural villages will be eligible for discretionary rate relief under the measures introduced in the Local Government and Rating Bill.

Council Tax (Students)

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to assist full-time students who are jointly liable for the council tax because they share accommodation with non-students. [2766]

Mr. Curry: At present when a student shares accommodation with a recipient of council tax benefit their joint liability for council tax is higher than if each lived separately. We propose to end this anomaly by amending the council tax liability rules to exclude students from joint and several liability as soon as we have an opportunity to amend primary legislation.

As an interim measure my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Social Security, has submitted a proposal today to the Social Security advisory committee to amend the council tax benefit rules, with effect from 1 April 1997, so that where a full-time student is jointly liable with a benefit recipient their presence in the household will be ignored in the calculation of council tax benefit. This will have a similar effect to the longer-term solution.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Improvement Works

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the current works of improvement and refurbishment being undertaken on the English Heritage estate in the south of England. [2593]

Mr. Sproat: A total of £9.2 million was spent in 1995–96 on works to the 181 English Heritage properties in the south of England—£3.5 million on day to day maintenance of properties and £5.7 million on conservation and visitor improvements works. My hon.

Friend may wish to contact Jane Sharman, English Heritage's acting chief executive, if he requires further information.

National Lottery (Sheffield)

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many grants have been awarded by the National Lotteries Charities Board in (a) Sheffield and (b) the Hallam constituency; and if she will make a statement. [2391]

Mr. Sproat: The National Lottery Charities Board has made 58 grants to charities and voluntary organisations based in Sheffield, of which six are based in Hallam.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by her Department. [2602]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The Department of National Heritage is in the process of liaising with the suppliers of the information technology software and systems that it uses to gauge the level of work required to deal with the millennium date change.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Burma

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the discussions regarding Burma at the recent EU Foreign Ministers meeting in Luxembourg. [2485]

Mr. Hanley: At the recent General Affairs Council in Luxembourg, Ministers adopted an EU common position on Burma which imposes the following measures on the ruling State Law and Order Restoration Council—SLORC:

> ban on entry visas for senior members of the SLORC and their families;
>
> ban on entry visas for senior members of the military or the security forces who formulate, implement or benefit from policies that impede Burma's transition to democracy, and their families;
> suspension of high-level bilateral governmental visits to Burma (Ministers and officials at level of political director and above).

Peru

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the bilateral talks in Lima between Her Majesty's Government and Peru on debt. [2424]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Following negotiations in Lima last month between officials of the Export Credits Guarantee Department and the Government of Peru, the United Kingdom-Peru agreement No. 5 (1996), covering approximately £120 million of debt owed by Peru to ECGD, was signed on 4 November 1996. This agreement follows on from the July agreement of the Paris Club of Government creditors to reschedule £6.3 billion of Peru's official bilateral debts over 20 years. Her Majesty's Government wrote off the Overseas Development Administration's outstanding aid loans to Peru, worth some £5 million, in 1995.

Mr. Clive Russell

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ensure that (a) public interest immunity certificates and (b) the Official Secrets Act are not used in the case of Mr. Clive Russell and supplies to Argentina. [275]

Mr. Rifkind [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Neither the law relating to public interest immunity nor the Official Secrets Acts provides any impediment to the proper investigation of alleged criminal offences. Mr. Russell or any other person having evidence that goods or services have been unlawfully supplied to Argentina should make that evidence available to the appropriate investigating authority, which is HM Customs and Excise.

TRANSPORT

Tunnel and Bridge Tolls

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the European Commission in respect of charging VAT on tunnel and bridge tolls; and what responses he has made. [2443]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Speed Limits

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for 10 mph speed limits in residential areas. [2393]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the (i) lives saved and (ii) injuries reduced where 20 mph speed limits have been introduced. [2394]

Mr. Bowis: The Department commissioned the Transport Research Laboratory to conduct research into the effectiveness of 20 mph zones. TRL published its report—TRL report No. 215—on 12 September 1996. The report shows that in the zones accident frequency fell by 60 per cent., pedestrian casualties fell by 61 per cent. and child pedestrian and child cyclist casualties fell by 67 per cent.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) speed cameras and (b) live speed cameras his Department plans to install in the next six months. [2060]

Mr. Bowis: Decisions on when and where speed enforcement camera equipment is installed are for local highway authorities to take, the Highways Agency for motorways and trunk roads and local authorities for other roads.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to introduce legislation requiring new vehicles to be fitted with on–board variable speed limiters; and if he will make a statement. [2056]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the principal elements of the "kill your speed" campaign over the next 24 months; and if he will make a statement; [2062]

(2) what plans his Department has to introduce measures to reduce the number of road crashes; and if he will make a statement. [2055]

Mr. Bowis: The Government regards the "kill your speed" campaign as a long-term commitment. Changing public attitudes to driving at inappropriate speeds is essential if the numbers of people killed and injured in road traffic accidents is to continue to decline.

In November 1992, the Government published a policy document, "Killing speed and saving lives", which sets out the main elements of the strategy. The more recent "Child pedestrian safety strategy", published in August this year, reaffirms the priority given to reducing urban speed. Copies of both these publications are available in the library.

Detailed plans for the next two years are under discussion.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the number of road crashes resulting in death or serious injury which involved a vehicle which was exceeding the speed limit in the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [2058]

Mr. Bowis: During the 10 years 1986 to 1995 there were 513,636 road accidents in Great Britain involving death or serious injury. A total of 604,079 people were killed or seriously injured in these accidents. It is not known how many of the accidents involved a vehicle exceeding the speed limit. However, research by the Transport Research Laboratory and in the United States has indicated that around a third of road accident casualties resulted from accidents in which a vehicle was travelling with excessive speed. Some two thirds of such accidents occurred in roads with a 30 mph speed limit.

Commission of Irish Lights

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the reduction in the United Kingdom's contribution to the Commission of Irish Lights following the court's decision on electronic aids. [2558]

Mr. Bowis: No savings to the general lighthouse fund are expected. The Irish Government are proposing the necessary legislative changes to enable the Commissioners of Irish Lights to continue with the provision of marine radio navigation aids.

Unexploded Bombs

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what liaison he has had with the Ministry of Defence over the monitoring of explosives and noxious substances from the second world war in the territorial waters of the United Kingdom. [2598]

Mr. Bowis: My Department liaises with the Ministry of Defence as the need arises. Monitoring is undertaken specifically in relation to the remains of SS Richard Montgomery, where periodic surveys on our behalf are overseen by the Royal Navy's chief salvage officer.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications of the recent judgment in the High Court in the case brought by Maurice and Audrey Balchin for planning blight compensation policy in connection with the channel tunnel rail link; and if he will make a statement. [2290]

Mr. Watts: The judgment has no implications for the channel tunnel rail link. Union Railways Ltd. operates a discretionary purchase scheme and considers all applications in full.

Road Accidents

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) pedestrians and (b) passengers have been (i) injured and (ii) killed in accidents involving vehicles in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [2054]

Mr. Bowis: The number of casualties in road accidents is shown in the table.

	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995
Pedestrians
Injured	52,496	50,240	46,857	47,529	45,991
Killed	1,496	1,347	1,241	1,124	1,038
Passengers
Injured	84,521	85,820	85,422	87,632	86,368
Killed	937	864	766	746	757

Bull Bars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to introduce legislation to ban bull bars on vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [2057]

Mr. Bowis: Earlier this year, the European Commission proposed an amendment to the External Projections Directive, 74/483/EEC, which would control the fitting of aggressive bull bars. My Department was involved in the preparation of this draft amendment which, it is hoped, will be incorporated into the directive early next year.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the numbers of (a) pedestrians and (b) passengers who have been (i) injured and (ii) killed as a direct result of a vehicle being fitted with bull bars in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [2052]

Mr. Bowis: The Department commissioned the Transport Research Laboratory to carry out a study of data from accidents involving bull bars and to make an objective assessment of the real risks which they pose to vulnerable road users. TRL has now completed the work and expects to publish its conclusions shortly.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages or disadvantages of such a repeal. [2469]

Mr. Bowis: Subject to satisfactory completion of the consultation process, my Department is currently proposing to repeal or amend the following regulations by the end of 1996:

Number of regulations	Type of regulations
2	Motor Vehicle (Type Approval or Authorisation) Regulations
4	Vehicle Inspectorate Safety Codes of Practice
1	Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations
17	Merchant Shipping (Passenger Ship Construction) Regulations
7	Merchant Shipping (Cargo Ship) Regulations
13	Merchant Shipping (Fire Protection & Appliances) Regulations
5	Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances)
9	Merchant Shipping (Control of Pollution by Noxious Liquid Substances)
15	Merchant Shipping (Loadline) Regulations
11	Other miscellaneous regulations

Since the effect in each case will be to reduce rather than increase compliance costs, a CCA is not required. Departments do, however, seek to estimate approximate savings wherever possible. The cost of undertaking a CCA varies from case to case, but is generally modest. Because part of the cost falls to the business consulted, a full CCA would be inappropriate for measures designed to reduce business burdens.

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the expected date of completion of the National Air Traffic Services review of the two-centre strategy. [2687]

Mr. Bowis: The CAA advises that recommendations stemming from the review will be considered by its board in December with a view to decisions being made very early in the new year.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Questions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Lord President of the Council what guidelines his Department issues to Government Departments and agencies in respect of procedures to be followed after a parliamentary answer is found to be incorrect. [44]

Mr. Newton: No formal guidance is issued by my Department. Government Departments do, however, follow precedents for correcting mistakes made in answering parliamentary questions, including the use of "pursuant" answers. It is for individual Departments to determine how they handle a particular parliamentary question. The advice of the Table Office would be sought on the use of a "pursuant" question.

TREASURY

Government Expenditure and Revenues

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what analysis of Government expenditure and revenues has been undertaken in respect of the other regions and countries of the UK equivalent to that undertaken in respect of Scotland. [1535]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 31 October 1996]: "Government Expenditure and Revenue—Wales 1993–94" was published by the Welsh Office in January 1996. There are no equivalent figures published for Northern Ireland. The Government Office for London will publish a consultation paper this month on a methodology for estimating the balance between public income and expenditure in London. A breakdown of expenditure for regions and counties in the UK, was published in section 7 of the "Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses 1996–97", Cm 3201.

Transport Fuel Duty

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received during the past 12 months on the level of fuel duty rebate on fuel used for public transport; and if he will make a statement. [1749]

Mr. Oppenheim: I have received a number of representations on this topic from the Confederation of Passenger Transport and various bus companies. It would be inappropriate for me to comment further in the run up to the Budget.

Financial Derivatives

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidelines are issued to Government Departments and agencies about the use of financial derivatives. [1682]

Mrs. Angela Knight: No general guidance is issued to Departments on the use of financial derivatives, except in the area of foreign exchange—in relation to which paragraphs 28.7.5 and 28.7.6 of the "Government Accounting" manual tell Departments that, before starting to use currency forwards, futures and options, they should obtain sufficient expertise and that they must avoid speculation. More generally, accounting officers are required to ensure that public funds are properly and well managed, avoid waste and extravagance and ensure that resources are used efficiently and effectively. Departments are not permitted to invest Exchequer money outside the public sector.

Betting Revenue

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each financial year since 1992–93, and to the latest available date in 1996, the revenue accruing to the Treasury from off-course betting on (a) horse racing and (b) greyhound racing. [2236]

Mr. Oppenheim: A breakdown of receipts between horse racing, greyhound racing and any other betting subject to general betting duty is not available. Total receipts from off-course betting duty are as follows:

	£ million
1992–93	474
1993–94	495
1994–95	509
1995–96	489
April–September 1996	244

Building Societies

Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what meetings he (a) has held and (b) proposes to hold with organisations of, or representing, disabled people to discuss the impact of building societies converting to banks and issuing bonus shares to members. [2307]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Treasury Ministers have received no requests for meetings from such groups.

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will announce the outcome of the consultation on the draft Building Societies Bill. [3219]

Mrs. Knight: Following the publication of the draft Building Societies Bill in March, the Government received responses from societies, from other professionals and from individual customers, all of which helped to highlight the concerns of those involved with societies. I will publish shortly a final version of the Bill, reflecting the outcome of the consultation.

The draft Bill contains three major changes to the existing legislation. It replaces the current prescriptive regime for societies with a modern, permissive framework, which—subject to a few necessary exceptions—allows societies and their members to decide what businesses to engage in. It updates the arrangements for prudential supervision by the Building Societies Commission, and it modernises and enhances societies' accountability to their members. The draft Bill received a general welcome from societies and other respondents.

A number of the comments received were technical, and have helped to produce a better Bill. I am grateful for the work which respondents put into formulating their comments, which demonstrates the value of consulting on draft legislation.

Some attractive ideas have been suggested which will be included in the new Bill. The principal changes are as follows:

Protection against takeover from converted societies

The 1986 Act provides that for five years after a society converts to a plc, no one may hold over 15 per cent. of its shares. This may be waived by the Bank of England, in certain circumstances. Some respondents asked us to remove this protection; others to keep it.

The draft Bill will provide for the protection to lapse if, during the five years, the converted society takes over another financial institution, or if its shareholders vote to waive it. If enacted, this change would apply to any converted society still within its five year period.

Deposit accounts

The draft published in March proposed that every individual who saved with a society should be a member. There would be some exceptions, for example current account holders. The previous draft would have required societies to freeze individuals' deposit accounts operating at the time of enactment. Individuals would not have been able to put new money in those accounts. I have decided to change these provisions so that further money can be put in existing deposit accounts, provided the account holder is given the choice of keeping that account or transferring to a share account with comparable terms. All new savings accounts will still have to be membership accounts.

The new draft Bill will also provide that after a society has announced its intention to put a takeover or conversion proposal to its members, it may offer deposit accounts.

Special general meetings

The draft published in March proposed a statutory right for members to requisition a special general meeting. This right has existed in societies' rules for some time. In transposing this into law, the draft would have preserved societies' ability to set thresholds for share holdings, borrowing and length of membership for those who can exercise this right. The new draft Bill retains these provisions, and furthermore will not put a society under a statutory obligation to hold a meeting within the three months before and one month after the annual general meeting. A duly requisitioned SGM would still have to be held at another time. A society could arrange to hold the SGM and AGM on the same day if it wished.

Access to the register of members

The new Bill will restrict the existing statutory right to apply to the Building Societies Commission for access to a society's register. This right will generally be restricted to members of at least two years' standing, and with a share holding balance or mortgage debt, of at least £100. A fee of £25 will be payable to the BSC with each application, and successful applicants will be required to respect the confidentiality of names and addresses taken from the register.

Priority Liquidation Distribution Right

The 1986 Act creates a residual priority liquidation distribution right for former members of a converted society. This comes into play should a converted institution subsequently fail, and relates to share accounts held at the time of the conversion. Each person's entitlement is initially equal to a percentage of his share holding at the time of conversion, but it runs down as withdrawals are made, with no increase from subsequent deposits. Because of this provision, converted societies often have to raise extra capital, and face additional costs and administrative burdens.

As societies proposing a change of status now offer substantial benefits to eligible members on conversion—effectively capitalising the reserves at that time—this additional protection seems unnecessary. And the cost of providing for it disadvantages new shareholders and customers. So the new draft Bill will remove this burden. If enacted, the repeal of this provision would apply to all societies whose business is transferred to a successor company after today's date, provided that the members had been warned in the relevant transfer statement of the possible abolition of the right.

Mergers, conversions and takeovers

The new draft Bill will include proposals modifying the procedures for conversion and takeover, while keeping necessary protection for members. It will allow societies to send members a short version of the transfer statement, provided the full version is available to members who request it,

The 1986 Act arrangements for takeovers or mergers are cumbersome for a society in serious difficulty. All mergers and takeovers require a vote of the members of a society being absorbed. Invoking such a procedure during a rescue would be impractical. Although such circumstances may arise only very infrequently, the new draft Bill will give the BSC the power to direct a society in extremis to seek a merger or takeover, and to allow a merger or takeover to proceed by board resolution only, so that an ailing society's business can be taken over by another society or a bank, without the disruption that a full public proposal would cause.

Deposit and Investor Protection

Finally, the draft Bill will contain an enabling power to merge, at a point in the future, the banks' deposit and societies' investor protection schemes. This is solely a contingency provision, should it ever become necessary at some point in the future.

Child Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the (a) women who are mothers and (b) men who are fathers who are employed by his Department have received assistance from the Department with child care. [1282]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Although the civil service collects statistical information on staff employed in Government Departments and executive agencies, we do not collect information on the parental status of individual staff. It would be intrusive on people's personal affairs for us to request this information from staff and difficult to justify the collection of such data.

The Treasury offers staff subsidised places on the Westminster holiday play scheme. So far this year, Treasury staff have used a total of 73 places. We also make contributions to additional child care costs where staff are required to work additional or irregular hours, and we offer paid special leave to staff to enable them to care for sick close relatives and children.

Female Staff

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women are currently employed by his Department; and what proportion this is of the total. [1249]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 4 November 1996]: As at 31 October 1996 the Treasury employed 461 women, which was 43 per cent. of total staff.

Leasehold Properties

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what recent representations he has received from (a) the House Builders Federation, (b) the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, (c) individual property owners and (d) others about the implications for housebuilders and other long leaseholders selling properties of the case of LM Tenancies Plcv IRC; and if he will make a statement; [1483]

(2) what guidance he plans to issue to stamp offices to clarify ambiguities arising from the stamp duty liabilities incurred on the sale of leasehold properties; [1484]

(3) on how many recent occasions the stamp duty liability calculated on the sale of a leasehold property has actually exceeded the sale price of the leasehold property concerned; [1485]

(4) if he will make a statement setting out the formulae used for the calculation of the stamp duty liability on the sale of leasehold property; [1486]

(5) if he will receive a delegation from the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance and the House Builders Federation to discuss the implications of the case LM Tenancies plc v. IRC. [1487]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Stamp duty is charged on the grant of a new lease of property by reference to the premium paid for the lease and the average annual rent. Duty on the premium is charged at 1 per cent. but there is no charge on the premium where the premium is £60,000 or less and the average annual rent is £600 or less. Duty is charged on the average annual rent by reference to a sliding scale of rates which depend on the length of the lease. For example, for a lease of over 100 years, the rate of 24 per cent. (£12 per £50 or part of £50 of the average annual rent).

Where an existing lease is sold by the leaseholder to someone else, duty is charged at 1 per cent. on the price paid, in the same way as with the sale of a freehold. No duty is charged on the rent.

I have received representations from the House Builders Federation, the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, and McCarthy and Stone about the treatment of a grant of a new lease under which the rent is to be adjusted in future in line with changes in the retail prices index.

Where the terms of a lease lay down specific figures for future rent payments, or provide for the rent to be increased by a fixed percentage each year, there is no difficulty in calculating what the average annual rent is for the purpose of the stamp duty charge. The calculation is more difficult where the rent is to depend on the future movement of an index such as the RPI. Decisions of the courts, including the recent case LM Tenancies plc. v Inland Revenue Commissioners, have given some guidance on the calculation of the charge to duty where there is an element which is not ascertainable at the outset.

The Inland Revenue has reviewed its practice on the stamp duty treatment of leases of this type, in the light of the representations which have been made. It accepts that in some cases the calculations which have been made by Stamp Offices produce a figure which is too high.

In the LM tenancies case, the premium paid for a lease was to be calculated by reference to the market price of a Treasury loan stock 25 days after the execution of the lease. The Court decided that duty should be calculated by reference to the value of the stock at the date of execution of the lease.

The Inland Revenue's view, in the light of the court's decision in the LM Tenancies case, is that where the rent under a lease is to be adjusted by reference to changes in the retail prices index, the duty should be calculated by reference to the change in the RPI in the year ending with the date of execution of the lease. The precise method of adjustment may depend on the terms of the lease and on the way they provide for the calculation to be made—for example, whether the rent is to be increased annually or only at longer intervals. Generally, where the adjustment is to be made by comparing the value of the RPI at different dates, the difference between the two values over the latest year will be used to measure the rent increase for stamp duty purposes. For example, if the initial rent is £300 a year and is to be adjusted annually, and the RPI has gone up from 150 to 153 (equivalent to 2 per cent.) over the relevant 12 month period, it would be assumed that the rent would go up by £6—2 per cent. of £300—each year. Thus the rent would be taken as £306 in the second year, £312 in the third year, and so on, in order to calculate the average annual rent under the lease.

The Inland Revenue is issuing instructions to stamp Offices accordingly, to ensure that individual cases are dealt with on a consistent basis. A taxpayer who disagrees with the Stamp Office's calculation of the duty in a particular case will of course have the normal rights of appeal.

Whisky

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the percentage increase in revenue from whisky sales since the reduction in the duty in the 1995 Budget; and what conclusions he has drawn from this for future policy on duty levels. [2555]

Mr. Oppenheim: The monthly receipts from excise duty on spirits for 1995 and 1996 January to September are shown in the table. The receipts cover all alcohol products subject to spirit duty, not just whisky.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will announce his decision regarding the rate of spirit duty in his Budget speech on 26 November.

Spirit duty is generally paid on the 29th of the month for goods cleared during the previous 15th to 14th of the month.

1. January 1995 receipts were boosted as a result of the Financial Statement of 8 December 1994 which announced an increase in the rate of duty with effect from 1 January 1995.

2. December 1995 receipts represent goods cleared both before and after the Budget of 28 November 1995.

Economic Criteria

Mr. Renton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which members of the European Union he currently forecasts will meet the Maastricht economic criteria in 1997. [2141]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 4 November 1996]: An assessment of which countries meet the conditions for joining the single currency on 1 January 1999 will be made by the Council of Ministers in early 1998. At present there are considerable uncertainties surrounding this and other issues relating to the single currency.

VAT

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount of VAT refunded to clubs as a result of the recent misdirection by Customs and Excise. [2584]

Mr. Oppenheim: The total amount refunded to non-profit making organisations supplying sporting services is estimated at £150 million VAT plus £30 million interest.

Gold Reserves

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of Britain's gold reserves are held in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the USA (c) western Europe and (d) elsewhere. [2396]

Mrs. Angela Knight: In accordance with best practice, part of the United Kingdom's gold reserves are held at the Bank of England and the remainder in secure facilities abroad. Because the number of appropriate locations is limited, for security reasons we do not disclose the amounts held at different sites.

Manchester Chamber of Commerce and Industry

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent submission he has received from the Manchester chamber of commerce and industry; what reply he will be sending; and if he will make a statement. [1833]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The Manchester Chamber of Commerce wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor on 25 October enclosing their budget submission. In common with all Budget submissions, it will be read carefully, and analysed further as appropriate. The Chancellor will be replying shortly to thank the Manchester chamber of commerce for sending in its proposals, but a full statement would not be appropriate in the run-up to the Budget.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2603]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 5 November 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 17 June 1996, Official Report, column 308.

Aid Budget

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had from the Bishop of Manchester in relation to the aid budget; what reply he is sending; what action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement. [869]

Mr. Waldegrave: The Bishop of Manchester wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor on 24 October regarding the future level of the United Kingdom aid programme. My right hon. Friend Baroness Chalker, the Minister responsible for overseas development, will be responding shortly. Decisions on the overseas aid programme will be announced in the Budget.

Public Pension Liabilities

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the implications for public finances of unfunded future public pension liabilities in the EU. [3156]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Thanks to this Government's policies the United Kingdom's net unfunded public pension liabilities are lower as a proportion of gross domestic product than those of other major EU member states.

Article 104b—the "no bail-out" clause—of the Maastricht treaty makes clear that a member state cannot be liable for another member state's commitments in any area of spending. The treaty therefore ensures that the UK will not have to pay for the liabilities of another member state, regardless of whether or not we join the economic and monetary union.

Rules on excessive deficits, reinforced by the proposed stability pact currently under negotiation, are designed to ensure that member states participating in EMU cannot follow irresponsible fiscal policies which could destabilise the market and affect other participating member states. If a member state needs to address a build-up of liabilities of any kind, it will not be able to fund them through excessive borrowing.

Member states have future liabilities of various kinds, not just of pensions, all of which need to be considered when assessing the future state of the public finances. Furthermore a meaningful assessment should consider assets as well as liabilities. Isolated study of pensions liabilities are therefore not a useful guide to the future financial stability or fiscal policy of any nation state. The convergence criteria of the Maastricht treaty provide a clearly defined basis for forming judgments on eligibility for economic and monetary union in due course.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Services (North Staffordshire)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the services provided by his Department and its agencies covering North Staffordshire for each of the last three years, giving details of (a) the number of staff employed and (b) the efficiency savings (i) required and (ii) achieved for each of those years. [37]

Mr. Burt: A full range of services on all Social Security issues is provided to the people of North Staffordshire via the local offices at Hanley, Longton and Newcastle, where the Benefits Agency, Child Support Agency, and Contributions Agency are sited.

The number of staff employed at these sites is shown in the table:

Year	BA	CSA	CA
1993–94	386	16	22
1994–95	389	16	22
1995–96	362	16	17

Figures as at 1 April 1996.

The Department and its agencies are committed to carrying out its business efficiently and has set national efficiency savings targets to monitor progress. Information for each of the last three years is in the following table:

	1993–94			1994–95			1995–96
	BA	CSA	CA	BA	CSA	CA	BA	CSA	CA
Target	44.60	[1]—	2.603	55.00	[1]—	4.005	75.00	5.728	12.670
Achievement	67.94	[1]—	3.800	79.27	[1]—	7.106	98.46	8.746	13.729

[1] No efficiency target for CSA in 1993–94 and 1994–95. It is not possible to break down these figures to local level.

Local managers are expected to seek out further efficiencies. For north Staffordshire, these include:

In 1993–94—centralisation of telephone, switchboard, typing, finance and visiting services and a reduction of two management posts;

In 1994–95—reorganisation and co-location of various benefit sections and a reduction of three management posts, and

In 1995–96—centralisation of Social Fund and returned order book operations and a further reduction of two management posts.

Fraud

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what account he has taken in respect of his legislative proposals to counter fraud of the problems identified in official reports published by the Australian and New Zealand data protection commissioners; and if he will make a statement on how his proposals would avoid such problems in the United Kingdom. [209]

Mr. Heald: We shall take into account the experiences of other countries involved in data matching exercises and are in contact with the Data Protection Registrar about the Department's legislative proposals.

Advice Line

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the call cost for employers using the social security advice line for employers; what has been the total cost of running this service in the last year; what are its objectives; and what plans he has to revise the call cost. [2279]

Mr. Heald: On 7 October the social security advice line for employers—SSALE—was incorporated into a new employers' helpline offering an expanded and improved service which also covers Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise.

All telephone calls to the employers' helpline are charged at local rate; there are no plans to change the call cost.

For the 1995–96 tax year SSALE was allocated a budget of £749,000. The objective of the helpline was to help employers and their representatives comply with national insurance legislation by providing an advisory service.

Disability Advice and Assistance Service

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made with establishing an advice and assistance service under part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. [3266]

Mr. Burt: I am pleased to announce that we are creating the disability access rights advice service. Following an open tendering and evaluation exercise during which we worked closely with the National Disability Council, we have decided to award the DARAS contract to the Deloitte and Touche consulting group. The contract is worth approximately £1.5 million over the next two and a half years.

The service will provide consistent and expert advice on the Act's rights of access to goods and services, drawing on the expertise and experience of a range of disability organisations, specialists trainers and lawyers, to organisations advising disabled people and business alike.

It will be operational from 2 December 1996, the date when disabled people's new rights come into force. In addition to providing advice over the telephone and in writing, the new service will also produce information and deliver training designed to improve the primary advisers' understanding of the Act's rights of access to goods and services. The service will also establish arrangements for conciliation of disputes. It will therefore keep to a minimum the need for cases to go to court.

Benefits Agency (Emergency Services)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each of the last five years and for each Benefits Agency office, the number of occasions payments have been made by the Benefits Agency out-of-hours service. [1430]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pensions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of the basic rate pension (a) indexed to prices and (b) indexed to earnings in 2000, 2010, 2020, 2030, 2040 and 2050 on the basis of the 1994 OPCS population projections; and if he will estimate the comparable costs, on the same assumptions and for the same years, on the basis of the 1992 Office of Population Censuses and Surveys population projections. [2292]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the table:

£ billion

Estimated expenditure on basic state pension	2000	2010	2020	2030	2040	2050
Price uprating 1992 population projection	30.7	34.6	36.5	44.2	47.1	44.9
Price uprating 1994 population projection	30.3	33.6	35.4	43.4	46.7	44.4
Earnings uprating 1992 population projection	32.6	42.6	52.2	73.3	90.7	100.4
Earnings uprating 1994 population projection	32.2	41.3	50.7	71.9	89.9	99.2

1. Estimated expenditure is shown in 1996 benefit rate terms, rounded to the nearest £0.1 billion.

2. Estimated expenditure on basic state pension using the 1992 population projections is based on the report by the Government Actuary on the third quinquennial review under section 137 of the Social Security Act 1975 and the Pensions Bill 1994 report by the Government Actuary on the financial provisions of the bill on the national insurance fund as appropriate. It is based on 1996–97 benefit rates, is for Great Britain, assumes equalisation of state pension ages and excludes graduated pensions and additional pension.

3. Earnings uprating figures assume that earnings increase faster than prices by 1.5 per cent. per annum commencing with the uprating in April 1997.

4. Estimated expenditure on basic state pension using the 1994 population projections has been obtained by adjusting the expenditure figures described in note 2 in the light of the different numbers in the population over state pension age in the 1992 and 1994 population projections. It is based on 1996–97 benefit rates, is for Great Britain, assumes equalisation of state pension ages and excludes graduated pension and additional pension.

Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the cost of implementing the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's recommendations on chronic bronchitis and emphysema. [2029]

Mr. Roger Evans: Any assessment of the cost of implementing the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's recommendations could only be a broad estimated as it would be based on assumptions about the number of claimants who may come forward. The estimate annual benefit cost is around £20 million, with an additional administrative cost in the first year of around £5 million.

Expatriate Pensioners

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current estimated cost to public funds of fully uprating Britain's expatriate pensioners whose pensions are frozen in consequence of their chosen country of abode. [2623]

Mr. Heald: The estimated cost of paying fully indexed benefits to all state retirement and widow's pensioners living abroad whose benefits are frozen is £255 million a year.

The figure is based on the number of pensioners living abroad in July 1996 and on the current rate of state pension.

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the savings to public funds in respect of social security, residential care and health care costs in respect of Britain's expatriate pensioners. [2624]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available.

We cannot say what calls British pensioners would make on these services if they lived in this country, or what the additional cost to the social security or health and social services budgets would be.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the amount (a) cumulatively and (b) per week by which the retirement allowance of those people transferred from reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance between 1 April and 1 October was lower than their reduced earnings allowance. [2684]

Mr. Roger Evans: The estimated average weekly difference for those transferred from reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance between 1 April and 30 September is approximately £29. The estimated average cumulative difference is about £630. This may be offset by additional income related benefits entitlement for some retirement allowance recipients.

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appeals against being transferred from reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance were lodged with social security appeal tribunals between 1 April and 1 October; and how many of these have been (a) allowed and (b) heard. [2685]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) men and (b) women were transferred from reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance between 1 April and 1 October; and how many of the woman were aged under 65 years at the time of conversion. [2686]

Mr. Evans: It is estimated that between 1 April and 30 September approximately 17,000 men and 4,000 women who are over pension age have been transferred from reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance. Virtually all of the 4,000 women are likely to have been under 65 years of age at the time of transfer.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the percentage withdrawal of benefit following all work test examinations at each benefit agency office in Scotland for each month from June 1996 to the latest available month. [1356]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of incapacity benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. George Foulkes, dated 5 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if he will give the percentage withdrawal of benefit following All Work Test examinations at each Benefit Agency Office in Scotland for each month from June 1996 to the latest available month.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what payment is made per test to doctors carrying out all-work tests. [1351]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Benefits Agency medical services is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. George Foulkes, dated 5 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what payment is made to doctors carrying out All Work Tests for each test.

Doctors who are contracted to carry out all work test assessments on a sessional basis are paid at an hourly rate of £30.70. A session normally lasts three and a half hours. The number of assessments carried out in a session varies depending on the complexity of the condition involved. An average assessment takes a total of 47 minutes, therefore on average each doctor can be expected to assess up to 4 clients per session.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the absolute numbers of people who (a) failed and (b) passed the all work tests at Ayr for each month since April 1995; if he will indicate the number of those who failed who subsequently appealed for each month, the number of those appeals which were successful and the number of successful appellants who were subsequently called for a further all work test.[1357]

[1346]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. George Foulkes, dated 5 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking what is the current staff complement at the Ayr benefit office; how many of those have been working there for more than (a) one year and (b) five years; how many of these serve as adjudicating officers; what formal qualifications these adjudication officers have; what monitoring is undertaken of their work; and to whom the adjudication officers at

Ayr are directly accountable; and how many of the staff of the Ayr Benefit Office have formal qualifications (a) in medicine, (b) in professions allied to medicine, (c) in social work and (d) of a degree or equivalent; what arrangements are made for the monitoring of the work of the staff of the Ayr Benefit Office; and who is responsible for the training of staff at Ayr.

There are currently 172 staff employed in the Ayr Benefit Office of whom 172 have been there for more than one year and 139 have been in post for more than 5 years. There are 15 Adjudication Officers (AOs), 3 of whom (including one part-time) are engaged as specialist AOs dealing with Incapacity Benefit including cases which have failed the All Work Test.

All AOs have undertaken intensive training provided by BA Training Operations. Independent monitoring of adjudication is in place within Ayr Benefit Office which forms part of the Benefits Agency South West Scotland District Office. There is independent monitoring undertaken by the Central Adjudication Services. AOs are independent authorities accountable to Chief Adjudication Officers on all aspects of adjudication and standards thereof.

There are no members of staff with formal qualifications in medicine, professions allied to medicine and Social Work. There are 6 staff with a degree or equivalent.

All work is monitored as a matter of routine by checking processes, and by a dedicated quality control section. The District Manager is responsible for the training and development of staff through a structured training organisation within the District structure under the control of the District's Human Resources Manager.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Social Security Agency

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the result of the recent market-testing exercises for messengers and typing services in the Social Security Agency; on how many occasions bids were called for and how many were received; what were the costs of the market-testing operation and the estimated annual savings; and if he will list the successful bidders. [1198]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Alec Wylie, and I have asked him to arrange for a response to be given.

Letter from J. B. Fleming to Mr. Robert McCartney, dated 1 November 1996:

Your recent Parliamentary Question on market testing has been passed to Mr. Wylie, Chief Executive of the Social Security Agency for reply. As he is away on business at present, I am replying on his behalf.

Invitations to tender for the typing service and separately for the messenger and support service in the Agency were issued on 29 April 1996. The only bids received on time were those from the in-house team, one for each service. One other bid was received after the deadline and therefore rejected.

The evaluation process has not yet been completed and it is therefore not yet possible to provide you with the final cost of this particular market testing exercise or the estimated savings from it. I shall ensure that you are given that information in due course.

Paedophile Register

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consult with the Home Secretary with a view to including Northern Ireland in the proposed paedophile address registration legislation. [1199]

Sir John Wheeler: I am pleased to confirm that the Government intend to bring forward legislation on a United Kingdom-wide basis which will include provisions to require sex offenders in Northern Ireland to register changes of address with the police.

Mr. Ancram: The estimated percentage of young people in Northern Ireland who have achieved (a) five GCSE passes or equivalent and (b) no passes by the age of 19 years in the last five years is as follows:

Gun Clubs

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many gun clubs exist in Northern Ireland; what regulations govern their conduct; and if he will provide a breakdown of membership numbers. [1611]

Sir John Wheeler: At present there are 42 firearms clubs in Northern Ireland authorised by the Secretary of State under article 54 of the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 1981. Clubs must meet a number of criteria in order to obtain and retain this approval, the main elements of which are:

(i) a club may introduce a potential member to the sport at a club session. This "interim member" must be introduced and sponsored by at least one full club member or officials before his/her application to become a "probationary member" is accepted, the interim member must attend the club regularly on a number of occasions and become known to club officials.

(ii) Before becoming a full member, the probationary member must have been a member of the club for at least 12 months during which time he/she must attend and shoot regularly. The probationary member must be given a course in the safe handling and use of firearms on a one-to-one basis by someone who is either a full member of the club or who is a qualified coach. Once a probationary member has satisfactorily completed a course in the safe handling and use of firearms, he/she must for the remainder of the probationary period be supervised at all times when in possession of firearms or ammunition by either the range officer, a full member of the club or someone who is a qualified coach;

(iii) the security arrangements for the storage of club firearms and ammunition must meet the approval of the RUC.

There are approximately 3,500 members attending these clubs. Individual club membership totals are not readily available, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Firearms

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide a breakdown of the reasons given for the legal possession of firearms in Northern Ireland. [1609]

Sir John Wheeler: The following are accepted as "good reason" for the possession of firearms in Northern Ireland, as required by the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 1981:

Sporting purposes;

Vermin control;

Personal protection;

Target use;

Collectors' items;

Possession only;

Miscellaneous (including humane killing, starting pistols, and firearms held by fishermen for protection of their nets).

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the firearms licences currently issued in Northern Ireland are for handguns. [1608]

Sir John Wheeler: It is not possible to say how many current firearms certificates are solely for handguns in Northern Ireland as some certificates may include more than one firearm. There were however 12,872 hand guns held on firearm certificates at 30 September 1996.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions in each of the past 10 years firearms licences have been revoked. [1612]

Sir John Wheeler: The Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary has informed me that firearm certificates have been revoked in each of the last 10 years as follows:

1986: 144

1987: 157

1988: 148

1989: 135

1990: 131

1991: 110

1992: 94

1993: 97

1994: 113

1995: 115

1996: 75 (to 22 October).

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what limit exists on the number of firearms that may be possessed by an individual; and if he will make a statement about the number of legal weapons possessed and the number of firearms licences. [1610]

Sir John Wheeler: There is no specific limit to the numbers of firearms which may be held on a person's firearm certificate but, in accordance with article 28 of the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, the Chief Constable must be satisfied that the holder has shown "good reason" for purchasing, acquiring or having in his possession each firearm for which an application is made.

At 30 September 1996 there were 134,103 firearms held on 87,302 firearm certificates issued by the Chief Constable.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of firearms and shotguns, by the categories used by the RUC, held in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years; and how many of these were identified as being used in crime in each of those years. [1965]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 1 November 1996]: (i) The figures for the number of firearms held on certificate in each of the last three years is as follows:

	1993	1994	1995
Shotguns	84,270	84,733	85,269
Air Weapons	19,939	20,447	21,074
Rifles	13,079	13,175	13,460
Handguns	12,008	12,833	12,917
Miscellaneous	1,214	1,250	1,307
Totals	130,510	132,438	134,027

(ii) At present the RUC is unable to distinguish, from its records, whether the firearms used in crimes have been held legally or illegally. The RUC is, however, currently considering whether it is possible to set up a system which would facilitate the retrieval of such information. The Chief Constable estimates that less than 1 per cent. of these cases would have involved legally held firearms.

The following is a record of cases in which firearms have been used in the last three years:

1993: 1,185 (including 86 crimes involving shotguns)

1994: 963 (including 77 crimes involving shotguns)

1995: 518 (including 73 crimes involving shotguns).

Low Impact Development

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what research he has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned of low impact development in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [2343]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Planning Service under its Chief Executive, Mr. T. W. Stewart. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Mr. Martyn Jones, dated 6 November 1996:

Mr. Moss has asked me to reply to your Question about research into low impact development in rural areas.

The Planning Service has neither evaluated nor commissioned any research into low impact development in rural areas.

Amenity Site, Millisle

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when work commenced at the new amenity site at Moss road, Millisle; which agency is the promoter of this scheme; how many objectors there were to this scheme; when the scheme was given planning permission; and if he will make a statement. [2439]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Planning Service under its chief executive, Mr. T. W. Stewart. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Mr. John D. Taylor, dated 6 November 1996:

Mr. Moss has asked me to reply to your question about the new amenity site at Moss Road, Millisle.

Outline planning permission for a proposed civic amenity site on land between 2 and 32 Moss Road, was granted to Ards Borough Council on 28 September 1995. Four letters of objection were received in response to public advertisement and neighbour notification. Planning consent to an application for reserved matters was granted on 5 August 1996. The start date for work is a matter for Ards Borough Council as promoter of the scheme.

Day Care Services

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many elderly people attended the statutory day care facilities at (i) Loanda house, Newry and (ii) Millview, Bessbrook, prior to their closure; of these, how many have been assessed as needing day care services; how many have been offered alternative facilities; of these, how many have been unable to avail themselves of the alternative facilities; and for what reasons. [1774]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is as follows:

Loanda House

Twelve elderly people attended Loanda house before it closed. All were assessed as needing day care services and offered alternative services. Two of the 12 have been unable to avail themselves of the offer due to failing health.

Millview (Bessbrook)

Eighteen elderly people attended Millview prior to its closure. Eight were assessed as needing day care services and offered alternative services in Newry. Five refused the offer due to the extra travel involved, one accepted the offer and two have not indicated their decision as yet.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in receipt of disability living allowance have had their awards terminated following an examining medical practitioner's report in each of the past 24 months. [1775]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Alec Wylie. I have asked him to arrange for a response to be given.

Letter from Gerry Keenan to Mr. Seamus Mallon, dated 1 November 1996:

Your recent Parliamentary Question on Disability Living Allowance has been passed to Mr Wylie, Chief Executive of the Social Security Agency for reply. As Mr Wylie is on leave, I am replying on his behalf.

You asked how many people in receipt of Disability Living Allowance have had their awards terminated following an Examining Medical Practitioner's (EMP) report in each of the past 24 months. Specific records are not maintained on the actual number of claims which were terminated where an Examining Medical Practitioner's report had been requested. However I can supply information on the number of claims disallowed on review or at renewal stage where an Examining Medical Practitioner's report was considered to be the main evidence on which the decision was based and this is illustrated in the attached table.

I hope this explains the position to you and I would be happy to provide you with any further information you require.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many appeals against disability living allowance decisions have been heard in each of the past 24 months; and of these how many were (i) allowed, (ii) disallowed and (iii) deferred. [1776]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Alex Wylie. I have asked him to arrange for a response to be given.

You asked how many appeals against Disability Living Allowance decisions have been heard in each of the past 24 months; and of these how many were allowed, disallowed or deferred. The information is set out on the attached table. I should point out that the decisions of the Appeal Tribunal are not normally notified to Disability Living Allowance Branch in the month that they are heard. Therefore the figures in column one of the table refer to the month in which the decision was received in the Branch and this is how our statistics are maintained.

I hope this explains the position to you and I would be happy to provide any further information you require.

Prisoners (Visitors)

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what financial assistance is available for visits to prisoners by their immediate relatives in respect of (i) travel, (ii) accommodation, (iii) subsistence and (iv) other costs; and if he will give the rates for that assistance where the prison is situated in (a) Scotland and (b) England or Wales. [1777]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Northern Ireland Prison Service under its chief executive, Mr. Alan Shannon. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Alan Shannon to Mr. Seamus Mallon, dated 6 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to the Parliamentary Question which you tabled about the availability of financial assistance for visits to prisoners by their immediate relatives, where the prison is situated in Scotland or England and Wales.

Close relatives of prisoners, who qualify for assistance under Social Security regulations, receive the return fare to the prison by the cheapest route for 2 visits every 4 weeks. Payments are made on behalf of the Northern Ireland Prison Service by the Social Security Agency through the claimant's local Social Security Office by means of a giro cheque and travel warrant. Travel is normally by bus, train and ferry; in exceptional circumstances the cost of travel by taxi or air may be met.

In addition to meet the cost of travel, where overnight accommodation and main meals are necessary, the following rates apply:

Bed and breakfast accommodation

£15.00 per night (adult rate)

£10.00 per night (child rate)

Accommodation only

£12.40 per night (adult rate)

£7.40 per night (child rate)

Main meals

£2.60 per meal (adult and child rate)

I hope this is helpful.

Partnership Database

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received in relation to the use of the Northern Ireland partnership database by a support group of the Ulster Unionist party. [1779]

Mr. Ancram: I have not received any representation from a support group of the Ulster Unionist party regarding the use of the Northern Ireland partnership database.

HEALTH

Maternity Care

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money was paid to general practitioners through payments for ensuring the provision of maternity care for the years 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95 by (i) trust, (ii) region and (iii) health authority; and if he will make a statement. [132]

Mr. Malone: Details of the amounts paid by the former family health services authorities to general practitioners for providing maternity medical services in 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95 will be placed in the Library.

Information is not held centrally concerning payments made to general practitioners by NHS trusts or by the former regional health authorities for the provision of maternity care.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses (a) entered the profession as students, (b) completed their training and (c) have left the profession or ceased to practice in each year since 1990. [1111]

Mr. Horam: The information is not centrally available.

Organophosphate Dips

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what liaison there is between his Department, the Department of Defence and the Ministry of Agriculture on the subject of organophosphate dips and their use; and if he will make a statement. [1860]

Mr. Horam: The Government are advised on the safety, quality and efficacy of veterinary medicines by the independent Veterinary Products Committee and the licensing authority, which includes Department of Health Ministers. The continued use of organophosphate sheep dips is kept under review by the VPC and officials of the Department of Health are in regular contact with officials of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate on this matter. My officials are also in regular contact with officials of the Ministry of Defence which has an interest.

In addition, the Baroness Cumberlege, Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Health, has had a series of meetings with my hon. Friend, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Rural GPs (Recruitment)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what initiatives are currently being undertaken to assist the recruitment of general practitioners to rural medical practices; and if he will make a statement. [1741]

Mr. Malone: We are not aware of any particular recruitment difficulties in rural areas. However, there are a number of fees and allowances available to general practitioners in rural areas.

NHS Trusts (VAT)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact of restrictions placed by Customs and Excise on (a) the ability of NHS bodies to recover VAT retrospectively on contracted-out services on the budgets of NHS trusts and (b) the use of external services within the NHS; and what assessment he has made of the losses that will be incurred in respect of these restrictions by NHS trusts in England and Wales. [2325]

Mr. Horam: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have extended the deadline for national health service bodies to submit retrospective claims for value added tax refunds on contracted out services. There should be no effect on the use of external services. It is not feasible to assess whether any VAT will remain unrecovered.

Body Mass Index Data

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the longitudinal body mass index data for (a) adolescents and (b) adults by sex in each BMI category for age groups (i) 15, (ii) 18, (iii) 35, (iv) 40 to 59, (v) 45 to 69, (vi) 55 and (vii) 55 to 75 years in each of the last five years. [2189]

Mr. Horam: Data are not available in the form requested. Available data are given in the attached tables.

Annual cross-sectional body mass index data from the health survey for England are shown in table 1. BMI data from the dietary and nutritional survey of British adults are shown in table 2. The most recent body mass index data available on younger school children, collected in 1983, combines both 14 and 15-year-olds. This is also shown in table 2.

Walsgrave Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to respond to the private finance initiative proposals relating to the Walsgrave Hospitals NHS trust. [2276]

Mr. Horam: Walsgrave Hospitals national health service trust is currently negotiating the proposed private finance initiative scheme with its preferred bidder. A full business case is being prepared by the trust and a decision will be taken on the scheme when this is submitted.

NHS Pensions (Practice Nurses)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce legislation to include practice nurses in the NHS pension scheme; and if he will make a statement. [2042]

Mr. Malone: Opening up the national health service pension scheme to general practitioner practice staff is under consideration.

Maintenance Work

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current backlog of maintenance work in the NHS. [2794]

Mr. Horam: The current backlog maintenance estimate for the national health service for 1995–96 is £2.41 billion, which compares with £2.32 billion for 1994–95. This figure includes estimated costs for maintenance on all properties in the NHS due to be replaced, not used for patient care, awaiting planned preventative maintenance and awaiting disposal. They also include an element for meeting statutory and safety standards.

Spongiform Encephalopathies

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish his plans for research concerning BSE. [188]

Mr. Horam: A strategy for the centrally directed programme of research into the human health aspects of transmissible spongiform encephalopathies, which the Secretary of State announced on 25 March, will be published shortly.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what potential methods of treatment are being (a) planned and (b) evaluated in respect of human equivalents to BSE. [189]

Mr. Horam: We need to improve our understanding of the nature of the agent which causes spongiform encephalopathies before we are able to investigate possible methods of treatment. This will be a high priority in our centrally directed programme of research.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations he has had with the MRC in the last 12 months over its future priorities for medical research; and if he will make a statement. [1399]

Mr. Malone: The Department's Chief Medical Officer and Director of Research and Development are members of the Medical Research Council. In addition, officials from the Department have served on a number of MRC committees and met with MRC officials on a number of occasions in the past 12 months as part of the terms of the concordat which exists between the Health Departments of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and the MRC. A wide range of future priorities for medical and health services research have been covered in these discussions.

Neurodegenerative Diseases

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will consult the Alzheimer's Disease Society over his Department's future plans for promoting of research into Alzheimer's disease; and if he will make a statement. [1397]

Mr. Burns: The policy research programme supports policy and operational strategy in the Department. We aim to take into account the views of a wide range of interested groups, such as the Alzheimer's Disease Society, in determining future research specifically into Alzheimer's disease under the programme.

Mr. Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish details of research and development projects in the NHS focusing on Alzheimer's and other neurodegenerative diseases. [1400]

Mr. Burns: The Department runs two separate research programmes: the policy research programme and the national health service research and development programme. The latest available information on research being carried out under the policy research programme is contained in "The Centrally Commissioned Research Programme: Commissions in 1994–95", copies of which are placed in the Library.

The NHS research and development programme consists of a number of national programmes and regional research activity. The mental health programme includes a project examining the development of screening tests for dementia and depression in ethnic elders; it also includes a project which is examining dementia information in order to develop a model to establish the number of people in a given population needing specific dementia services. Information is not available centrally on all the research projects being undertaken as part of the regional programme. The projects on which information is available centrally include a study of the patterns and consequences of semantic memory impairment in Alzheimer's disease; a community based control study of dementias; a study of neuronal structure in ageing and Alzheimer's based dementia; and cognitive decline, dementia and ageing in people with Down's syndrome: study of the risk factors and care needs.

Eye Tests

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response he will be making to the call by the Royal National Institute for the Blind for the restoration of free eye tests to people over 60 years old and a public awareness campaign on the importance of regular testing for others; and if he will make a statement. [1401]

Mr. Malone: We have already informed the Royal National Institute for the Blind that we would be happy to co-operate with it in a campaign to promote the benefits of regular sight tests. We are not planning to extend the criteria for free national health service sight tests. Existing provisions for people on low incomes or at risk of eye diseases to receive free sight tests, where necessary through an optometrist making a home visit, are responsive to the needs of older people.

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the current policy for accepting patients from Powys at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital. [1766]

Mr. Horam: The treatment of patients from Powys at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital national health service trust is a local contracting issue between the trust, Dyfed-Powys health authority and general practitioner fundholders.

SCOTLAND

Construction Industry (Timber)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to promote the greater use of timber in the construction industry; and if he will make a statement. [1758]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment.

Forestry

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for increased financial provision in respect of proposals to increase the forest cover in the United Kingdom; what percentage of this provision is planned to be spent before May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [1850]

Mr. Kynoch: We have made provision for the payment of £40 million in woodland grants to the private sector in Britain in the current financial year. This will increase to £42 million next year. Forestry in Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total amount of time involved on the part of civil servants within his Department in preparing and issuing his letter of 24 October, listing departmental achievements; and if he will make a statement. [1951]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Preparing and issuing the letter of 24 October was part of the normal duties of a number of civil servants, and the time spent by them on it cannot be separately identified. The achievements it outlined are the result of 17 years' hard work.

Prison Officers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prison officers in post on or before 30 September 1987 took early retirement on 24 March 1995 in accordance with Scottish Prison Service staff circular no. 58/94; and under what rules and on what basis retirement benefits provided by the compensation schemes were calculated, awarded and put into payment to the prison officers when they retired under the terms of the circular. [1614]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The subject of the question relates to matters undertaken by the Scottish Prison Service. I have asked its chief executive, Mr. E. W. Frizzell, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from E. W. Frizzell to Mr. Alex Salmond, dated 6 November 1996:

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton has asked me to reply to your question about the number of prison officers who took early retirement in March 1995, and under what rules.

The early retirement scheme was introduced to assist the restructuring of the Scottish Prison Service which required the generation of vacancies at all grades over the following few years. The Scheme was announced to the field under Staff Circular No. 58/94 and applications were sought from staff who would be aged 50 or over at 1 January 1995, but who had not reached their minimum retirement age.

The number of prison officers in post on or before 30 September 1987 who took early retirement on 24 March 1995 was 142. The compulsory early retirement benefits which accompanied these exits were awarded and paid under the Rules of the Civil Service Compensation Scheme.

Salmon Farming

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to protect and promote the Scottish and United Kingdom salmon farming industry; and if he will make a statement. [528]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Salmon farming is important to the highlands and islands of Scotland and the Government are committed to supporting the industry. To this end, I have been working closely with the Scottish industry, the European Commission, and the Governments of Norway and the Republic of Ireland to ensure that every route to a more stable farmed salmon market is fully explored.

Given the history of disruption in this sector, I encouraged the industry to put its anti-dumping and subsidy complaints to the European Commission for investigation, officials having lent technical assistance in their preparation. If there is clear and convincing evidence that the complaints are justified, the industry has been assured of Government backing for firm action to be taken.

I have arranged to meet the new Norwegian Minister on 25 November. I will encourage him to review the position, including the continuation and effectiveness of the Norwegian Government feed quota measures.

Nursery Vouchers

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nursery places have been made available to four-year-olds in (a) public, (b) private and (c) voluntary sectors in each of the four piloting areas since the start of the voucher pilot scheme; and how many of these are new places. [1830]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 1 November 1996]: The number of places offered by pre-school centres is not held centrally. On the basis of returns for the first half of the first term, the number of children currently receiving voucher supported pre-school education in each of the pilot areas, broken down by type of provider, is as follows:

Provider	Argyll and Bute	East Renfrewshire	Highland	North Ayrshire	Total
Local authority	183	621	270	884	1,958
Private and voluntary[1]	184	340	120	664	1,308
Independent schools	0	22	0	0	22
Totals	367	983	390	1,548	[2]3,288

[1] An accurate breakdown between children attending voluntary and private sector centres is not held centrally.
[2] To avoid double counting, these figures excludes those cases (c120) where the same child receives education at more than one centre.

Many new places have been created by the voucher system in the pilots—42 new local authority centres providing pre-school education for 884 voucher-bearing children have been opened, and many of the 21 existing local authority centres have expanded their provision. Moreover, 88 centres in the voluntary and private sectors, providing for over 1,300 voucher-bearing children, have received educational quality accreditation for the first time ever. The evaluation team from Stirling university, when it has reported, any throw additional light on the extent and distribution of expansion directly attributable to the voucher initiative.

Low Impact Development

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research he has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned of low impact development in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [2344]

Mr. Kynoch: The Scottish Office has not evaluated or commissioned any research specifically on the subject of low impact development in rural areas. However, the Scottish Office provides a range of guidance, advice and support designed to encourage sustainable development in rural areas which benefits local residents.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [2475]

Mr. Kynoch: The Scottish Office is currently consulting on the following proposal for which the deregulation order-making power may be used:

The repeal of the Methylated Spirits (Sale by Retail) (Scotland) Act 1937.

The timing of any reference to the Deregulation Committee will depend on the outcome of consultation.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages or disadvantages of such a repeal. [2470]

Mr. Kynoch: The Scottish Office intends to revoke the Surface Waters (Classification) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 before the end of 1996.

Since the regulations are being revoked, a cost compliance assessment is not required. They are being replaced by the Surface Waters (Abstraction for Drinking Water) (Classification) (Scotland) Regulations 1996, in respect of which a compliance cost assessment is being prepared.

Nurses

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses (a) entered the profession as students, (b) completed their training and (c) have left the profession or ceased to practice in each year since 1990. [2426]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested in parts (a) and (b) is shown in the table. The information requested in part (c) is not held centrally and would have to be obtained from individual employers both within and outwith the NHS.

Fiscal year	(a) Number entering training during specified year	(b) Number completing training during specified year

Value Added Tax

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the impact on local authority contracted-out services of the restrictions placed by Customs and Excise on the ability of organisations to recover VAT retrospectively; and if he will make a statement. [2621]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him yesterday.

Rough Sleepers Initiative

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Scottish Office research on a rough sleepers initiative will be published; and when he will initiate measures arising from the conclusions of the research. [2474]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The report on this research study, which was commissioned by the Scottish Office and Scottish Homes from the university of Wales to investigate the prevalence of rooflessness, is currently being finalised. The results of the research will be given careful consideration.

Primary Pupils

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of children aged five, six and seven years were in classes of 31 or more in 1995 and provisionally for 1996 (a) per authority and (b) in Scotland as a whole. [2476]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Statistics on class size are collected biennially. The available information, which relates to pupils in P1, P2 and P3 single stage classes and P1/P2 and P2/P3 composite stage classes, as at September 1995, is given below.

Health Capital Expenditure

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland from which budget he took the £30 million of health capital expenditure announced on 9 October 1996. [2479]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The distribution of £30 million to enable NHS trusts in Scotland to carry out a number of capital projects will be funded from the capital budget.

Dounreay Nuclear Plant

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what revisions have taken place to official publications of health and safety reports covering the activities of the Dounreay nuclear plant since 1975; and if he will make a statement. [2364]

Mr. Page [holding answer 4 November 1996]: I have been asked to reply.

I am assured by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority that, apart from updating the contents, the only revisions made to Dounreay health and safety reports prior to their formal issue were to remove commercially sensitive data and information that could compromise the security of nuclear materials.

Landed Estates

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to monitor the market in the sale of landed estates, and if he will make a statement. [530]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The Government do not monitor the market in the sale of landed estates. Information on sales of agricultural land in Scotland over 5 hectares is obtained for statistical purposes to allow estimates to be made of the overall value of land and buildings used for agriculture in Scotland.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Organic Food

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantity of organic food has been imported into the United Kingdom for each year since 1992; what percentage these imports constitute of the total amount of organic produce sold each year in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [2356]

Mr. Boswell: Specific figures for imports of organic food are not collected. Estimates made several years ago with the co-operation of several large supermarket chains indicated that about three-quarters of organic food on sale in those shops was imported.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each year since 1994 (a) the estimated number of organic farms or holdings in England, (b) what administrative procedures are required for the acquisition of money under the organic aid scheme, (c) how much money was earmarked for the organic aid scheme and (d) what percentage of the money annually earmarked has now been received by farmers for that year; and if he will make a statement. [2327]

Mr. Boswell: (a) The total area on which organic methods were practised in England as at February 1995 was 21,896 hectares. This had increased to 24,543 hectares by the end of December 1995. Currently there are 688 registered organic holdings in England representing an area of 25,993 hectares. Details of the number of organic farms/holdings in England—as opposed to the UK—are not available for earlier years.

(b) To obtain organic aid a farmer must register the land in a conversion with the UK Register of Organic Food Standards, (UKROFS), or a body approved by UKROFS, and undertake to convert to organic agriculture in accordance with the rules of the scheme and UKROFS organic production standards.

(c) At the time of its launch in August 1994, budgetary provision for the organic aid scheme in England was set at £0.8 million for 1994–95 rising to £1.5 million in 1995–96 and 1996–97. Scheme budgets are constantly revised in the light of scheme uptake and provision for 1996–97 is now £455,000.

(d) For 1994–95 and 1995–96, 3.3 per cent. and 17.4 per cent. respectively of the original budgets were actually paid to farmers. For 1996–97, our current forecast show that about 89 per cent. of the revised budget will be paid to farmers by the end of this financial year.

Our research shows that the organic aid available should be sufficient to attract a greater number of applicants, but it is apparent that aid rates are not the only factor which determines whether a farmer will go organic. We believe lack of knowledge is a major reason and I was therefore pleased to launch the organic conversion information service last July. The service provides a telephone helpline and a free advisory visits to would be organic farmers. Interest has been strong and we hope that more farmers will be encouraged to convert as a result of this initiative.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries from which the United Kingdom imports organic food stating for each the (a) tonnage and (b) relative percentage of overall organic food imports that it constitutes; and if he will make a sttaement. [2351]

Mr. Boswell: Specific figures for imports of organic food are not collected. The UK Register of Organic Food Standards grants authorisations for the sale, as organic, of food from countries outside the European Community. In the past 12 months, authorisations have been granted with respect to the following countries: Chile, two authorisations; Egypt; Ghana; Slovakia; South Africa; Turkey; and USA, four authorisations.

Authorisations are not required for countries of the European Community and for the following countries deemed to operate standards equivalent to those of the EC: Argentina, Australia, Hungary, Israel, Switzerland.

Pesticides (Potatoes)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what problems over the last 12 months have been reported to his Department with regard to the development of resistance in the pests affecting potatoes to the pesticides used; and if he will make a statement regarding the research his Department is commissioning or evaluating to rectify (a) these and (b) other cases of pests developing a resistance to specific agrochemical applications. [2320]

Mrs. Browning: Recent reports of resistance problems in pest control on potatoes have related to outbreaks of the peach-potato aphid, Myzus persicae. One resistant strain is well known and can be controlled by insecticides containing pirimicarb. A new resistance mechanism emerged in late summer 1996 in aphids established in parts of Lincolnshire.

MAFF has agreed specific work on the monitoring and management of insecticide resistance in Myzus persicae and is conducting a continuing programme of research projects on identifying and combating pest resistance at a cost of about £1 million per year.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what numbers of sheep consigned for export during (a) July, (b) August and (c) September were identified using a mark issued by the local divisional veterinary manager. [1984]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 November 1996]: Figures collated from the computerised animal movements—Animo—database indicated that 68,967, 83,628 and 43,405 sheep were certified for export to other EU member states in July, August and September 1996 respectively. The Sheep and Goats (Records, Identification and Movement) Order 1996 lays down rules for the marking and identification of exported sheep. The flockmark part of the identification mark of each animal would have been allocated by the divisional veterinary manager, but the full identification mark would have included an individual animal number which was not.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what surveys have been undertaken, or are to be performed, to identify the incidence of BSE brain disease among cattle overtly healthy at slaughter. [826]

Mrs. Browning: No survey has been carried out to identify the incidence of BSE among overtly healthy cattle at slaughter. Recognisable changes in the central nervous tissue of BSE—infected animals only occur close to the onset of clinical disease, and this would severely limit the efficiency of such a survey using current diagnostic tests, particularly as the majority of cattle killed for human consumption historically, and all so killed currently, are under 30 months of age, while the average age at clinical onset is five years.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of confirmed BSE cases in each year since 1993 for (a) Northern Ireland, (b) the Isle of Man, (c) Jersey and (d) Guernsey. [821]

Mrs. Browning: As at 21 October 1996, the numbers of confirmed cases in each year since 1993 for (a) Northern Ireland, Isle of Man, Jersey and Guernsey are:

	1993	1994	1995	[1]1996
Guernsey	115	69	44	[3]30
Jersey	35	22	10	8
Northern Ireland	487	363	170	74
Isle of Man	111	53	32	[3]10

[1] Data incomplete.

[2] Prior to 1993 all cases were confirmed by laboratory examination. Between 1993 and 1995 only born after banned feedstuffs cases were confirmed by laboratory examination; all other cases were confirmed on the basis of clinical diagnosis. From 1996 all cases are being confirmed on the basis of clinical diagnosis.

[3] First three cases on a holding confirmed by laboratory examination, subsequent cases confirmed on the basis of clinical signs.

Mr. Hinchcliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the age distribution of the dams of those cattle which developed BSE during each year from 1989 to 1996. [846]

Mrs. Browning: It is not possible without disproportionate costs to give the information requested.

Mr. Hinchcliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the continuing employment of the main mathematician working on the subject of BSE epidemiology at the Veterinary Laboratories Agency. [847]

Mrs. Browning: Staff in the epidemiology department at the VLA include epidemiologists, statisticians and computer programmers. All staff employed by the agency are employed under the civil service standard terms and conditions. Scientists at the VLA are at the forefront of research in BSE and I am pleased to acknowledge their achievements and commitment.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each method of disposal that is (a) permitted and (b) currently in operation for (i) meat and bonemeal, (ii) tallow and (iii) each other waste product produced from cattle slaughtered under the 30-month scheme. [1453]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Commission regulation 716/96 requires that the carcases of cattle purchased under the over-30-month scheme—OTMS— are disposed of by incineration or rendered and destroyed. Meat and bonemeal and tallow produced from rendered OTMS carcases is being stored pending destruction by the best practicable environmental option, for example, incineration or burning for energy recovery at power stations.

The only other waste products from the slaughter of OTMS cattle are blood and gut contents. These can be spread on agricultural land as a fertiliser for the benefit of agriculture or ecological improvement. It is a recovery operation for the purposes of the amended EC framework directive on waste and is controlled under part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994. Where blood is not spread on land in this way, it is discharged to foul sewer which is permitted subject to consents issued under the Water Industry Act 1991.

The independent Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee, which advises Ministers on bovine spongiform encephalopathy, has considered the current and proposed methods of disposing of cattle waste and concluded that they are safe. Specifically, in relation to the spreading of blood and gut contents on land, it concluded that there was no reason to recommend that this practice should be prohibited or thought to be inadvisable.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to change the formula for financial compensation for BSE cattle introduced on 1 April 1994 in order to encourage the future reporting of such animals. [820]

Mrs. Browning: None. We have no evidence of any under-reporting. As farmers receive the full market value of their animals in compensation, there is no incentive for breaking the law by not reporting BSE suspects.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the dates of birth and slaughter of each offspring succumbing to BSE during the period of the vertical transfer experiment outlined in the Official Report, 12 December 1994, columns 523–24, with further information provided by the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee on 1 August; and which animal was in the test or control group. [822]

Mrs. Browning: The cohort study in maternal transmission will be complete in early 1997. The full results of that study are expected to be available by mid-1997 and will provide the information requested.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide the monthly figures for suspected and confirmed BSE cases in the United Kingdom during 1996. [823]

Mrs. Browning: As at 29 October 1996, the numbers of suspect cases reported by month, and the confirmations corresponding to those suspects for the UK are as follows:

	Cases reported	Cases confirmed[1]
January	1,428	1,114
February	1,276	914
March	1,362	924
April	956	604
May	972	568
June	698	434
July	780	506
August	761	419
September	729	182
October	615	2

[1] These data are incomplete because of the time lapse between report and confirmation.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what experiments are in progress aimed at identifying and quantifying the possible acquisition of BSE via pastures or buildings. [824]

Mrs. Browning: The evidence on within-herd incidence of BSE which rose to a peak of 2.7 per cent. in 1992 and has subsequently declined, indicates that horizontal transmission is not occurring at a significant level. The limits of sensitivity of current assays for infectivity make it difficult to design experiments to address this concern directly, by looking, for example, for infectivity on pasture or surfaces. Any research proposals submitted for funding in this area will be assessed according to their scientific merit.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what experiments have been performed, or are in progress, to test whether BSE infectivity might be transferred from milk or blood of BSE-infected cattle to calves from a BSE-free source; and if he will give details of the results to date. [825]

Mrs. Browning: In experimentally challenged cattle which were fed a large quantity—100 g—of BSE brain from clinical cases, infectivity was only detectable in the distal ileum six months after challenge. Experiments have also been carried out in which tissues taken from animals clinically affected with BSE were injected into susceptible mice. Infectivity is detected if the mice succumb to a BSE-like disease. The only tissues found in this test to have any BSE infectivity in them are the brain, spinal cord and retina of the eye.

No infectivity has been detected in 47 other tissues from clinically affected cattle, including blood and milk using bioassay in mice.

Details of the latest research on milk were given in paragraph 23 and appendix 5 of the November 1995 progress report, a copy of which was placed in the House Library.

Permaculture

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates he has made of the number of farms or holdings operating on permaculture principles; and if he will make a statement. [2346]

Mr. Boswell: No estimate has been made of the number of farms or holdings operating on permaculture principles.

Beef (Emergency Control) Order 1996

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions have been initiated against individuals claimed to be flouting article 2 of the Beef (Emergency Control) Order 1996—statutory instrument 1996/961—and the subsequent amendments. [816]

Mrs. Browning: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Small Beef Producers

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further action he plans to take to secure the continued operation of smaller beef producers; and what estimate he has made of the number of such farmers who still face serious difficulties. [2338]

Mr. Baldry: The effects of the current depressed market for beef cattle will be felt by beef producers in enterprises of all sizes. We have never subscribed to the view, often argued by the Commission and other EU member states, that support for agriculture should be concentrated on small family farms at the expense of larger enterprises. All farms will, however, benefit from the £235 million which is being made available from EU and Exchequer funds to support the incomes of beef producers.

Beef Consumption

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to restrict the availability for human consumption of dried, canned or frozen beef from cattle over 30 months of age and slaughtered before 29 March. [827]

Mrs. Browning: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much beef from animals aged over 30 months has been consumed for personal use since 29 March. [817]

Mrs. Browning: The Fresh Meat (Beef Controls) (No.2) Regulations 1996, SI 1996 No. 2097, as amended, prohibit the sale for human consumption of any meat derived from bovine animals aged over 30 months and slaughtered on or after 29 March, save for that from countries specified in the regulations where the Government are satisfied we can import beef without risk, and from animals slaughtered for human consumption under the beef assurance scheme. It has, however, been possible for the meat from bovine animals aged over 30 months to be returned for personal consumption by their owners—the so called "private kill" provision. Such meat is not permitted to be sold or made available in circumstances equivalent to retail sale. We have no information on the amount of meat that may have been consumed in this way, but believe that only a small number of animals are involved. We are currently considering proposals for tightening the controls on private kills.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what legislation prevents the use of beef in processed food for human consumption from animals aged over 30 months deposited in intervention cold store before 29 March. [818]

Mrs. Browning: Commission regulation 1757/96 of 10 September authorised the removal from intervention store, with a view to incineration, of all beef held in intervention on 27 March.

Bovines

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the (a) average age and (b) range of (i) beef and (ii) dairy cattle present in the bovine population in each year between 1984 and 1996. [681]

Mrs. Browning: Statistics on the numbers of cattle are contained in "The Digest of Agricultural Census Statistics". The latest edition, 1995, provides data up to 1995 and is available from the Library of the House. Totals for dairy and beef herds are shown. It is not possible to give an average age for cattle although age categories are shown in the tables. Provisional results for the 1996 agricultural census are available in separate statistical notices for England, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Gelatine

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what weight of gelatine derived entirely or partly from bovine sources was exported in each month of 1996. [819]

Mrs. Browning: Data on the export of gelatine derived entirely or partly from bovine sources are not separately identifiable. Provisional figures for exports of total gelatine for the first six months of 1996 as recorded in the overseas trade statistics are as follows:

January: 643 tonnes
February: 589 tonnes
March: 525 tonnes
April: 828 tonnes
May: 547 tonnes
June: 492 tonnes.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Business Support (South-West)

23. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what support his Department is giving to businesses located in the south-west. [551]

Mr. Greg Knight: My Department provides a wide range of services for businesses in the south-west, including business links and two regional supply offices. In addition, since April 1995 £12.7 million of regional selective assistance has been offered to companies in the region generating over £84 million worth of investment and 2,655 jobs.

The Government have also promoted a new south-west competitiveness network aimed at improving a considerable number of factors influencing the international competitiveness of business in the region. The new local competitiveness budget will also increase the extent to which key business support services, funded by the Government, are designed and delivered within the region.

Inward Investment

24. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about inward investment in the United Kingdom. [552]

Mr. Greg Knight: In 1995–96 my Department's Invest in Britain Bureau recorded 477 decisions to locate in the UK involving over 96,000 associated jobs. The UK is the No. 1 location in the European Union for investment from Japan, the US and Korea. That is an excellent performance and a vote of confidence in the strength of our economy and the skills of our work force.

Renewable Energy Schemes

25. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has for changes to subsidies for renewable energy schemes. [553]

Mr. Page: On 2 November 1995, I announced my proposals for a fourth Renewables Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation Order for approximately 400 to 500 MW of new capacity. I expect to make the order in spring next year.

The Government hope that it will be possible to announce proposals for a fifth order in 1997, to come into effect in 1998. However, before that there will be a review of the NFFO process.

Water Industry

26. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the occasions on which the Monopolies and Mergers Commission has been asked to intervene in the water industry in the last two years. [554]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Four mergers involving water companies have been referred to the MMC in the last two years. During the same period, the Director General of Water Services has made two price control references.

The merger references were:

Lyonnaise des Eaux/Northumbrian Water

General Utilities and SAUR Water Services/Mid Kent Holdings (inquiry still in progress)

Wessex Water/South West Water

Severn Trent/South West Water

The price control references were:

Portsmouth Water plc

South West Water Services Ltd.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he (a) has taken and (b) intends to take to ensure that SAUR and Société Générale des Eaux comply with the undertakings made in 1991 following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's review of Mid Kent Water; and what discussions he has had with regulators concerning the difficulties arising from regulating subsidiaries of multinational or conglomerate companies. [2308]

Mr. Taylor: When, in May, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade referred the proposed acquisition of Mid Kent by General Utilities and SAUR to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, he concluded that it would not be appropriate to exercise his discretion at that stage to bring proceedings against General Utilities in relation to the undertakings given by it in 1991. He noted, however, that those undertakings remained in force. He decided to keep the position under review and, in particular, to consider further the options open to him in respect of the undertakings once he had received the report of the MMC. That remains the position. The MMC must report to the President by 9 December 1996.

It is for those issuing and enforcing licences—normally the sectoral regulator—to consider any specific issues relating to the regulation of subsidiaries. This subject has however arisen in the context of mergers in the electricity and water industries where, on a number of occasions, companies have given assurances to my right hon. Friend that they will agree to appropriate licence amendments in order to address regulatory concerns of the relevant director general.

In relation to telecommunications, where my Department acts as the licensing authority, a number of conditions in licences under the Telecommunications Act 1984 govern relations between the licensee and other parts of its corporate group. We consult with the Director General of Telecommunications on the terms of these, as of other, conditions.

Employment Regeneration

27. Mr. Hanson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new steps he intends to take to regenerate employment in former coal mining areas. [555]

Mr. Page: My right hon. Friend the then President of the Board of Trade announced a package of measures totalling £200 million to help areas affected by pit closures. This framework of regeneration measures is now in place in all areas and major projects are under way.

Business Failures

28. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is (a) the current monthly rate of business failures and (b) the total number of business failures since April 1992. [556]

Mr. John M. Taylor: In the third quarter of 1996 there were, on a seasonally adjusted basis, 1,369 compulsory liquidations, 2,054 creditors' voluntary liquidations and 6,657 bankruptcy orders.

Since the beginning of April 1992 there were, on a seasonally adjusted basis, 31,691 compulsory liquidations, 49,090 creditors' voluntary liquidations and 141,607 bankruptcy orders.

Ceramics Industry

29. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the ceramics industry. [557]

Mr. Greg Knight: The UK ceramics industry has a distinguished history of achievement both at home and overseas and is rightly recognised as a world-wide centre of excellence for materials and technology.

However, a changing world environment and intensified competition pose new challenges which must be overcome if the UK is to improve and maintain its performance. To this end, the Government are working in partnership with the sector via channels such as the tableware strategy group to address specific competitiveness issues crucial in maintaining and building on the success of the industry.

Aerospace Industry

30. Mr. Pike: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions his Department has held in the last year in respect of research and development in the United Kingdom in the aerospace industry. [559]

Mr. Greg Knight: My Department has held a wide range of discussions in the last year in respect of research and development in the United Kingdom aerospace industry. These discussions include: ministerial meetings with the Society of British Aerospace Companies and individual companies, meetings involving the Government's Chief Scientific Adviser and the Technology Foresight Defence and Aerospace Panel, discussions with the Ministry of Defence and Defence Research Agency and discussions with companies about research and development projects under the Department's civil aircraft research and demonstration programme.

Nuclear Safety

31. Mr. McAllion: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next intends to visit Dounreay to discuss issues relating to nuclear safety. [560]

Mr. Page: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has no plans to visit Dounreay.

Far East

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next plans to visit the far east to discuss bilateral trade; and if he will make a statement. [546]

Mr. Lang: Members of the Government have been regular visitors to the far east in support of our exporters, and to encourage further trade and investment with this dynamic region. I have visited the region three times this year accompanied by more than 200 British business men. I have no further plans to visit in the immediate future on matters of bilateral trade, although I shall lead the UK Delegation to the Singapore ministerial conference of the World Trade Organisation in December.

Balance of Payments

Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in which years since 1979 the UK recorded a surplus in the balance of payments current account. [550]

Mr. Lang: The current account was in surplus in each of the years between 1980 and 1985. In the second quarter of 1996 the current account was in surplus by the largest amount for over nine years.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the average pump price of (a) four-star petrol and (b) unleaded petrol for each year since 1990. [2663]

Mr. Page: The average annual pump prices of four star and premium unleaded petrol for the years 1990 to 1995, and the first nine months of 1996, including all taxes, are given in the table.

Average UK retail prices of four star and premium unleaded petrol for the years 1990 to 1996 in cash terms, including all taxes, in pence per litre

	Four star petrol	Premium unleaded petrol
1990	44.87	42.03
1991	48.48	45.07
1992	50.28	46.07
1993	54.12	49.44
1994	56.87	51.58
1995	59.75	53.77
1996[1]	60.59	55.44

[1] Average for 1996 relates to the period from January to September, inclusive, only.

Environmental Standards

Mr. Bennett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his policy in respect of the Singapore conference on trade and the environment in respect of accommodating environmental good practice within World Trade Organisation rules. [539]

Mr. Greg Knight: The Singapore ministerial meeting in December will be an important first opportunity to take stock of the work of the World Trade Organisation's committee on trade and environment. The Government continue to support the EU's work in this committee—for example, in its efforts to clarify the relationship between multilateral environmental agreements and World Trade Organisation rules. The Government support further work by the committee after the Singapore ministerial conference.

Brazilian Mahogany

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the volume of Brazilian mahogany to be imported into the United Kingdom over the next 12 months. [2114]

Mr. Lang: The data on which to base such a forecast is not available.

Mr. Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his policy with regard to the import of Brazilian mahogany into the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [2115]

Mr. Lang: The Government consider that it is generally better to promote a policy of sustainable forest management rather than to impose trade bans on imported timber. The convention on international trade in endangered species prohibits commercial trade in 800 animal and plant species and controls it in a further 25,000 cases. Current scientific evidence does not justify a complete ban on imports of Brazilian mahogany. However, at the last CITES conference in November 1994 the UK supported a proposal to add it to appendix II of the convention which would have subjected it to controls. Although this proposal was not agreed, a number of countries where the species occurs announced that they would list Brazilian mahogany in appendix III. Accordingly, with effect from 16 November 1995 those countries have had to issue CITES permits to confirm that export of Brazilian mahogany is not detrimental to the species; other countries where the species occurs have had to issue certificates to confirm that their exports have not originated in countries with the appendix III listing; and permits to import the species into the UK have been required.

Social Chapter and Minimum Wage

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received from the manufacturing sector in respect of the implications of the social chapter and the minimum wage. [525]

Mr. Lang: My colleagues and I continue to receive representations on the social chapter and a national minimum wage during our contacts with industry. The overwhelming view is that the social chapter and a national minimum wage would seriously damage competitiveness and employment.

Business Links

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many companies have been assisted by Business Link. [541]

Mr. Page: The number of different businesses using Business Link nearly doubled between July 1995 and June 1996 from 56,513 different businesses using Business Link at least once in the first quarter from July to September 1995 to 107,159 doing so in the quarter from April to June 1996. This means that over 8,200 different businesses are now using Business Link each week. The figures for the final quarter are based on returns from 79 Business Link partnerships out of the 81 that were operational in this period.

Business Forms and Surveys

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of business forms and surveys have been abolished over the last 10 years. [2568]

Mr. Page: Figures prior to 1993 could only be produced at disproportionate cost. Since 1 April 1993, DTI and its executive agencies have reduced the number of separate business forms and survey forms by 19 per cent.—expected total for 1996–97. This reduction represents more than 500,000 fewer forms issued.

Coal Stocks

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the current level of coal stocks held by the coal and electricity generating industries; and what was the equivalent figure at the same period in (a) 1988, (b) 1990, (c) 1992 and (d) 1994. [2339]

Mr. Page: According to information provided to my Department by the coal and electricity generating industries, the level of stocks at the end of August 1996 and at the same period in 1988, 1990, 1992 and 1994 are as follows:

Thousand tonnes

	Coal industry stocks	Electricity industry stocks
August 1996	5,125	7,903
August 1994	13,003	19,940
August 1992	13,649	33,202
August 1990	7,983	28,871
August 1988	6,005	26,938

Fireworks

Mr. Hawksley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he took to address issues related to fireworks in October. [2625]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have undertaken a safety awareness campaign, consisting of 5 million safety advice leaflets distributed to the point of sale, as well as thousands of leaflets advising display organisers and retailers about handling fireworks. National television adverts and posters have also been used to reinforce the safety messages, and a safety video has been made available on request to primary schools.

In addition, my Department is undertaking a review of the controls on fireworks.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the cost effects of the millennium date change on the computer systems operated by his Department. [2611]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 5 November 1996]: My Department commissioned a study earlier this year to assess the effects of the millennium date change on the administrative computer system that it operates. The resulting report estimated that the necessary work would cost approximately £2.7 million. This cost excludes the replacement of non-compliant hardware and software which will be life-expired for other reasons. It also excludes the cost of work undertaken on computer systems operated by next steps agencies, which have their own programmes of work in respect of the millennium date change.

Paper and Pulp

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of trade what quantity of (a) paper and (b) pulp has been imported into the United Kingdom for each year since 1990; and what percentage these imports constitute of the total amount of paper and pulp used each year in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [2357]

Mr. Page: UK imports of paper and paperboard and pulp, in metric tonnes, are given in the table.

Year	Paper and paperboard	Pulp
1990	5,698	2,058
1991	5,619	2,160
1992	5,976	2,159
1993	6,078	1,909
1994	6,864	2,054
1995	6,392	2,219

Source:

Information on the quantity of UK manufacturers' sale of paper, paperboard and pulp are commercially confidential. It is therefore not possible to calculate the imports share of UK consumption.

Mr. Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the countries from which the United Kingdom imports (a) paper and (b) pulp, stating for each the (i) tonnage and (ii) relative percentage of overall paper and pulp imports that it constitutes; and if he will make a statement. [2358]

Mr. Page: The information for 1995 is given in the following table. UK imports fell by 3.5 per cent. from their peak in 1994.

UK imports of paper and paperboard, and pulp: 1995

Royal Observatories

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement of the future of the royal observatories. [651]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The Government accepted the recommendations in the report of the prior options review of the royal observatories which had been endorsed by the council of the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council. These were that the management of the overseas telescopes and the provision of the instrumentation programme provided by the royal Greenwich observatory and the royal observatory Edinburgh should be subject to competitive tendering by all competent suppliers. PPARC is currently implementing the recommendations of the review with the intention of an invitation to tender being issued this month.

Import and Export Control Act

Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many times the Import and Export Control Act 1990 has been used by the Government in each of the past four years; and for what purposes. [1550]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The sole purpose of this Act was to repeal section 9(3) of the Import, Export and Customs Powers (Defence) Act 1939.

Pure Science

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on United Kingdom policy on pure science. [535]

Mr. Ian Taylor: A prime aim of our policy is to develop the science and engineering base to enhance the skills levels, industrial competitiveness, wealth creation and the quality of life.

The Government will continue to invest in training and basic and strategic research. Allocation of funds is influenced by the foresight process. We are stimulating greater interest by industry in the strength of the science base.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Open Government

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when the Government will respond to the outstanding recommendations contained in the second report of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration on open government, HC 84, Session 1995–96. [3055]

Mr. Freeman: The Government have submitted their response to the remaining recommendations of the report of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, and the Committee is arranging for the response to be published today.

The Government responded to the majority of the recommendations contained in the Select Committee's report on 28 June 1996. It welcomed many of the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report, and in particular the Committee's endorsement of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information" as having been an important and valuable contribution to more open government. The Government's response reaffirmed their commitment to greater openness.

The Government's initial response did not, however, cover seven of the Committee's recommendations which had implications for openness in government beyond the code of practice. The Government wished to await the report of the Public Service Committee on ministerial accountability and responsibility, believing that it would provide a valuable contribution to their consideration of the issues in this area. That report was published on 30 July and the Government's response to it is also being published today.

The Government are grateful to the Select Committee on the PCA for the constructive contribution that it has made to the debate on openness. I am pleased that we have been able to agree to many of the recommendations contained in its report and that much common ground has been established between the Committee and the Government on these important issues.

However, the Government do not accept the Committee's proposal for a Freedom of Information Act. It believes that the non-statutory code of practice has a proven record and should now be given an enhanced role as setting the clear, recognised minimum standard for providing information to Parliament, and in setting out the reasons for withholding information on those occasions when this is necessary. Given this increased importance for the provisions of the code, the Government do not believe that it would now be sensible to seek a fundamental change in its status.

The Government will soon be issuing a revised code of practice and guidance on its interpretation, to reflect the responses to the PCA and Public Service Committees and in the light of the day-to-day operation of the code during the last two and a half years. The ability to amend the code to reflect experience in this way is, in the Government's view, a major advantage of their preferred non-statutory approach.

Ministerial Accountability and Responsibility

Mr. Radice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the second report of the Select Committee on Public Service of Session 1995–96 on ministerial accountability and responsibility (HC313). [3501]

Mr. Freeman: The Government have submitted their response to the report from the Public Service Committee on ministerial accountability and responsibility, and the Committee is arranging for the response to be published today.

The Government are grateful to the Select Committee for undertaking this investigation which, as envisaged by the President of the Board of Trade in the debate on 26 February, Official Report, column 593, has provided a helpful basis for the Government's consideration of the recommendations on ministerial accountability made by Sir Richard Scott in his report.

The Government reaffirm their commitment to arrangements under which it will remain properly accountable to Parliament. The Government's response to the Committee's report is addressed to this shared democratic objective.

The Government note the Committee's decision to follow what it describes as a pragmatic approach in setting out a "working definition" of ministerial responsibility, reflected in a proposed resolution of the House. The Government agree with many of the principles underlying the working definition, and share the Committee's view that there could be value in the House making explicit how it expects Ministers to discharge their responsibilities to Parliament. The Government will initiative further discussion on a cross-party basis to this end with a view to bringing forward an appropriate motion in due course.

The Government believe that effective scrutiny and accountability are secured by the giving of a full account through a rigorous policy on openness. The Government agree with the Committee on the central importance of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information" and it will now proceed, in accordance with the Committee's recommendations, to ensure that throughout Government the code is followed as the clear, recognised minimum standard for providing information to Parliament, and in setting out the reasons for withholding information, on those occasions when this is necessary.

ENVIRONMENT

Chemical Plants (Unauthorised Releases)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many unauthorised releases from chemical plants have taken place each year since 1970; how many were classified as serious; how many led to prosecutions; and what was the fine or penalty in each case. [1009]

Mr. Clappison: Chemical processes have been subject to prior authorisation under the integrated pollution control regime since 1990. So far as air is concerned, details of unauthorised releases, prosecutions and other enforcement action taken between April 1991 and March 1996 are contained in the annual reports of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, which was the IPC regulator between those dates. The annual reports are in the House Library.

HM inspectorate of pollution became a part of the Environment Agency on 1 April this year. I understand from the agency that since that date there have been 550 unauthorised releases to air from chemical processes. Few of these had serious implications. I further understand that the agency has to date carried out one prosecution in respect of those releases and that a further one is in hand. Prosecution is only one of a number of enforcement options available to the Environment Agency, which can also issue enforcement or prohibition notices.

Energy Advice Centres

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the need for continuing financial support from (a) the Government and (b) the Energy Savings Trust for local energy advice centres funded by the Energy Savings Trust over the last three years. [2254]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: My Department has received approximately 30 representations about the funding of local energy advice centres over the last three years. Of these, 14 covered Government funding and five funding by the Energy Saving Trust. The remaining 11 were concerned with financial support in general.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local energy advice centres which have been funded via the Energy Savings Trust in the last three years. [2220]

Mr. Jones: The local energy advice centres which have been funded by the Energy Saving Trust in the last three years are:

Aberdeenshire Energy Advice Centre
Belfast Energy Advice Centre
Black Country Energy Advice Centre
Bristol Energy Advice Centre
Cardiff Energy Advice Centre
Croydon Energy Advice Centre
Greenwich Energy Advice Centre
Highland Energy Advice Centre
Islington Energy Advice Centre
Leeds Energy Advice Centre
Leicester Energy Advice Centre
Lewisham Energy Advice Centre
Lothian and Edinburgh Energy Advice Centre
Middlesborough Energy Advice Centre
Northumbria Energy Advice Centre
Orkney Energy Advice Centre
Peterborough Energy Advice Centre
Plymouth Energy Advice Centre
Ryedale Energy Advice Centre
Shetland Energy Advice Centre
Solent Energy Advice Centre
Stockton on Tees Energy Advice Centre
Strathclyde and Central Energy Advice Centre
Swansea Energy Advice Centre
Tayside Energy Advice Centre
Telford Energy Advice Centre
Thames Valley Energy Advice Centre
West Wales Energy Advice Centre
Western Isles Energy Advice Centre
Western Regional Energy Advice Centre
Wirral Energy Advice Centre.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local energy advice centres which his Department has assessed as currently lack sufficient funding to ensure their continuing operation. [2256]

Mr. Jones: The local energy advice centres are the responsibility of the Energy Saving Trust. I understand that only one local energy advice centre, which failed to meet its targets on 31 August 1996, has ceased to operate.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of (a) the effectiveness of the local energy advice centres funded via the Energy Savings Trust in the last three years and (b) the need for the continuation of their services. [2255]

Mr. Jones: The Energy Saving Trust has now taken full responsibility for the further continuation and management of LEACs. On 12 July 1996, I approved grants totalling £4.1 million over three years to be paid to the Trust in support of this work.

Previously, market research showed that the LEACs provide an effective and value for money service. In 1994–95, about 57,000 clients visited LEAC offices and as a result of advice received, savings were made of 21,000 tonnes of CO2 emissions and £1.8 million over the same period.

Estuary Management Zones

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many coastal management zones are now fully integrated and operating successfully; [2596]

(2) how many authorities have published estuary management plans; and if he will publish guidance on their implementation. [2594]

Mr. Clappison: In England, 20 estuary management plans have so far been published as part of the estuaries management initiative promoted by English Nature and further plans are in preparation. Estuaries represent the areas of major pressure on the coast but there are also other initiatives under way with the objectives of managing areas of open coast. On 31 October, the Department of the Environment issued a best practice guide on coastal zone management which will assist in taking forward both types of schemes.

Water Abstraction

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sites have been identified by English Nature as being at risk from water abstraction; and what proposals he has for the conservation of these sites and for reducing water consumption in the surrounding areas. [22562]

Mr. Clappison: In its report published in September 1996, English Nature reviewed 152 wetland sites of special scientific interest, of which 18 were assessed as being at high risk from water abstraction and 38 were considered to be at medium risk, with a further 23 at high risk and 10 at medium risk if water demands continue to increase. The Environment Agency will be reviewing the report with English Nature, with a view to establishing an agreed list of sites at risk and from that deciding actions which may be needed for alleviation.

Homelessness (Durham)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the number of homeless people in the county of Durham. [2401]

Mr. Clappison: I refer the hon. Member to the supplementary table which accompanies the quarterly information bulletin, entitled "Households found accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985: England" for the available information. A copy of the bulletin, the latest of which provides statistics for the second quarter of 1996, is in the Library.

Disabled Facilities Grants

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average level of (a) discretionary and (b) mandatory disabled facilities grants in each year since 1990. [2462]

Mr. Clappison: The information requested is shown in the table.

Disabled facilities grants: England

	Average final grant payment (£s)
	Mandatory grants	Discretionary grants
1990	1,820	2,860
1991	2,950	3,470
1992	3,740	4,640
1993	4,100	2,740
1994	4,190	2,200
1995	4,180	2,190

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications for disabled facilities grants were refused in each year since 1990. [2463]

Mr. Clappison: The Department does not collect regular data on unsuccessful applications for disabled facilities grant. However, recent research for the Department indicates that about 7,000 applications for disabled facilities grants in England were refused in the year 1993–94.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) mandatory and (b) discretionary disabled facilities grants have been made in each year since 1990 in (i) the west midlands and (ii) the United Kingdom. [2461]

Mr. Clappison: The table shows the available information about the west midlands and about England. Figures about the United Kingdom are not available as the grants system in Scotland differs from that in England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Disabled facilities grants: Final payments (Number of grants)

Area Cost Adjustment

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the impact on council tax levels in the south east of England of the abolition of the area cost adjustment. [2564]

Sir Paul Beresford: The abolition of the area cost adjustment was not proposed by the team reviewing the area cost adjustment or by other participants in the discussions this year. I have not estimated the impact on council tax levels in the south-east of England of the abolition of the area cost adjustment. To do so would involve making assumptions about capping limits in the new circumstances and about local authority responses.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals the Department's working party has made for the future of the area cost adjustment; and what assessment he has made of the impact on the Isle of Wight of the abolition of area cost adjustment. [2563]

Sir Paul Beresford: The review of the area cost adjustment recommended a new method for calculating the adjustment, using data from the labour force survey to determine a factor for each local authority in England. Several variations of this approach were included as options in the report of the standard spending assessments sub-group to the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance. No proposals to abolish the area cost adjustment were made by the review team or in the sub-group report. For illustrative purposes, the effect on SSAs for 1996–97 of abolishing the area cost adjustment has been estimated. The SSA for the Isle of Wight would be reduced by £3.4 million, which is 3.5 per cent. of its SSA.

Conservation

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites in the Solent and the lagoons that have been submitted to the European Commission for designation as special areas of conservation. [2565]

Mr. Clappison: A third tranche of candidate special areas of conservation was forwarded to the European Commission on 14 October 1996; I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on Wednesday 16 October, Official Report, column 1073–74. As indicated in that reply, the Solent and Isle of Wight lagoons was one of the candidate sites. This site includes all or part of the following sites of special scientific interst:

Brading Marshes to St. Helen's Ledges;

Gilkicker Lagoon;

Hurst Castle and Lymington River Estuary;

Langstone Harbour.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1893]

Sir Paul Beresford: The table sets out the number of projects and expenditure incurred in respect of information technology projects undertaken or planned by my Department for the project requested.

Cost bands £ millions	Projects undertaken and completed since 1992	Projects planned for the coming year and/or ongoing

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of mortgage lenders provided standard assessment procedure ratings as part of valuation surveys in (a) 1994, (b) 1995 and (c) 1996; and what estimate he has made of the likely percentages in (i) 1997 and (ii) 1998. [2962]

Mr. Clappison: My Department is working with mortgage lenders to encourage the uptake of energy efficiency measures and to promote the wider use of standard assessment procedure ratings via mortgage valuation surveys. A total of 4,000 SAP ratings were issued by the Nationwide building society in 1995 under a joint initiative with the Department; under a similar initiative with the Halifax building society this year, 6,500 SAP ratings were issued. We are not aware of any statistics on or estimates of the percentage of mortgage lenders providing SAP ratings.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the effect upon household energy efficiency measures of providing standard assessment procedure ratings in valuation surveys. [2964]

Mr. Clappison: My Department continues to work with mortgage lenders to encourage the uptake of energy efficiency measures through the provision of standard assessment procedure ratings. In particular, the Department and the Halifax building society are co-operating on a joint project to evaluate the impact of providing SAP ratings as part of the valuation process. The results are expected shortly.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of property valuation surveys included standard assessment procedure ratings in (a) 1994, (b) 1995 and (c) 1996; and what estimate he has made of the likely percentages in (i) 1997 and (ii) 1998. [2963]

Mr. Clappison: My Department is working with mortgage lenders to encourage the uptake of energy efficiency measures and to promote the wider use of standard assessment procedure ratings via mortgage valuation surveys. We are not aware of any statistics collected on this subject.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [2914]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department has recently consulted interested parties on the following proposal for use of the deregulation order-maker power:

Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1907: removal of need for local authority licences for pleasure boats on waters owned or managed by British Waterways or the Environment Agency.

The timing of any reference to the Deregulation Committee will depend on the outcome of our consideration of the responses.

In addition, we have recently laid draft regulations under section 37 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 to remove 16 pieces of redundant health and safety legislation.

Going for Green Initiative

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the going for green initiative over the last 12 months; and what its targets are for the next 12 months. [2965]

Mr. Clappison: Going for Green Ltd. is a private company limited by guarantee, with the aim of promoting sustainable development to the public and helping to change everyday behaviour in a more sustainable direction. Since becoming a private company on 1 April 1996, Going for Green has secured private sector sponsorship of £360,000 in cash and an estimated £950,000 in benefits in kind. Its programme of work has included national publicity campaigns, the publication of a green code, the establishment of sustainable communities pilot projects, a study of waste minimisation and the development of ways of measuring the extent to which individuals' lifestyles are sustainable. This work is a fundamental part of the Government's strategy on sustainable development.

Targets for 1997–98 are currently under discussion with the Department in the context of the company's business plan for next year.

Sheffield Development Corporation

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when Sheffield development corporation will be wound up; and if he will make a statement. [3041]

Mr. Curry: Statutory orders will be laid before Parliament early next year to effect the wind up and dissolution of Sheffield development corporation. Subject to parliamentary approval, the corporation will cease to act from 1 April 1997, except for the purpose of preparing its final accounts and report and winding up its affairs. The corporation will be dissolved on 1 July 1997.

Urban development corporations were set up, with finite lifetimes, to regenerate their designated areas. Since designation on 30 June 1988 Sheffield development corporation has encouraged a grant-aided private sector development and undertaken substantial environmental and infrastructure improvements, which have helped to stimulate new jobs and new life in the city and to realise Sheffield's ambitions for a city airport.

By the end of its lifetime, the corporation expects to have reclaimed 259.2 hectares of land, created 521,100 sq m of commercial floorspace, built or improved 15 m of road, created 17,683 permanent jobs and attracted £695 million of private sector investment. The corporation has transformed the Lower Don valley area and Sheffield will continue to benefit well into the next century.

Environment Agency

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends formally to issue the guidance to the Environment Agency required under section 4 of the Environment Act 1995. [3171]

Mr. Gummer: A draft of the guidance which Ministers are required under section 4 of the Environment Act 1995 to give to the Environment Agency on its objectives, including the contribution it is to make towards the achievement of sustainable development, has been laid before the House for the required period of 40 sitting days. Together with my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, I am today formally issuing this guidance to the Environment Agency.

We are also formally issuing to the Environment Agency a management statement which summaries Ministers' aims and objectives for the agency, its duties, powers and responsibilities, and its relationship with Ministers, Government Departments and other bodies.

An explanatory document which restates the principles of sustainable development, provides non-statutory guidance on particular functions and offers a commentary on the agency's duty to take account of likely costs and benefits is also being provided to the agency.

Copies of these documents have been placed in the Library.

Health and Safety

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legal advice was received prior to the Single European Act 1986 as to the effect of the term "working environment, as regards the health and safety of workers" contained in article 118a; if a copy of the advice will be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [2978]

Sir Paul Beresford: By convention, any such legal advice to Government is treated as confidential and its substance is not normally disclosed.

TRANSPORT

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992 and are planned for the coming year, in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1904]

Mr. Bowis: The Department estimates that it will have undertaken or plans to undertake, a total of 181 information technology projects by the end of the year. In cost bands these are as follows:

£0–£1 million—167, £1–£2 million—3, £2–£3 million—2, £3–£4 million—4, £4–£5 million—3, £11–£12 million—1. £13–£14 million—1.

Some of these will have started in earlier years and some will last several years. So it is not possible to identify the actual costs for a specific year.

Rail Coaches

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of unserviceable passenger rail coaches that have been taken out of service in each of the last five years. [2198]

Mr. Watts: The information is no longer held by British Rail and is a matter for the rolling stock leasing companies.

Railway Stations

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many railway stations are planned to be (a) opened and (b) re-opened in the next two years by the franchise companies. [2040]

Mr. Watts: There are a number of proposed new stations which were the initiative of local authorities in agreement with British Rail train operating companies. These proposals are being continued by the franchisees.

Franchisees have their own longer-term initiatives to open new stations. The LTS rail franchisee, Prism Rail, intends to open a new station at West Ham by the end of 1999. The midland main line franchisee, National Express Group, is undertaking a feasibility study for a new east midlands Parkway station with the aim of completing building and development of the station during 2001.

Accident Reports (Leaks)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will discuss with the chairman of Railtrack the leaking of accident investigation reports before their agreed publication dates. [1874]

Mr. Watts: I deplore the premature and unauthorised release of accident investigation reports, and the use which is made of such leaks. The reports of internal railway joint inquiries are not normally published. This is a matter for the railway parties involved.

Rail Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will direct train operating companies to install and operate automatic train protection on all trains. [1870]

Mr. Watts: No. Automatic train protection would require changes to infrastructure as well as trains. Railtrack and train operators are pursuing a range of alternative measures to reduce risks arising from signals passed at danger, overspeeding the buffer stop collisions. The independent Health and Safety Commission advised that the introduction of ATP. as piloted, on a network-wide basis was not reasonably practicable, and that there were alternative safety investments which would be likely to yield greater effectiveness in terms of lives saved, and better value for money.

Sheffield Supertram

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what income has been generated by Sheffield Supertram since it became operational; and what steps have been taken to increase this income. [2392]

Mr. Watts: Management of South Yorkshire Supertram is a matter for the South Yorkshire passenger transport executive, which I understand has sought to increase what have hitherto been very disappointing levels of passenger carryings.

Speed Limits

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to encourage the use of 20 mph speed limits in urban areas. [2395]

Mr. Bowis: There are now around 300 20 mph zones in place. These have been very successful in reducing accidents. We have recently ring fenced £1 million of transport supplementary grant for the creation of additional zones in appropriate areas.

VHF Radio Service

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice he has issued to commercial and pleasure craft in respect of the phasing out of the VHF radio service. [2569]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of Marine Safety Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. Barry Field, dated 7 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your Question about the advice which has been issued to commercial and pleasure craft in respect of the phasing out of VHF radio services.

There are no plans to phase out the use of Channel 16 in the UK in the foreseeable future. The UK is however keen to promote the voluntary adoption by non-SOLAS vessels of Global Maritime Distress and Safety Systems (GMDSS) principles and the use of automated distress calling. Further information on what is involved is contained in a Marine Safety Agency (MSA) leaflet entitled GMDSS: Radio of the Next Century which has been available for some time. The MSA is also active in promoting the positive benefits of GMDSS at boat shows and other similar commercial events around the country.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with commercial fishermen about phasing out VHF radio services. [2574]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of Marine Safety Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. Barry Field, dated 7 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your Question on the discussions that have taken place with commercial fishermen about phasing out VHF radio services.

The fishermen's organisations are aware that the UK is committed to the continued use of Channel 16. HM Coastguard will maintain a listening watch on Channel 16 for as long as necessary after 1 February 1999 and all SOLAS Convention ships in the UK Search and Rescue Area are encouraged to continue to maintain watch on Channel 16 where possible for as long as necessary. Internationally, the UK in conjunction with other European administrations, will seek agreement at the next World Radio Conference in 1997 to Channel 16 remaining a calling frequency for non-SOLAS vessels.

Rail Accidents

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the occasions when rolling stock operated by private freight companies have been involved in accidents on the west coast main line; [1437]

(2) if he will list those railway accidents occurring on (a) the west coast main line, (b) the east coast main line and (c) London rail routes since privatisation. [1444]

Mr. Watts: The information requested is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Digital Selcall

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he expects the new tender for digital selcall to be published; [2570]

(2) what plans he has to re-equip Her Majesty's Coastguard with digital selcall equipment; and when VHF will be phased out; [2572]

(3) how many vessels in the United Kingdom rely on VHF radio for emergency purposes; and what transitional arrangements he intends to introduce for digital selcall; [2575]

(4) what discussions he has had with the Royal National Lifeboat Institution about digital selcall for emergency use. [2573]

Mr. Bowis: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard Agency to write to, my hon. friend.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. Barry Field, dated 7 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the introduction of Digital Selcall, how it affects the use of VHF and our consultations with the RNLI on this subject.

The Agency awarded a contract for Digital Selcall, more properly known as VHF Digital Selective Calling (VHF (DSC)), to GEC-Marconi Communications Ltd. on 3 October to supply and fit equipment at 105 sites around the UK coastline. Her Majesty's Coastguard will begin to be equipped with VHF (DSC) from mid-January with the aim of completing in February 1999 to coincide with the start date for full implementation of the Global Maritime Distress and Safety System (GMDSS), of which VHF (DSC) forms a part. On 1 February 1999 GMDSS will become a requirement for all SOLAS Convention vessels over 300 Tonnes.

As VHF radio, in particular the VHF Distress Channel 16, is essential for the voice response to VHF (DSC) digital alerts, there are no plans to phase it out.

The total number of UK vessels with VHF licences is over 51,000 of which nearly 48,000 are pleasure vessels. Vessels which do not come under GMDSS legislation are not required to fit VHF (DSC). HM Coastguard is particularly anxious that non-compatibility of distress frequencies should not constitute a risk to the safety of non SOLAS Convention vessels which do not install VHF (DSC) equipment, and Ministers have already given a commitment not only to ensure that HM Coastguard maintains a listening watch on Channel 16 post 1 February 1999, but also that all SOLAS Convention ships in the UK search and rescue area should be encouraged to maintain watch on channel 16 where possible for as long as necessary. In addition to that the Coastguard Agency together with the Marine Safety Agency are presently pushing for agreement by the International Maritime Organisation and the World Radio Conference that channel 16 should continue to be monitored and used as a calling frequency for some time after 1 February 1999.

Although RNLI lifeboats are not subject to SOLAS, the requirements for GMDSS have been discussed at liaison meetings between the Coastguard Agency and the RNLI. I understand that all the RNLI's All Weather Lifeboats will be fitted with both VHF and M/F DSC equipment. The existing distress frequencies distress frequencies will continue to be used as they are at present for distress communications. Communications between RNLI lifeboats and HM Coastguard will not be affected by the introduction of the GMDSS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

State Opening (Costs)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what was the total cost to the House of the state opening of parliament. [2806]

Sir Raymond Powell: The total cost of the state opening of Parliament on 23 October has not yet been calculated, but some £24,000 has been set aside by the House for this purpose.

Line of Route Visitors

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what plans he has to improve facilities for Line of Route visitors with specific reference to a cafeteria facility, improved toilets and facilities to shelter visitors when queuing in unfavourable weather. [2945]

Sir Raymond Powell: On 12 July 1994, the House approved the first report of Session 1992–93 from the Catering Committee which recommended that the area currently occupied by the Westminster Hall cafeteria should be converted into a visitor centre to include appropriate toilet facilities. This recommendation cannot be implemented until the opening of the new cafeteria in phase 2 of the new parliamentary building. There are no plans to improve the facilities to shelter visitors queuing in unfavourable weather which have been provided within the Sovereign's Entrance since 1990.

Palace of Westminster (Wheelchair Access)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee (1) what plans he has to provide facilities that will allow access to wheelchair-bound hon. Members to all relevant areas of the Palace of Westminster with specific reference to the Chamber of the Commons; [2943]

(2) what plans he has to improve facilities to allow access to wheelchair-bound visitors to the Line of Route, Terrace, dining and Committee rooms; [2944]

(3) what plans he has to provide facilities that will allow access to wheelchair-bound civil servants to all relevant areas of the Commons with specific reference to the Officials' Box in the Chamber. [2946]

Sir Raymond Powell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 8 February 1995, Official Report, columns 243–45, which describes in detail the conclusions of the review by the Accommodation and Works Committee of access to the House for disabled people. Since then, the Parliamentary Works Directorate has implemented the approved improvements. These improvements enable hon. Members and civil servants who are wheelchair users to access relevant areas of the Palace of Westminster, including the Chamber of the Commons and visitors who are wheelchair users to access the Line of Route, the Terrace, and the dining and Committee rooms. There are no plans currently to make the Officials' Box in the Chamber accessible to wheelchair users. In the event that a wheelchair-using civil servant was required to support a Minister, it is envisaged that he or she would be able to do so from the area adjacent to the Officials' Box. However, a handrail has been fixed in the Officials' Box to assist persons with disabilities.

Palace of Westminster (Works)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, columns 220–21, what were the (a) objectives and (b) costs of the work to restore (i) the two fresco paintings off Central Lobby, (ii) the fresco painting in the House of Lords Chamber and (iii) the 35 oil paintings. [2926]

Sir Raymond Powell: The work was to conserve, restore and maintain the value of works of art. The cost to the House was approximately £30,000. The total cost of some £50,000 was shared with the House of Lords on a 60:40 basis.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, columns 220–21, what were the (a) objectives and (b) costs of the work on the second phase of overhaul of the Carriage Gates. [2905]

Sir Raymond Powell: The work on the second phase of the overhaul of the Carriage Gates was necessary to maintain the gate mechanism for security and for stonework and metalwork restoration. The cost to the House was approximately £29,400. The total cost of some £49,000 was shared with the House of Lords on a 60:40 basis.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Work Committee, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, columns 220–21, what are the expected final costs of the full parliamentary data and video network cabling at (a) Star Chamber Court block, (b) Norman Shaw North floors 1 and 2, (c) House of Lords west front ground and first floors and (d) 1 The Abbey Garden. [2900]

Sir Raymond Powell: The expected final cost of this year's PDVN cabling work is as follows: (a) Star Chamber Court block and (c) House of Lords west front approximately £1.6 million—shared with the House of Lords on a 60:40 basis, cost to the House £960,000, (b) Norman Shaw North floors 1 and 2 (£300,000), and (d) 1 The Abbey Garden is administered by the House of Lords, for which I have no responsibility.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, columns 220–21, what proportion of the total spending was in areas and facilities used by (a) hon. Members, (b) House of Commons staff, (c) visitors, (d) disabled visitors and (e) disabled hon. Members, civil servants and staff. [2948]

Sir Raymond Powell: Since Members, staff and visitors share many areas of the parliamentary estate, it is not possible separately to identify the costs. During the last three years, considerable progress has been made on improving access to the parliamentary estate for disabled people. Depending upon the nature of an individual's disability, most of the spending in the summer of 1996 has been on facilities potentially available to people with disabilities.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, columns 220–22, what were the (i) objectives and (ii) total individual costs of the (a) reconstruction of the Members' Cafeteria, (b) reconstruction of the Strangers' Cafeteria, (c) repair work to the roof of the Lords Chamber, (d) repair work to the roof of the Royal Gallery, (e) full parliamentary data and video network cabling, (f) connection of all hon. Members' offices to colour televisions with clean feed from the Chamber, (g) new servery in the Members' Tea Room, (h) furniture restoration for the Members' Tea room, (i) renovation of the Speaker's outer office, (j) redecoration of the Churchill Room, (k) the refurbishment of the lavatories in (1) Upper Committee Corridor South, (2) opposite Committee Room 7 and (3) Commons Court block, second floor, and (l) refurbishment of the cash machines corridor; and if he will make a statement. [2947]

Sir Raymond Powell: The objectives forecast in-year costs relating to work in the House of Commons are as follows:

Project	Objective	In-year cost to the House £	In-year total cost' £

[2] PDVN cabling was also installed in areas administered by the House of Lords for which I have no responsibility

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Kenya

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on torture and human rights abuses in Kenya; and what is the Government's policy on this matter. [1632]

Dr. Liam Fox: We receive reports from a variety of sources about human rights, including torture, in Kenya. This issue forms part of our ongoing dialogue with the Kenyan authorities. We take every suitable opportunity to remind the Government of Kenya of their obligations and of our concerns on this subject.

Cameroon

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the British Government are making to the Government of Cameroon about the necessity of holding free and fair elections. [2657]

Dr. Liam Fox: Our high commissioner in Yaounde has stressed repeatedly to the Cameroonian Government the importance we attach to free and fair elections in Cameroon. My noble friend Baroness Challker outlined out concerns to the Cameroonian Deputy Foreign Minister during his visit to the United Kingdom in August and expressed our willingness to help Cameroon establish an independent electoral commission.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the process of registering voters in Cameroon. [2656]

Dr. Fox: Registration of voters in Cameroon takes place each year from 1 January to 30 April. This year the period was extended by three months to 31 July. The Ministry for Territorial Administration estimates that 60 to 80 per cent. of those registered for the municipal elections in January have now re-registered which represents between 30 and 40 per cent. of those eligible to vote.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the possibility of free and fair elections being held in Cameroon in 1997. [2655]

Dr. Fox: Cameroon's electoral code provides a framework for free and fair elections. We have made clear to the Cameroonian Government the importance we attach to the establishment of an independent electoral commission and offered to help, if necessary. In conjunction with a number of other donors, we are launching a training programme for 2,000 Cameroonian election observers in preparation for the next year's legislative and presidential elections.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Health and Safety

Mr. Byers: To ask the Attorney-General on what dates legal advice was given as to the effect of the term "working environment, as regards the health and safety of workers" contained in article 118a of the European Community treaty. [2979]

The Attorney-General: By convention, the fact of whether the Law Officers have advised on a given issue is not disclosed, nor is the substance of any advice which may have been given.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Young Offenders

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the average length of time between arrest and conviction for young offenders in 1994–95. [937]

Mr. Streeter: The exact information requested is not available although similar figures are recorded by the magistrates courts time intervals survey. This survey collects information on defendants in indictable, including triable either way, cases against whom proceedings are completed in three sample weeks a year—in February, June and October. The June survey also collects information about proceedings in summary cases. The period which corresponds most closely with that requested is charge to verdict, although it is not possible to separate those defendants who were found guilty from those whose cases were dismissed.

The average time from charge to verdict for defendants whose cases were dealt with by summary proceedings in the youth court, as reported by the surveys in the period

April 1994 to March 1995, was 84 days and 73 days for defendants charged with indictable and summary offences respectively. These figures include only defendants who were charged and not those who were summonsed. In addition, cases where proceedings did not progress as far as a verdict are excluded, for example, where charges were withdrawn.

Child Sex Abuse

Mr. Byers: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to extend the period in which actions can be brought under civil law by victims of child sex abuse. [2980]

Mr. Streeter: The Law Commission has undertaken a comprehensive review of the law of limitation periods with a view to its simplification and rationalisation, and the Government will consider the recommendations made when the Law Commission completes its report. We do not plan to modify the law relating to limitation of actions before then.

Obstetric Intervention Cases

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions in the last five years the Official Solicitor has appeared in cases involving applications for obstetric interventions without the consent of the patient, and (a) in how many of these he acted as (i) guardian ad litem and (ii) amicus curiae, (b) on how many occasions the application resulted in an order, (c) in how many the use of force was explicitly authorised by the court, (d) in how many cases the patient was detained under the Mental Health Act 1983 and (e) in how many cases the patient was under the age of 18 years. [1844]

Mr. Streeter: The Official Solicitor has appeared in four cases in the last five years involving applications for obstetric interventions—emergency caesarean sections—without the consent of the patient, (a) in two cases he has acted as guardian ad litem and two as amicus curiae; (b) in each case an order authorising a caesarean section was made; (c) in two cases the use of force was explicitly authorised by the court; (d) two of the patients were detained under the Mental Health Act 1983; (e) none of the patients was under the age of 18 years. In three of the cases an emergency caesarean was performed. In one case a normal vaginal delivery took place.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what guidance the president of the family division has issued to judges in the family division relating to applications for court orders for obstetric interventions without the consent of the patient. [1845]

Mr. Streeter: No guidance has been issued by the president of the family division on these matters. Every such application is to be considered by the judge concerned according to its merits.

Outstanding Fines

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) what amount of fines imposed by magistrates courts is currently outstanding; and what plans he has to allow magistrates courts to charge interest on outstanding fines; [2561]

(2) what is the percentage of fines transferred to magistrates courts by Crown court for collection which are outstanding. [2556]

Mr. Streeter: Separate figures for outstanding fines imposed by the Crown court and magistrates courts are not available. However, from returns made to my Department by magistrates courts I can say that the total outstanding in respect of fines imposed by the Crown court and magistrates courts was about £239 million at the end of the June quarter this year. I have no plans to allow magistrates courts to charge interest on outstanding fines.

Magistrates

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to give magistrates immunity from court action in respect of decisions taken by them in the discharge of their official duties. [2560]

Mr. Streeter: On 23 August 1996, the Lord Chancellor issued a consultation paper on this subject entitled, "Liability of Judicial Officers and others for Costs in Court Proceedings". Responses are requested by 29 November 1996. The matter will then be considered in light of representations made.

Mr. Field: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department against how many magistrates' benches legal action is currently outstanding. [2559]

Mr. Streeter: This information is not kept centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Courts and Legal Services Act

Ms Corston: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he plans to bring into effect section 13 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, in respect of (a) abolition of the £5,000 administration order limit, (b) abolition of the requirement for a county court judgment and (c) the three-year limitation period; and if he will make a statement. [2369]

Mr. Streeter: The delay in implementing section 13 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 is due to practical problems identified as likely to result from its operation. My Department has been seeking a way forward which avoids these problems, and this work will continue in the context of the changes to civil procedure recommended by Lord Woolf. In the meantime, a number of steps have already been taken to improve the operation of administration orders, including the introduction of guidance to court staff that the debts included in an application for such an order should be considered for composition by the district judge if the applicant cannot pay the outstanding debt within three years.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the rules and regulations he proposes to repeal or amend by means of a reference to the Deregulation Committee before the end of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [1407]

Mr. Hanley: This Department issues very few rules and regulations. We have no current plans to repeal or amend any rules or regulations by the end of 1996.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to support the establishment of an international criminal court at the United Nations; and if he will make a statement. [2982]

Dr. Liam Fox: This Department supports the establishment of an international criminal court to try certain of the most serious crimes of concern to the international community. Our support for the establishment of such a court is dependent, among other things, upon its being a court of last resort in cases where states are unable or unwilling to act. A court should be established only if it is generally accepted by the international community.

Asylum and Immigration Appeals

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in appointing a person, under section 10(3AA) of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, to monitor the refusals of entry clearance where there is no right of appeal by virtue of section 10(3A) of the Act. [3602]

Dr. Liam Fox: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has invited Dame Elizabeth Anson to serve a second three-year term as the independent monitor of entry clearance refusals when her current term expires on 30 November. I am pleased to report that Dame Elizabeth has agreed to do so.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many information technology projects at the Office of the Lord President of the Council have been undertaken since 1992 and are planned for the coming year, in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1902]

Mr. Newton: Actual and planned Privy Council Office expenditure on information technology in the years in question is as follows:

1992: £8,265
1993: £11,057
1994: £66,703
1995: £15,165
1996: £25,355.

These figures comprise the purchase cost of equipments, and the costs of training and maintenance. The equipments concerned are desk-top computers and printers. No specific projects can be separately identified. Figures for the three latest years include expenditure on items for the central drug co-ordination unit.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 November. [1093]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

This morning, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. My right hon. Friend has now departed for Bordeaux to attend the Anglo-French summit.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when papers relating to the World Trade Organisation review in Singapore in December will be placed in the Library; [2319]

(2) when Her Majesty's Government propose to produce a paper for the World Trade Organisation review. [2317]

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and I will shortly lay before Parliament a White Paper setting out the Government's approach to trade policy and its interaction with UK foreign policy.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade who will be representing Her Majesty's Government at the World Trade Organisation review to be held in Singapore in December. [2238]

Mr. Lang: I will lead the UK delegation to the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in December in Singapore.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what preparations have been made by Her Majesty's Government for the World Trade Organisation review to be held in Singapore in December. [2280]

Mr. Lang: The Government have made extensive preparations for the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Singapore on 9 to 13 December, in conjunction with the European Commission and other EU member states and in consultation with UK business, consumer and other interested organisations.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if her Majesty's Government are a signatory to the European policy paper for the World Trade Organisation review in December; and if he will make a statement. [2277]

Mr. Lang: The Government have discussed European policy towards the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in December in Singapore, in the Council of Ministers. The most recent discussion took place on 29 October when the Council agreed conclusions to serve as guidelines for the EU in preparation for the meeting.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and I will shortly lay before Parliament a White Paper setting out the Government's approach to trade policy and its interaction with UK foreign policy.

Fireworks

Mr. Snape: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from the Fire Brigades Union about the control and sale of fireworks; and if he will publish his reply. [2274]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I received a considered and detailed response from the Fire Brigades Union covering all the issues set out in my Department's discussion document. I have not responded to each organisation on the comments they submitted, but all the views and suggestions received will be given careful consideration.

Milkmen

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress is being made in the inquiry by the Office of Fair Trading into the preference by dairy companies for their own milk roundsman as opposed to an independent milkman. [2597]

Mr. John M. Taylor: This is a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading. I understand the hon. Member wrote to the DGFT on 8 August and that the deputy DGFT sent the hon. Member a holding reply on 28 August. In his letter, he informed the hon. Member that officials at the OFT were currently investigating this matter and that he would write to the hon. Member again when the investigating was complete. I understand that this remains the case.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the requirement on petrol retailers to advertise the price of petrol in litre units rather than gallons was introduced. [2664]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Petrol retailers have been required to display prices by reference to the litre since 1 October 1995, with the option of indicating the gallon-equivalent price alongside the price per litre.

Fossil Fuel Levy

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the income to be generated from the fossil fuel levy in each year from 1996 to 2005; and what estimates he has made of the proportion that will be spent in each of those years on (a) renewables, (b) Magnox, (c) British Nuclear Fuels plc, (d) administration and (e) other. [2666]

Mr. Page: The Director General of Electricity Supply normally calculates the expected income from the fossil fuel levy annually, with the intention that income in each year matches expenditure. In respect of renewables, premium payments to generators under the first and second non-fossil fuel orders currently amount to almost £100 million. These will cease when their contracts finish in 1998. Payments to generators under the third NFFO order will rise as their projects come on stream, as would payments to generators under the fourth NFFO order which we intend to lay in 1997 and the fifth NFFO order in 1998. The future cost is estimated for the UK as a whole as a maximum of £150 million a year, but the actual cost could be substantially less than this if renewables continue to make good progress in converging towards the market price for electricity. The nuclear NFFO contracts will end in March 1998. In respect of Magnox, I estimate that payments in 1996–97 will amount to £680 million—of which £310 million relates to the period before the privatisation of British Energy—and to £123 million in 1997–98. Annual payments to BNFL are likely to amount to £25 million in both 1996–97 and 1997–98. The annual cost of administration of the levy scheme remains fairly constant at £400,000. There is no other expenditure from the levy.

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to make further reductions in the fossil fuel levy. [2667]

Mr. Page: Responsibility for the calculation of the fossil fuel levy rests with the Director General of Electricity Supply. In July this year, the DGES announced that the levy rate would fall from 10 per cent. to 3.7 per cent. from 1 November 1996, and that he anticipated that it should be possible to maintain or reduce the rate from 1 April 1997.

Coal Mining

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people were employed in full-time equivalent terms in the coal mining industry in (a) 1992 and (b) 1996. [2665]

Mr. Page: Available information is as follows:

Employees in Great Britain

Mining and agglomeration of hard coal [1]

	Full-time	Part-time	Total
1991[2]	76,700	700	77,400
1993[2]	32,400	400	32,700
1995[3]	10,400	200	10,600

Financial Services Act 1986

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many criminal investigations have been undertaken since 1 January 1995 into alleged breaches of section 47 of the Financial Services Act 1986; and what (a) advice, (b) information and (c) assistance has been given by his officials to these investigations. [2632]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Since 1 January 1995, one criminal investigation into alleged breaches of section 47 of the Financial Services Act 1986 has been undertaken. That investigation is being carried out by investigation officers, who are my officials, under the supervision of lawyers of my Department.

Pennine Commercial Holdings

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the inspectors appointed to investigate the affairs of Pennine Commercial Holdings plc have completed their report; and when it will be published. [3407]

Mr. Lang: The inspectors, Elizabeth Appleby QC and Peter Foss FCA, signed their report on 26 July 1996, thus completing the final stage of a series of inquiries, which commenced in 1983, into a group of six connected companies all of which were subsequently put into liquidation.

By November 1989, the only report outstanding was that into Pennine. Although substantially complete, it remained unsigned until July, pending the outcome of appeals by individuals connected with Pennine against convictions on criminal charges relating to, among other things, the subject matter of the inspectors' inquiries.

While the Department's general practice has been to publish reports by inspectors into public quoted companies, as Pennine formerly was, the Secretary of State has concluded that, in this case, publication is not justified.

Limited Liability Partnerships Law (Jersey)

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take in response to the draft limited liability partnerships law in Jersey with particular reference to United Kingdom professional firms moving their nominal registration to Jersey. [3406]

Mr. Lang: I am well aware of the concerns of many within the professions about the possible consequences of the unlimited liability of partners in the modern commercial environment. In a big modern partnership advising on large commercial transactions it may be impossible for partners to know all other partners and their work—yet their personal assets can be put at risk by the actions of their partners. The Government are determined to maintain a competitive and up-to-date legal framework for business in the UK. We are aware of recent developments in partnership law in other jurisdictions such as the United States of America and Jersey, and responses to a recent consultation were strongly in favour of dealing with this issue. The Government therefore intend to bring forward legislation at the earliest opportunity to make limited liability partnership available to regulated professions in the UK, subject to appropriate safeguards to protect the interests of those doing business with the limited liability partnership. To keep a level playing field with companies and partnerships registered in the UK, limited liability partnerships registered abroad but operating from a place of business in the UK will be required to file financial information equivalent to that to be required from limited liability partnerships registered in this country. The Government will publish before Easter full and detailed proposals for legislation, for consultation with all interested parties.

Marketed Services (Productivity)

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the United Kingdom's average level of productivity in marketed services; and what are the equivalent levels in other OECD countries. [548]

Mr. Lang: There are no published figures for average levels of productivity in market services in the UK. There is some evidence that our productivity across market services is still roughly a third less than in the US, France and Germany, but, on average, the gap has narrowed since 1979.

Butte Mining

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what dates during 1993 and 1994 the then Minister for Corporate Affairs attended meetings to discuss whether disqualification proceedings should be taken against certain directors of Butte Mining arising from their conduct as directors of Butte Mining; and on what date the Minister decided that no proceedings should be brought. [2983]

Mr. Lang: It is not my Department's practice to comment on the affairs of individual companies.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992 and are planned for the coming year, in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1897]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested on IT projects undertaken by my Department since January 1992 is set out. Projects approved by the Department's next step agencies and funded from their budgets are not included. This information provided on projects below £200,000 and on planned projects is limited to that readily available from central records.

	Number approved	Number planned
Less than £200,000	141	7
£200,000–£1 million	7	3
£1 million–£2 million	4	1
£2 million–£3 million	2	2
£3 million–£4 million	1	0
£4 million–£5 million	2	0

£6 million–£7 million	0	0
£7 million–£8 million	0	0
£8 million–£9 million	2	0
£9 million–£10 million	0	0
Over £10 million	1	0

Privatised Utilities (Redundancies)

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many workers have been made unemployed by the privatised gas, water, electricity and telecoms utilities between April 1992 and April 1996; and what is the estimated cost to public funds. [2974]

Mr. John M. Taylor: This is a commercial matter for the companies concerned. There are long-term benefits to the whole economy from allowing resources, including labour, to move to more productive uses, and to the extent that redundant employees find alternative employment there would be benefits to public funds as well as to the economy.

British Energy

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last discussed matters with British Energy. [2977]

Mr. Page: Under the UK nuclear site licensing regime, nuclear operators must demonstrate the safety of nuclear installations to the satisfaction of the nuclear industry's independent regulator, the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate. Therefore, while Ministers might discuss, in general terms, safety issues with nuclear licensees such as British Energy, operational safety at nuclear installations is a matter for licencees in consultation with the regulator.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what guarantees British Energy has given that its proposal to shed jobs over the next three years will not affect safety standards. [2976]

Mr. Page: For British Energy, ensuring safety at its nuclear installations is an absolute prerequisite for its future business success. In announcing its proposals to reduce staff numbers as part of its aim of reducing costs and improving the overall efficiency of the company, British Energy made it clear that these staff reductions will in no way compromise the company's commitment to safety. The nuclear industry's independent regulator, the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate, is being fully consulted on the proposed changes and will need to be satisfied that the proposals remain consistent with arrangements for the management of safety within British Energy.

Alco-pop

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to ensure that alco-pop drinks are not marketed to under-18s. [1804]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government believe that self-regulation is the most effective way to control alcohol advertising. We welcome the responsible approach taken by the Portman Group and its members in drawing up a voluntary code of practice for the packaging, marketing and sale of alcoholic soft drinks in response to concerns about these drinks and their appeal to young people. There is, therefore, no need for action by Government in this area.

Competition Law

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of submissions received in 1996 by his Department on proposals for competition law reform were broadly in favour of (a) the incorporation of measures similar to article 85 of the treaty of Rome into United Kingdom law and (b) the introduction of a prohibition approach to anti-competitive agreements. [2245]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Responses were almost universally in favour of a prohibition approach to anti-competitive agreements following the broad framework of article 85, with a majority preferring that the prohibition set out in article 85(1) should be narrowed in scope along the lines suggested in the consultation document.

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress his Department has made since the publication of the Green Paper "Abuse of Market Power" in 1992; and if he will make a statement. [2244]

Mr. Taylor: The Government announced in April 1993 that they intended to strengthen the existing provisions in the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Competition Act 1980 to deal with abuse of market power A consultation document issued in March 1996, "Tackling Cartels and the Abuse Market Power—a consultation document", set out specific proposals on how the existing framework should be strengthened. Draft clauses which would give effect to the proposals to strengthen the fair trading and competition Acts were published in August 1996 as part of a draft competition Bill.

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the advantages of introducing a prohibition approach to United Kingdom competition law. [2248]

Mr. Taylor: The Government believe that their proposals to replace the present Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1977 with a prohibition of anti-competitive agreements will be a more efficient and effective way of dealing with the control of anti-competitive agreements.

On a prohibition of abuse of market, the Government remain of the view that no compelling case has been made in favour of a prohibition-based system for the economy at large. The difficulties of clearly defining abuse risk deterring genuinely competitive behaviour. The Government are, however, happy to promote further public debate on this matter.

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many submissions have been received to date following the publication of the consultation paper "Tackling Cartels and the Abuse of Market Power". [2246]

Mr. Taylor: My Department has published two consultation documents under this heading this year, the first a consultation document on the detailed policy options for implementing the Government's proposals, the second a document containing a draft Bill.

In response to the first document, we have received 109 submissions. In response to the second document, we have received 91 submissions to date.

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much departmental time was spent in preparation of the consultation paper "Tackling Cartels and the Abuse of Market Power." [2247]

Mr. Taylor: My Department has issued two consultation documents under this heading this year, the first a consultation document on the detailed policy options for implementing the Government's proposals, the second a document containing a draft Bill: 1.4 man years were spent in preparing the first document, 3.2 man years in preparing the second.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Rooney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what discussions took place at the Council of Ministers meeting on 25 October regarding the multi-fibre arrangement; [2987]

(2) what discussions he has had with the World Trade Organisation regarding the operation of the multi-fibre arrangement; [2986]

(3) what representations he has recently received regarding the operation of the multi-fibre arrangement. [2988]

Mr. Lang: My Department has been consulting the British textile and clothing industry, retailers, importers and consumers about the basis on which the European Union should implement stage 2 of the phase-out of the general agreement on tariffs and trade multi-fibre arrangement on 1 January 1998. The General Affairs Council has not yet considered the matter but is likely to take a decision on 25 November. Decisions on this sort by textile importing countries, including the EU, are a matter for them and are not up for negotiation at the ministerial meeting of the World Trade Organisation to be held in Singapore from 9 to 13 December.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each resolution repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages and disadvantages of each repeal. [1404]

Mr. Page: My Department currently proposes to repeal the following regulations by the end of 1996:

Trade Descriptions (Place of Production) (Marking) Order 1988;

The Rag Flock (Other Filling Materials) Act 1951;

The Rag Flock and Other Filling Materials Regulations 1981;

The Stand for Carry-Cot (Safety) Regulations 1966;

The Gas Catalytic Heaters (Safety) Regulations 1984;

The Asbestos Products (Safety) Regulations 1985;

The Asbestos Products (Safety) (Amendment) Regulations 1987; and

The Quotations Regulations 1989.

My Department currently proposes to repeal and replace the following regulations by the end of 1996:

The Sex Discrimination and Equal Pay (Remedies) Regulations 1993;

The Race Relations (Interest on Awards) Regulations 1994; and

The Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1995.

Since the effect in each case will be to reduce rather than increase, compliance costs, a compliance cost assessment is not required. Departments do, however, seek to estimate approximate savings wherever possible. The cost of undertaking a CCA varies from case to case, but it is generally modest. Because part of the cost falls on the businesses consulted, a full CCA would be inappropriate for measures designed to reduce business burdens. If, however, a replacement regulation would increase burdens, a CCA will be produced.

Television Decoders

Mr. Renton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to ensure that his television decoder to be used for digital satellite programmes is also available at fair and reasonable cost for digital terrestrial programmes. [2053]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 6 November 1996]: Regulations have been in place since 23 August this year, well in advance of any manufacturing agreements for decoders, which deal with the licensing of decoder technology. The regulations—1996/2185—provide that licensing of proprietary technology for conditional access to manufacturers of consumer equipment must be undertaken on fair, reasonable and non-discriminatory terms. Owners of such technology, when licensing one manufacturer, must therefore consider applications for additional licences from other manufacturers—perhaps acting on behalf of other broadcasters operating on other delivery systems—and must grant or refuse such applications on fair, reasonable and non-discriminatory terms. If a manufacturer or broadcaster believes he is being unfairly refused a licence, the regulations allow him to take immediate action in court against the owner of the technology.

Taken together, these will enable manufacturers to supply set-top boxes which either incorporate facilities for terrestrial and satellite reception, or to which such facilities could be added at a fair and reasonable cost, should they see a market for such receivers which is worth pursuing.

The regulations also prohibit the owner of the technology from dissuading a manufacturer from including additional conditional access technology or a common interface in the same decoder. A common interface allows for the attachment of additional conditional access components and other components of the digital decoder—for example, a receiver for another deliver mechanism such as digital terrestrial.

The Government do not intend to impose requirements which will increase the cost of set-top boxes, the equipment which will be used to decode digital television signals, by mandating the inclusion of facilities which consumers may not wish to use. However, the European standards for digital television are designed to assist manufacturers who wish to produce receivers capable of receiving and decoding both satellite and terrestrial signals, or to which additional reception capabilities can be added.

In due course, conditional access systems are likely to be integrated in the television set, the manufacturers of which will seek to provide access to a wide range of broadcasters.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Learning Credits

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to introduce learning credits for 16 to 19-year-old students. [2207]

Mr. Paice: The Government propose to bring together, into a single entitlement to learning expressed in the form of a credit, their existing guarantee of training and the statutory duty of the Further Education Funding Council to secure sufficient and adequate education for young people. All young people would be issued with a learning credit as they complete their compulsory education. Learning credits, which would not be cash based, would build on the best of youth credits arrangements already operated by training and enterprise councils. Careers services, working closely with providers, would have an important role in issuing the credit as part of the information and guidance they provide to all young people.

The Government believe that the learning credits approach, taken together with the work proposed to secure greater convergence of post-16 funding arrangements, would further strengthen the choices young people make and the responsiveness of providers to them. They intend to consult on learning credits in December, with a view to their phased introduction from 1997.

Drug and Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what financial provision is being made to (a) the local education authority and (b) voluntary organisations in the county of Durham to increase awareness of drug and alcohol-related problems. [2406]

Mrs. Gillan: Under the grants for education support and training programme for 1996–97, £67,450 has been made available to Durham LEA in support of in-service training of teachers whose responsibilities include drug education in schools; and £14,000 in support of training for youth and community workers in raising their awareness of and developing skills for dealing with young people at risk from, or in the early stages of, drug abuse.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many school absences of pupils have been related to drug and alcohol abuse in the county of Durham since 1992. [2407]

Mrs. Gillan: This information is not collected centrally. Information on levels of authorised and unauthorised absence is collected annually in respect of all day pupils of compulsory school age, but schools are not required to break their absence totals down by cause of absence.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many school children in the county of Durham have received treatment and counselling for alcohol dependency since 1992. [2408]

Mr. Burns: I have been asked to reply.

This information is not available centrally.

Physics Examinations

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of students sitting the A-level examination in physics obtained passes at A, B and C grades (a) in 1976 and (b) in 1996. [2438]

Mrs. Gillan: The percentage of students obtaining passes at grades A, B and C in GCE A-level physics syllabuses examined in 1976 were 9.5 per cent., 13.3 per cent. and 12.5 per cent. respectively. The corresponding figures for the syllabuses examined in 1996 were 20.6 per cent., 19.1 per cent. and 17.9 per cent.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if she will calculate the number of questions, accounting for what percentage of the marks, a candidate prepared for the 1976 A-level examination in physics could have answered in the 1996 examination; [2435]

(2) if she will calculate the number of questions, accounting for what percentage of marks, a candidate prepared for the 1976 0-level examination in physics could have answered in the 1996 GCSE examination; [2436]

(3) if she will calculate the number of questions, accounting for what percentage of marks, a candidate prepared for the 1996 A-level examination in physics could have answered in the 1976 examination. [2437]

Mrs. Gillan: The examination boards have always offered a range of physics syllabus at GCE A-level, GCE 0-level and, since 1986, GCSE. It is therefore not possible to calculate the precise number of questions common to physics examinations in 1976 and 1996.

European Structural Fund

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how much money has been withheld from the United Kingdom by the European Commission as a result of the Government's decision not to participate in objective 4 of the European structural fund (a) as a percentage of the total United Kingdom allocation and (b) in pounds sterling for the period 1994 to 1996; [2403]

(2) what sum has been withheld from (a) the west midlands region and (b) the city of Birmingham by the European Commission as a result of the Government's decision not to participate in objective 4 of the European structural funds (i) as a percentage of the total United Kingdom allocation and (ii) in pounds sterling for the period 1994 to 1996. [2405]

Mr. Paice: Some 3,377 million ecu are available for spending in Great Britain under objectives 3 and 4 of the structural funds between 1994 and 1999. The objective 3 plan for 1994 to 1996 period, which was agreed with the European Commission, provided for 1,501 million of that money to be spent in the UK. The remaining 1,876 million ecu are available for spending in Great Britain under objectives 3 and 4 of the structural funds between 1997 and 1999. The plans for spending that money are currently being negotiated.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what sums her Department estimates will be withheld from the United Kingdom European Commission as a result of the Government's decision not to participate in objective 4 of the European structural fund (a) as a percentage of the total United Kingdom by the allocation and (b) in pounds sterling for 1997 to 1999. [2404]

Mr. Paice: There is no reason to believe that any sums will be withheld by the European Commission for 1997 to 1999. Officials are currently negotiating plans with the Commission for the combined budget for objective 3 and 4 between 1997 and 1999.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what factors underlay her Department's decision not to participate in objective 4 of the European structural fund, and what plans she has to review her policy. [2398]

Mr. Paice: We preferred to spend the joint budget for objective 3 and 4 on help for unemployed people. Officials are currently negotiating the use of the budget for 1997 to 1999 with the European Commission.

Medical Pay Awards

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to make an announcement on the alignment of academic medical pay awards this year with medical pay awards generally within the NHS; and if she will make a statement. [2662]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend holds to the view that academic medical pay awards should generally be aligned with NHS medical pay awards, settled following the Doctors and Dentists Remuneration Review Body recommendations, but it is for university and college employers to set pay levels.

Barnsley and Doncaster Training and Education Council

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps her Department is taking to encourage partnerships between Barnsley and Doncaster TEC and the local employment service. [2677]

Mr. Paice: Barnsley and Doncaster TEC has in place a joint statement of arrangement with the two local Employment Service district offices in its area, for liaison and co-operation. This results in regular meetings between the TEC, Employment Service district managers and lead suppliers to discuss and take forward operational matters.

The statement of arrangement has been strengthened this year by the addition of specific targets for training for work referrals and starts; and arrangements for joint monitoring of performance.

Testing

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment (a) she and (b) bodies receiving public funds, have made of the impact of the joint requirements of the national curriculum and key stage testing on the ability of school staff and heads to order the manner of individual and corporate learning most likely to attain the objectives set out by The national forum for values. [2694]

Mrs. Gillan: None. Such assessment would be premature, given that the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority has only just started consulting on the recommendations of its national forum for values in Education and the Community.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992 and are planned for the coming year, in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1905]

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of information technology projects undertaken since 1992 is:

Cost band	Financial Years
	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	Total
£0–£1 million	68	43	61	71	81	324
£1–£2 million	—	—	—	1	1	2
£2–£3 million	1	—	1	—	—	2
£3–£4 million	1	1	—	—	—	2
£4–£11 million	—	—	—	—	—	—
£11–£12 million	1	—	—	—	—	1

The project numbers for 1996–97 include those planned and started. Further projects will be added for the coming year after the annual round of consultations with customers.

Sponsor Governors

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the functions and purpose of proposed sponsor governors for county and controlled schools; under what circumstances she would expect to use her proposed powers of direction; and what financial arrangements she would expect to be agreed prior to her decision to make a directive. [2693]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department proposes to enable county, voluntary-controlled and special agreement secondary schools have to have sponsor governors. This will help such schools strengthen their links with the business world and enable sponsors to take part in governance to the mutual benefit of school and sponsor. Similar arrangements exist for grant-maintained and voluntary-aided schools. We would expect a direction to be made only after a request by the governing body of a school designated as a specialist school to change its instrument of government to include sponsor governors. No financial arrangements would need to be agreed prior to a decision to make a directive.

Competitive Admissions

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment who will be responsible for (a) deciding on the criteria of tests used, (b) conducting the tests or examinations and (c) establishing arrangements for external adjudicators for a maintained school which has received approval to obtain its annual entry by means of a competitive admissions policy.[2695]

Mr. Robin Squire: The admission arrangements of a selective or partially selective school are, and will continue to be, the responsibility of the relevant school admission authority: the local education authority in the case of a county or controlled school and the governing body in the case of a voluntary-aided, special agreement or grant-maintained school.

Education Bill

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will send a copy of the Education Bill to each primary and secondary maintained school head teacher in England and Wales, together with a letter requesting them to report in respect of (a) each clause, (b) each group of clauses and (c) related schedules, (i) any problems they foresee in their implementation and (ii) any likely consequential effects. [2696]

Mr. Forth: No. Many of the proposals in the Bill have already been the subject of widespread consultation and we doubt whether head teachers would welcome such a request.

Disabled Pupils

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimates she has made of the resources available to each local education authority to provide (a) extra facilities, (b) extra teachers and (c) extra funds, over those allocated under local management of schools formulae, to be devoted to meeting the special behavioural and scholastic needs of pupils in mainstream (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools, not being schools already wholly devoted to the needs of pupils with innate disabilities. [2697]

Mr. Robin Squire: It is for the LEAs to decide how to allocate the resources at their disposal, for which Government provision is made in the light of the full range of LEAs' responsibilities.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment from what source she expects the Funding Agency for Schools to obtain the costs of establishing a new grant–maintained school under powers granted to it. [2698]

Mr. Robin Squire: The capital costs that fall to the Funding Agency for Schools when it establishes a new grant–maintained school would have to be met from the capital resources available to the agency. The recoupment of recurrent costs from the local education authority in which a new GM school is situated will be considered case by case.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 4 November, Official Report, column 376, if borrowing by grant-maintained schools to expand their capacity by up to 50 per cent. by means of commercial borrowing or the private finance initiative, will be taken into account in their grant formula as distinct from the formulae used for schools of their category expanding their capacity. [2985]

Mr. Squire: It is for the Funding Agency for Schools to decide how the sums available for GM schools' capital are distributed among individual schools in the light of the priorities for GM capital spending.

Pupil Selection

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 4 November, Official Report, column 379, concerning the selection of pupils for secondary schools by aptitude or ability, what studies she has evaluated in respect of the indications of general academic ability at the age of 16 years which can be predicted by tests at the age of 11 years; who are the admissions authorities determining which tests are to be applied; and how many persons will be responsible for making these decisions. [2984]

Mr. Robin Squire: Research on value added in education consistently shows that prior attainment is the best single predictor of subsequent academic performance. Local education authorities and schools often compare the attainment of pupils entering secondary education with achievements at age 16, for management and other purposes. It is for the relevant school admission authority to decide if tests of aptitude or ability should form part of the admissions process.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 4 November, Official Report, columns 379-80, concerning the proposed duty of grant-maintained and non-grant-maintained secondary schools to consider annually the introduction of selective entry, what estimate she has made of the percentage of parents of primary school children who prefer selective admission arrangements for secondary schools; and what sample polls she has conducted concerning such preferences. [2993]

Mr. Squire: A survey carried out for the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, published on 22 January 1996, found that half those parents surveyed favoured selective education. Existing selective schools are popular with parents and many are significantly oversubscribed.

Secondary Schools

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her oral statement of 29 October, Official Report, column 471, concerning the successful co-existence of selective and comprehensive secondary schools, if she will list those local education authorities in whose areas such co-existence exists without prejudicing the standard of education of secondary school pupils. [2994]

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend was referring to comments made by the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) about educational standards in areas with both wholly selective and non-selective schools. In the majority of such areas the proportion of children receiving five or more GCSE grades A* to C is higher than the national average.

Minority Languages

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice is issued by her Department to examination boards on the range of minority languages to be offered at A-level. [2989]

Mrs. Gillan: None.

Selective Education

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will take steps to ascertain the views of parents of children under the age of 11 years on proposals to introduce a system of selective education within the areas of those local education authorities where no such system currently exists in the maintained sector of secondary education. [2992]

Mr. Robin Squire: Governing bodies are best placed to assess local parental demand for the introduction or extension of selection in their schools. The Education Bill proposes that they should be required to consider the issue annually.

Bengali

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received regarding the availability of Bengali as an A-level subject. [2991]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend has received letters about the availability of Bengali as an A-level subject from the hon. Members for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which examination boards currently offer Bengali as an A-level subject. [2990]

Mrs. Gillan: The Northern examination and assessment board currently offers Bengali at GCE A-level.

Personal Services

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many jobs in the personal services industry, with special reference to male escort agencies, are classed as vacancies at jobcentres; and if she will break down the information by region; [2915]

(2) into what classification the Employment Service places jobs in the personal services industry, with special reference to jobs in male escort agencies and editing adult magazines; [2916]

(3) what guidelines are issued to jobcentre staff in respect of training advice on personal safety to female jobseekers who have been recommended to apply for jobs in the personal services industry, with special reference to work for escort agencies and adult magazines; [2918]

(4) if a jobseeker is entitled to refuse to attend an interview for work in the personal services industry without putting their benefit at risk. [2917]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mrs. Helen Jackson dated 7 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to write to you direct about your questions of 4 November concerning vacancies in the personal services industry advertised in Jobcentres. This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

The information you requested on the number of jobs in the personal services industry which are classed as vacancies is not available and the Employment Service does not collect specific information on the number of vacancies with male escort agencies.

The Employment Service does not classify vacancies as being in the personal services industry. All vacancies are classed according to the occupation.

All Jobcentres have guidance which gives points to check when considering the suitability of vacancies to ensure jobseekers are not put at risk. Jobcentres seek as much information as possible about the job, its location, whether the duties or hours are different from those normally expected for the type of job and whether the arrangements for interview are outside normal working hours and away from the work premises. For vacancies in the personal services sector special regard is paid to these factors.

In addition there is a leaflet available to jobseekers in all Jobcentres titled "Be Alert" which describes the steps to take to ensure personal safety when seeking work from an employer.

Guidance issued to Jobcentres state that if they are notified of vacancies which require models, offer employment in sauna baths, massage parlours, escort and kissogram agencies, or other personal/telephone services special regard should be paid to the reputation of the employer. Details are sought of establishment and conditions of training and employment, whether the hours of work or the location or interview arrangements give cause for concern and whether there is any indication of a lack of professional standards. Jobcentres are advised that where any concerns arise around the above issues that such vacancies should be treated with caution and in any cases of doubt they should refuse to handle the vacancies.

The Jobseeker's Act provides that jobseekers may be sanctioned for refusing or failing to apply for, or refusing or failing to accept a job notified to them by an officer of the Employment Service. Guidance to people in local offices emphasises that any vacancies offered to the jobseeker must be those which they are table to undertake. It would not be in either the jobseeker's or the employer's interests to submit jobseekers to vacancies for which they were unsuitable.

Jobseekers are told at the time they are made aware of a suitable vacancy that refusal or failure to apply for the job, or subsequent non-acceptance of the job offered, may result in loss of Jobseeker's Allowance. This ensures that the jobseeker can make their decision in the full knowledge of the consequences.

If the jobseeker subsequently refuses to apply for, or accept, a suitable job the case will be sent to an independent adjudication officer to determine whether the jobseeker had good cause for their refusal. The adjudication officer will examine the suitability of the job offered and the jobseekers reasons for refusal. In addition where the jobseeker refused the vacancy due to any sincerely held religious or conscientious objection this would constitute good cause.

I hope this is helpful in clarifying the position.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (i) head teachers, (ii) deputy head teachers and (iii) teachers took early retirement on the grounds of ill health (a) in total and (b) in each local education authority in the financial year 1995–96; and if she will make a statement. [2970]

Mrs. Gillan: The following table shows the numbers of teachers in service at 31 March 1995 who were awarded ill-health retirement in the financial year 1995–96. The table covers the maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special education sector in England.

Disability Discrimination Act 1995

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she proposes to make regulations under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in respect of the questions procedure. [3499]

Mrs. Gillan: We have today laid regulations under section 56 of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. These regulations will provide someone, the complainant, who believes he or she may have been discriminated against under the Act's employment provisions with a questionnaire to ask questions of the person believed to have discriminated, the respondent. The regulations also provide for a form with which the respondent can reply. These forms will be included in a booklet together with guidance on how to complete them. The booklet will be available free of charge from jobcentres, citizens advice bureaux and the DDA information line and can be provided in Braille and audio cassette format. The procedure will assist the complainant in deciding whether or not to start proceedings and, if proceedings are started, in formulating and presenting a case in the most effective manner.

International Labour Conference

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has for publishing the White Paper on the instruments adopted at the 82nd session of the International Labour Conference 1995. [3500]

Mr. Paice: My right hon. Friend has today published the White Paper entitled "International Labour Conference" which gives details of the instruments adopted at the 82nd session of the International Labour Conference 1995 and sets out the Government's intentions in relation to these new instruments.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992 and are planned for the coming year, in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1903]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage has undertaken 23 information technology projects since 1992 and seven are planned for 1996–97. All these projects fall into the cost band £0 to £1,000,000.

British Museum

Sir Patrick Cormack: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what additional resources she plans to make available to the British museum to compensate for the sum paid by the British library as a contribution to the running costs of the Bloomsbury site. [2805]

Mr. Sproat: The Government have already provided some additional resources to the British museum. In November 1993, the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), announced that the Government would provide the British museum with an additional £1 million per annum from 1996–97 onwards, in recognition of the consequences of the departure of the British library from Bloomsbury.

The Government are considering the museum's case for funding most carefully. Grant in aid allocations will be announced immediately after the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what regulations her Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if she proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages or disadvantages of each repeal. [2912]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage does not plan any repeals before the end of 1996. When regulations are identified for repeal, the effect is to reduce rather than increase compliance costs. Therefore, although we seek to identify approximate savings where possible, a compliance cost assessment is not required. Because part of the cost falls on the businesses consulted, a full CCA is not appropriate either for measures designed to reduce business burdens.

HEALTH

Homelessness

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the primary care projects in England to help homeless people funded by his Department. [1033]

Mr. Burns: The Department has funded 35 primary health care projects in England to help homeless people to access the health care services that they need. These projects are listed in the following table. Main funding for the 35 schemes finished by 31 March 1996 but the Department still monitors the schemes and continues to make available non cash-limited funding for general practitioner sessions for 26 projects.

Trust Mergers

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice he gave to Wakefield district health authority in relation to the process of public consultation concerning NHS trust mergers; [1822]

(2) what is the current position in respect of the proposed merger of national health service hospital trusts in the Wakefield district; [1815]

(3) When the decision was taken to transfer the conduct of the Wakefield NHS trust merger consultation from the project team to the district health authority; and what advice was offered by his Department at that time. [1813]

Mr. Horam: Pontefract Hospitals national health service trust and Pinderfields Hospital national health service trust have conducted public consultation on their proposed merger. On 7 October, the NHS executive asked Wakefield health authority to undertake a further period of statutory consultation with Pontefract and District community health council, Wakefield community health council, and staff interests at both the trusts on proposals contained in the document "An Application for National Health Service Trust Status".

This further period of statutory consultation will end on 17 February 1997.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on the aborted initial consultation process about the merger of NHS trusts in the Wakefield district. [1814]

Mr. Horam: All responses to the consultation undertaken by the project team acting for Pontefract Hospitals national health service trust and Pinderfields Hospital national health service trust will be passed to the NHS executive for consideration, together with responses to the further statutory consultation.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of the consultants appointed to undertake a review of the role and function of community health councils. [2660]

Mr. Horam: Insight management consultants were commissioned by the national health service executive to consider a resource allocation system and performance management framework for community health councils. The cost of this work will be approximately £80,000.

Medication

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the average (a) number of types and (b) quantity of preparations taken by people in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years broken down by (a) gender and (b) age bands of 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [2883]

Mr. Malone: No estimate has been made.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will announce changes in membership of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of the quinquennial review of the authority. [3433]

Mr. Horam: I am pleased to announce that the following have been appointed members of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority for three years from today:

Dr. Gulum Bahadur, clinical biochemist at the University College and Middlesex school of medicine;

Dr. Ruth Chambers, general practitioner and senior lecturer at the centre for primary health care, University of Keele; and fellow of the Royal College of General Practitioners;

Professor Christine Gosden, professor of medical genetics, University of Liverpool, at Liverpool women's hospital;

Professor Stuart Lewis, professor of psychology applied to medicine in the School of Clinical Medicine at Queen's university, Belfast.

There is one further vacancy and I expect to announce an appointment shortly to bring the number of members up to 21, including the chairman.

In all, 15 members of the authority completed their terms this year. Ten members have been re-appointed, for terms varying between one and three years in order to avoid a large number of members completing their period of tenure at the same time:

	Term
Diana Lady Brittan (deputy chairman)	1 year
Ms Liz Forgan	2 years
Most Reverend Richard Holloway	1 year
Professor Martin Johnson	3 years
Mr. Richard Jones	2 years 3 months
Dr. Brian Lieberman	3 years
Ms Angela Mays	1 year
Dr. Anne McLaren	2 years
Julia Lady Tugendhat	3 years
Mr. John Williams	2 years 3 months

These appointments were all made in accordance with guidance issued by the Commissioner for Public Appointments following the first report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life—the Nolan report Cm 2850-1, May 1995.

The members have been selected on the basis of their experience and personal qualities. They have been chosen so as to ensure that the authority is informed by views and experience across a wide range of relevant disciplines.

I am very grateful to Professor Robert Berry, Ms Joan Harbison, Professor Stephen Hillier, and Ms Penelope Keith who are retiring, having served with the authority since its inception in 1990.

In common with all executive non-departmental public bodies, the HFEA is subject to a review every five years. The first such review of the HFEA, carried out by Mr. M. G. Lillywhite, has been completed. I have placed a copy of the report to United Kingdom Health Ministers in the Library.

The review concluded that the case for an independent statutory body in the field of human fertilisation and embryology remains valid and that there is no other body which might perform the function of the HFEA more effectively. Mr. Lillywhite made 12 recommendations, which we have accepted and for which the HFEA has agreed an implementation plan. In particular, the authority's management statement, which I placed in the Library, announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan Smith) on 24 July 1996 at column 524, provides for the production of annual business plans and corporate plan. We shall also be holding the authority to account in future through an annual accountability review.

We are very grateful to Mr. Lillywhite for his thorough report. I reaffirm my appreciation of the work undertaken by the HFEA in line with its responsibilities under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

Alco-pop Drinks

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultation he has had with the President of the Board of Trade on the regulation of the advertising of alco-pop drinks to ensure that it is not directed at people aged under 18 years. [1802]

Mr. Burns: Although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not directly consulted with my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on this issue, the Government share the concern that has been expressed about the potential appeal of these drinks to young people. We very much welcome the industry's efforts to self-regulate through the Portman Group's code of practice for the packaging, marketing and sale of such drinks. However, the Government will continue to monitor the industry's response closely. The industry must demonstrate to the satisfaction of the public that it can regulate itself effectively.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been carried out to ascertain whether there is a relationship between under-age drinking and alco-pop drinks. [1801]

Mr. Burns: We are aware of several recent surveys which have been reported in the national press. The Health Education Authority will also be publishing before the end of the year some research they have commissioned on young people and alcohol.

The Department of Health regularly researches teenage drinking behaviour by adding questions to the biennial survey of smoking among 11 to 15-year-olds. Results of the 1996 survey should be available by Easter 1997.

Alcohol (Young People)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has carried out since 1990 into the relationship between alcohol and depression amongst young people. [1788]

Mr. Burns: As our report, "Sensible Drinking", 1995, recognised, only extremely heavy drinking—in excess of 80g—10 units—a day—over long periods of time is likely to cause conditions such as clinical depression. There is no evidence from the most recent survey of adolescent drinking, the Office of Population Censuses and Survey's "Teenage Drinking in 1994", which looked at alcohol consumption of 11 to 15-year-olds, that any of them were drinking alcohol at levels likely to lead in the short term to psychiatric disorders.

Alcohol-related Illness

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many alcohol-related deaths there have been (a) nationally, (b) in the west midlands and (c) in Coventry in each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change from the previous year in each case; [1781]

(2) how many young people experienced alcohol-related problems (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands for each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change from the previous year in each case; [1786]

(3) what research has been carried out to determine how much alcohol-related illnesses and accidents costs the NHS each year. [1790]

Mr. Burns: There is no accepted definition of the term "alcohol-related".

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to assist general practitioners in detecting and treating patients suffering from alcohol-related illness. [1782]

Mr. Burns: We are currently considering what support we might give to purchasers of treatment and care for people with alcohol misuse problems. This would include general practitioners involved in the purchasing and planning of such services. We aim to produce, by next summer, guidance equivalent to the guidance we issued this year to purchasers of services for drug misusers.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase awareness among school children of alcohol-related problems. [1787]

Mr. Burns: Later in the year, the Health Education Authority will be launching a campaign targeted at young people with a particular focus on the short term risks of intoxication. This follows up recommendations in our report "Sensible Drinking", 1995. However, the national curriculum already requires that pupils are taught about alcohol, including the effects of misuse on health.

Alcohol Support Groups

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding alcohol support groups (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands, have received in each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change from the previous year in each case. [1783]

Mr. Burns: This information is not available centrally. Purchasing alcohol services is primarily the responsibility of local authorities in accordance with the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the funding of alcohol support (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands for the coming year. [1784]

Mr. Burns: Purchasing alcohol services is primarily the responsibility of local authorities in accordance with the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. It is for them to agree funding in the light of local priorities.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much public money was provided in (a) Holland, (b) France, (c) Germany and (d) Belgium to alcohol support groups in the most recent year for which statistics are available. [1785]

Mr. Burns: Comparable information is not collated centrally.

All but three of the projects costing over £1,000,000 are projects controlled by the NHS Executive.

Free Spectacles

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received in the last six months regarding the provision of free NHS spectacles for younger children; and what plans he has to improve the availability and range of such spectacles. [2700]

Mr. Malone: All children under 16 are entitled to national health service spectacle vouchers which their parents can use to buy a pair of spectacles outright or, alternatively, top-up to buy a more expensive pair. In the last six months I have received representations from two parents who elected to top-up the value of the voucher when buying their children spectacles.

Alcohol Abuse and Unemployment

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has carried out into the relationship between unemployment and alcohol abuse. [1810]

Mr. Burns: None.

Alcohol Dependency

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have received treatment for alcohol dependency (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change in each year. [1800]

Mr. Burns: The information available is given in the table.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1906]

Mr. Horam: The number of information technology projects undertaken since 1992 by the Department is:

	Number
£0 to £1,000,000	184
£1,000,000 to £2,000,000	7
£2,000,000 to £3,000,000	2
£3,000,000 to £4,000,000	2
£4,000,000 to £5,000,000	3

£19,000,000 to £20,000,000	1
£29,000,000 to £30,000,000	1

The number of new projects planned for the coming year is:

	Number
£0 to £1,000,000	33

All but three of the projects costing over £1 million are projects controlled by the NHS management executive.

Diabetics

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to issue free needles to diabetics; [2180]

(2) what is the cost to the NHS of providing a free needle for use by a diabetic; [2176]

(3) what criteria are used to determine those diabetics who are entitled to receive free needles. [2177]

Mr. Malone: People with diabetes mellitis who need to inject insulin can get free national health service prescriptions from their general practitioner. NHS prescriptions can currently be written both for glass insulin syringes and for the separate needles which fit them; also for disposable insulin syringes with attached needles. The cost to the NHS of a needle for the glass syringe which is intended for multiple use is 28p, and of a needle intended for single use is 2.2p. The cost of a disposable syringe with attached needle varies between 11.5p and 11.9p, depending on the size of the syringe.

We are considering the case for making the needles to fit insulin injection pens available on GP prescription under the NHS.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many diabetics there are (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands; how many there were in each year since 1990; how many require injections of insulin; and if he will express the figures to show the percentage change on the previous year; [2173]

(2) what was the cost to the NHS of treating diabetic patients in each year since 1990 (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands; and if he will express the figures (i) in real terms and (ii) to show the percentage change on the previous year; [2174]

(3) what percentage of diabetics received free needles in each year since 1990 (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands; and if he will express the figures to show the percentage change on the previous year. [2175]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

On-duty Car Signs

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the provision of on-duty car signs to non-GP health professionals in the NHS; what plans he has to widen the provisions of such signs; and if he will make a statement. [2701]

Mr. Horam: I have received a limited amount of correspondence on this subject. It is for NHS trusts to develop workable resolutions to meet any local need, for example through dialogue with the police and local authority.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to give additional financial assistance to health authorities in respect of their responsibility for mentally disordered offenders. [2702]

Mr. Burns: We recognise that mentally disordered offenders have specialised and complex needs, and that in certain areas there is greater pressure on mental health services to provide for their care and treatment. Current funding of mental health services already recognises, through the capitation formulae, the needs of this group of patients within the spectrum of care and allows individual health authorities to set their priorities for mental health expenditure based on the assessed needs of their local population.

TREASURY

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when he last reviewed the way in which unemployment statistics are calculated; and if he will publish papers submitted to that review, together with its conclusions, in the Library; [831]

(2) what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the unemployed claimant count as a measure of the scale of unemployment; [829]

(3) what plans he has to undertake a new survey measure of unemployment to supplement the claimant count; and if he will make a statement. [830]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 28 October 1996]: I refer to the answer which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave on 24 October to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks), Official Report, columns 5-6.

In August 1995, the director of the Office for National Statistics commissioned a technical study from Dr. David Steel, senior lecturer in the department of applied statistics at the university of Wollongong, Australia. This study looked into options for producing monthly statistics from a labour force survey including unemployment figures based on the internationally standard International Labour Organisation definition. Following public consultation on the results of this study, the director of the ONS has decided that there is insufficient demand to justify the monthly publication of LFS data within the agency's budget. I respect that decision.

A report on the consultation exercise will be given in the November 1996 edition of "Labour Market Trends." The latter will be published on 7 November and a copy will be held in the Library. A full set of the responses received during consultation will be available from ONS on application.

The former Select Committee on Employment investigated the validity of the current measures of unemployment in the course of its 1995-96 Session. The Government's response was sent to the successor committee, the Education and Employment Select Committee on 24 October. I understand that the latter will be placed in the Library by the Committee in due course. In his evidence to that Committee, the director of the ONS made it clear that he was satisfied that the claimant count is an accurate measure of those people claiming unemployment-related benefits and that it is particularly useful as a short-term indicator of turning points in the labour market.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people, by region and gender, are undertaking (a) youth training and (b) training for work; and how many people, in each case, appear in the unemployed claimant count statistics. [1144]

Mrs. Knight: The information falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Ian McCartney, dated 7 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on the number of people undertaking Youth Training and Training for Work and whether they are included in the claimant unemployment statistics.

The table below gives the latest readily available official figures. The figures relate to training starts and have been compiled from information provided by the Department for Education and Employment and the Scottish Office. It should be noted that a person can start on the same programme more than once - such cases will be counted in the figures as separate starts.

More highly summarised information giving totals for England & Wales and for Scotland is published in the ONS monthly Labour Market Statistics First Release. The latter is available in the House of Commons Library.

Training starts for financial year 1995–96 by gender and region (000s)

	Youth training		Training for work
Government office region	Male	Female	Male	Female
South East	16.5	15.3	12.5	6.2
London	14.5	12.6	19.3	12.4
Eastern	12.1	10.2	10.5	5.2
South West	12.8	10.5	13.4	5.4
West Midlands	13.9	12.9	17.3	7.6
East Midlands	13.1	12.0	11.9	4.7
Yorkshire and Humberside	16.0	14.0	19.2	7.3
Merseyside	6.7	6.0	10.7	4.2
North West	19.1	16.1	17.3	7.5
North East	10.4	8.9	14.5	5.1
England	135.1	118.5	146.7	65.7
Wales	9.6	7.8	8.5	3.6
Scotland	23.2	14.5	23.8	5.7

Participants on long-term work-related Government supported training programmes, such as Youth Training and Training for Work, are not included in the claimant count or in the ILO measure of unemployment from the Labour Force Survey and never have been. People on these schemes are either contributing directly to the production of goods and services, or are receiving training in the work place. Accordingly, they are treated as employed, which is consistent with the guidelines of the International Labour Office on the treatment of trainees.

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the proportion of employed men in full-time work for each year since 1979. [1668]

Mrs. Knight [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The information falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Peter Hain, dated 7 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on the proportion of men in full-time work since 1979.

Information on the number of men in full-time employment is available only on a consistent annual basis from Spring 1984 and is published in Labour Force Survey Historical Supplement 1984–1996. Information showing the total number of men in employment is published in Table 1b and information showing the number of men in full-time employment in Table 2a. A copy of the publication is available in the House of Commons Library.

Bank of England

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what preparations his Department has made for granting operational independence to the Bank of England; and if he will make a statement. [803]

Mrs. Knight [holding answer 31 October 1996]: No such preparations have been made.

Population Statistics

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the total United Kingdom population lives in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland. [2131]

Mrs. Knight: The information falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. William Powell, dated 7 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on the proportion of the total United Kingdom population who live in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

The figures requested are shown below. They are for the mid-year 1995 and are the most recent available. The latest estimates are regularly published in Table 6 of the ONS Population Trends quarterly journal.

Resident population estimates mid-1995

Country	Thousands	Percentage
England	48,930.4	83.4
Wales	2,916.8	5.0
Scotland	5,136.6	8.8
Northern Ireland	1,649.0	2.8
United Kingdom	58,605.8	100.0

Taxation

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of total United Kingdom tax is raised in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland. [2127]

Mr. Jack: Information on total tax revenue by country is not available. Information on income tax is available by region in "Inland Revenue Statistics", published by the Inland Revenue statistics and economics office. Figures for 1994–95, the latest year available, are in the table.

Proportion of total UK income tax by country

	As a percentage of total
England	86.5
Scotland	8.0
Wales	3.5
Northern Ireland	2.0

Value Added Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors underlay his decisions (a) to allow taxpayers three years to reclaim wrongly paid VAT and (b) to allow Customs and Excise to reclaim errors for six years. [2578]

Mr. Oppenheim: The Government have become increasingly concerned at the large amounts of revenue at risk in taxation boundary disputes and it is not in the public interest that the Exchequer remains open to large retrospective claims, in some cases back to the introduction of VAT in 1973. The proposed three-year limit will introduce more certainty and achieves a reasonable balance between the rights of individual taxpayers and taxpayers at large. It is proportionate in effect because, at the time the transactions in question took place, both businesses and their customers will normally have worked on the assumption that tax was due.

There are no proposals to change the six-year limit Customs currently has under its powers to assess for underpaid VAT. A six-year period for assessment is necessary to recover tax underpaid through one-sided error or carelessness and to deter non-compliance with the rules by business.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what action Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has taken in respect of the new rules on the limitation of VAT claims announced on 18 July; and if he will make a statement; [2680]

(2) what discussions he has had with the European Commission concerning the legality of the Government's recently announced changes to the rules for reclaiming VAT; and if he will make a statement. [2682]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 6 November 1996]: Following the announcement on 18 July by the then Paymaster General that, subject to parliamentary approval as part of the Budget process, a three-year time limit on refunds of overpaid VAT, and other indirect taxes, was to be introduced immediately, Customs and Excise has deferred payments of refunds which are more than three years old.

Customs and Excise officials recently met representatives of the European Commission to discuss the proposals for limiting refunds of overpaid VAT and other indirect taxes. The Commission noted the United Kingdom's position.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the total amount due for repayment in respect of VAT incorrectly paid to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise with respect to company cars on the basis of (a) a three-year limit on reclaims, (b) a six-year limit on reclaims and (c) payment made only in respect of claims already made; and if he will make a statement. [2681]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 6 November 1996]: The High Court found in the appeals of Royscot Leasing Ltd. and Royscot Industrial Leasing Ltd., Allied Domecq plc and T. C. Harrison Group Ltd. that the relevant UK law restricting VAT input tax recovery on company cars is permitted by the EC sixth VAT directive, contrary to the appellants' contentions. No VAT has therefore been incorrectly paid to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise with respect to company cars.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women, and what percentage of the female population, were diagnosed with breast cancer in each of the last six years. [1295]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The information falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 7 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question asking how many women, and what percentage of the female population, were diagnosed with breast cancer in each of the last six years.

The information for England for the latest six years for which data are available is given in the table below.

Year	Number	Percentage
1988	24,975	0.11
1989	25,838	0.11
1990	26,994	0.11
1991	28,032	0.11
1992	28,324	0.11
1993	27,502	0.11

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women in the west midlands were diagnosed with breast cancer in 1995. [1241]

Mrs. Knight [holding answer 5 November 1996]: The information falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 7 November 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question asking how many women in the West Midlands were diagnosed with breast cancer in 1995.

The provisional number of registrations of breast cancer in the West Midlands in 1993 (the latest year for which data are currently available) is 3,199.

Financial Advisers

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding the proposal by the Personal Investment Authority to abolish the requirement for financial advisers to disclose (a) whether they are tied or independent and (b) to what extent they are paid by commission. [2630]

Mrs. Angela Knight: No representations have been received.

Endowment Mortgages

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received since 1 January 1995, regarding alleged mis-selling of endowment mortgages; what (a) investigations and (b) studies he has commissioned on the subject; and what discussions he has had on this issue with the Securities and Investments Board. [2631]

Mrs Angela Knight: The Treasury has on a number of occasions received representations about concerns that mortgage advice may be unduly influenced by the commissions available, including suggestion from the Consumers Association for further regulation. New disclosure rules introduced in January 1995 have the effect that commissions on endowment policies must be disclosed to potential clients. The Treasury has not commissioned any investigations or studies on the subject. Discussions with the Securities and Investments Board take place from time to time at ministerial and official level on all issues of regulatory concern.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

7. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current total of asylum seekers being held in custody. [920]

Miss Widdecombe: On 1 October 1996, a total of 864 persons who had sought asylum at some stage were detained.

Arrest Procedures

14. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet his European counterparts to discuss arrest procedures in the European Union; and if he will make a statement. [928]

Mr. Howard: I meet regularly with my counterparts in the European Union and discuss a range of justice and home affairs issues. We have not discussed arrest procedures but my hon. Friend is no doubt aware of the memorandum of understanding agreed last week between Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the United Road Transport Union which is aimed at minimising the risks run by lorry drivers who ferry sealed loads across international borders.

Police Forces (Guns)

15. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to issue new guidelines to police forces on the use of guns. [930]

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do this.

Prisoners (Terrorist Offences)

16. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners convicted of terrorist offences have been (a) released from prison in the United Kingdom, (b) transferred to prisons in Northern Ireland and (c) repatriated to the Republic of Ireland to complete sentences, since August 1994. [931]

Miss Widdecombe: Since 1 September 1994, three prisoners convicted of Irish terrorist-related offences have been released from prisons in England and Wales: 16 have been transferred from England and Wales to prisons in Northern Ireland either on a permanent or temporary basis, and two prisoners have been repatriated to the Republic of Ireland to complete their sentences.

Voting (Homeless People)

18. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with homeless organisations to enable homeless people to vote. [934]

Mr. Sackville: Officials met representatives of various organisations working with the homeless as part of the review of electoral law and practice which the Government set up after the last general election.

Victim Support Services

19. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the development of victim support services in England and Wales. [935]

Mr. Maclean: The new victim's charter, published in June 1996, establishes the continuing commitment of all the criminal justice agencies to improve their services to victims of crime. For example, last year the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board paid out £180 million to victims, making it by far the most generous such scheme anywhere in the world. And the Home Office grant to Victim Support since 1990–91 alone has risen 147 per cent. from £4.735 million to £11.682 million. This has enabled Victim Support to achieve nationwide coverage by establishing 365 local schemes and branches to support the victims of crime throughout England and Wales and to establish a witness support service at all 77 Crown court centres in the country. Victim Support's paid staff of over 800 and its 12,000 volunteers offer support to over one and a quarter million victims of crime a year.

Prison Ombudsman

20. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent annual report by the prisons ombudsman. [936]

Miss Widdecombe: The prisons ombudsman's annual report for 1995 was laid before Parliament on 23 October. It describes the important contribution which the prisons ombudsman has made in investigating complaints about the Prison Service.

Child Care Workers (Vetting)

22. Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the system of vetting those working with children. [939]

23. Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the system of vetting those working with children. [940]

Mr. Maclean: The Police Bill makes provision for criminal record checks giving details of convictions and cautions recorded centrally to be available for all who have regular contact with children whether as employees, trainees or volunteers. Where access is both regular and unsupervised, additional information will be provided from local police records including details of convictions for minor offences and relevant non-conviction information.

Hand Guns

24. Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many .22 repeating hand guns are legally held in the United Kingdom. [941]

Miss Widdecombe: Exact figures are not available centrally. The total number of .22 handguns, both repeating and single shot, which are legally held by private individuals on firearm certificate in Great Britain is in the order of 40,000 and others are legally owned by firearms dealers.

Knives (Advertising)

25. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to ban the advertising of knives in ways which appear to incite or condone violence. [942]

Mr. Maclean: It is already an offence for a person to incite another to commit an offence. The content of advertisements is regulated by the Advertising Standards Authority under a code of advertising practice which states that advertisements should not contain anything which might condone or encourage violent or anti-social behaviour.

Open Prisons

26. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on open prisons. [943]

Miss Widdecombe: Open prisons are a valuable part of the prison estate. They provide low security places at relatively low cost for prisoners who have been assessed as presenting minimal risk to the public. Open prison regimes are based on a full working week and provide an important means of preparing prisoners for their return to society.

Probation and After-care Service

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for the future of the probation and after-care service. [938]

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the three-year plan for the probation service 1996–99 which has been placed in the Library, and which sets out my priorities and expectations for the work of area probation services.

Firearms Offences

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each of the last five years the number of offences involving firearms indicating whether the weapons were (a) legally or (b) illegally held. [1665]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 1 November 1996]: Information as to whethe. the firearms used in notifiable offences recorded by the police are legally held is not at present collected centrally in England and Wales.

However, a special exercise has recently been conducted to find out whether the guns used in offences of homicide were licensed or not.

This covered the years 1992 to 1994, and out of a total of 196 homicides, information was available in 152 cases to show that 22 cases—14 per cent.—involved the use of a firearm legally held by the suspect.

Correspondence

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letter of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North of 17 October on sale of drugs by Nottingham bouncers. [403]

Mr. Maclean: A reply will be sent shortly.

Detainees (Birmingham Prison)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained in Birmingham prison under Immigration Act powers in (a) July, (b) August and (c) September; and what were the nationalities of those detained. [1039]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Dr. Lynne Jones, dated 7 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the number of people detained in Birmingham prison, under Immigration Act powers, in July, August and September; and what were the nationalities of those detained.

Young Offenders Institute, Colchester

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the first offenders to be admitted to the new young offenders institute at Colchester. [1481]

Miss Widdecombe: I expect the first young offenders to be admitted to Colchester young offender institution as soon as the outstanding issues are resolved.

Juvenile Offenders

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many juveniles aged 15 and 16 years have been remanded (a) in adult prisons and (b) in total in each of the last five years; and what has been the average period of their detention. [2314]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Dr. Lynne Jones, dated 7 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the number of juveniles aged 15 and 16 years who have been remanded (a) in adult prisons and (b) in total in each of the last five years; and what has been the average period of their detention.

The information on the number of remand receptions for untried juvenile prisoners is given in the attached tables, along with the estimated average periods in custody for all juvenile untried prisoners.

Information on the average period spent by juveniles in adult prisons is not separately available.

The average days in custody are estimated from the population held on 30 June each year and the total number of initial receptions in the year. The estimate is subject to some uncertainty due to the small numbers held.

Project Quantum

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consultation has taken place with representatives of administrative, secretarial and executive staff in the Prison Service about Project Quantum; [2119]

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect on Prison Service jobs of the implementation of Project Quantum; [2120]

(3) what assessment he has made of the impact of Project Quantum on the maintenance and improvement of standards of security and control in the Prison Service. [2122]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Lynne Jones, dated 7 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the Quantum Project. You asked what assessment has been made of the effects on Prison Service jobs and on the maintenance and improvement of standards of security and control and what consultation has taken place with representatives of administrative, secretarial and executive staff.

An assessment of the effect on Prison Service jobs of the implementation of Quantum is not possible at present as the final scope of the project has yet to be decided. That decision is likely to be made following a study by suppliers during the second quarter of 1997.

As a minimum, Project Quantum suppliers will be expected to meet the Prison Service key performance indicators for standards of security and control. They will also be encouraged to improve upon them.

During the month of September, 40 consultation sessions took place with representatives from administrative, secretarial, and executive staff in the Prison Service. These will continue throughout the term of the Quantum project. Consultation meetings have also been held with the trades unions.

Prison Service (Redundancies)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on the implementation of redundancies in the Prison Service. [2121]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Dr. Lynne Jones, dated 7 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about policy on the implementation of redundancies in the Prison Service.

As an Executive Agency of the Home Office, the Prison Service must follow Home Office-wide procedures. Redundancy cannot be considered unless posts are being lost, work reduced or changed significantly. It would not be right to use public money for redundancy unless the right conditions existed.

Before a redundancy scheme is introduced, a 90 day period of consultation with the Prison Service Trade Unions is instigated. Good communications with staff and Trade Unions is considered fundamental to the success of a redundancy programme, and staff are kept informed throughout the exercise using the normal channels of communication.

The current redundancy scheme, the Voluntary Early Retirement and Severance scheme (VERSE), was introduced o meet the budget cuts that the Service is required to achieve. Under VERSE the aim is to achieve the required post reductions through voluntary redundancies.

Almost 4000 applications have been received for voluntary early retirement and severance and it is expected that around 1300 staff will be able to leave under VERSE.

Child Prostitution

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce new measures to combat child prostitution. [2580]

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans to do so. We believe that the present law is adequate to deter and punish those who exploit child prostitutes. We will continue to encourage all the agencies concerned to give a high priority to action to prevent the sexual exploitation of children and young people.

Burglary Statistics

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been burgled on more than three occasions since 1990. [2446]

Mr. Maclean: Information is not available to answer the question as posed.

The British crime survey, which is conducted by the Home Office, provides information on the extent of repeat burglary victimisation:

(a) During 1995, 0.2 per cent. of households in England and Wales had an actual or attempted burglary on more than three occasions.

(b) In the five years 1991 to 1995 inclusive, 7.2 per cent. of households in England and Wales had an actual or attempted burglary two or more times.

Warrington Bombing

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in reviewing the conviction of John Kinsella and in obtaining a statement from Padraic MacFloinn in relation to Kinsella's knowledge about the Warfington bombing. [1092]

Mr. Kirkhope: We expect to receive very shortly from the police a report into certain matters raised in the representations made on Mr. Kinsella's behalf. This will include a statement which, I understand, was taken last week from Mr. MacFhloinn. As soon as that material has been received, we shall consider in the context of the evidence as a whole, whether grounds have emerged on which it would be right to refer Mr. Kinsella's conviction to the Court of Appeal.

Philip Lawrence

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his proposals for an award to commemorate the life and work of Philip Lawrence. [1094]

Mr. Maclean: The Philip Lawrence memorial will recognise outstanding achievements of good citizenship by young people. Details about the award will be announced as soon as possible.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the relationship between alcohol abuse and domestic violence. [1806]

Mr. Maclean: The 1996 British crime survey found that 32 per cent. of assailants in cases of domestic violence were said by their victims to be under the influence of alcohol at the time of the assault. Home Office research study 107, "Domestic Violence", considered the interaction between alcohol abuse and domestic violence, with a review of the available literature. The research evidence suggests that excessive alcohol consumption is not a cause of domestic violence but a condition that co-exists with it.

Alcohol-related Offences

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many alcohol-related juvenile offences were committed (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change in each year; [1808]

(2) what was the cost of alcohol-related crimes (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change in each year; [1807]

(3) how many offences of under-age drinking were recorded (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change in each year; [1809]

(4) how many recorded offences of under-age drinking were recorded (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands in each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change from the previous year. [1789]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many alcohol-related crimes and violent crimes were committed (a) nationally, (b) in the west midlands and (c) in Coventry in each year since 1990; and what was the percentage change in each year. [1805]

Mr. Maclean: Figures available on violent crime for the west midlands and nationally are given in the table. Figures for Coventry, and those for alcohol-related crimes generally, are not collected centrally.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1896]

Mr. Howard: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Offenders

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many women (a) have been sent to prison, (b) have been placed on probation and (c) have been ordered to carry out community service (i) nationally and (ii) in the west midlands for each year since 1990; and if he will list the figures as the annual percentage change; [2178]

(2) how many juvenile offenders (a) received custodial sentences and (b) were placed on probation (i) nationally and (ii) in the west midlands for each year since 1990; and if he will express the figures to show the percentage change on the previous year; [2171]

(3) how many offenders have been (a) placed on probation, (b) received custodial sentences and (c) were ordered to carry out community service (i) nationally and (ii) in the west midlands for each year since 1990; and if he will express the figures (1) in real terms and (2) to show the percentage change on the previous year. [2168]

Mr. Maclean: Information for 1990 to 1995, which is provisional, is given in the tables.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many juvenile offenders there were (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands for each year since 1990; and if he will express the figures to show the percentage change on the previous year; [2170]

Paedophile Crime

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives he has taken to reduce the incidence of paedophile crimes; and if he will make a statement. [925]

Mr. Howard: The Government are determined to do all they can to deter people from sexually abusing children, and to detect and punish severely those who do. To this end, we have already enacted the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996; and we have recently announced a number of other legislative proposals which I hope will have the support of the whole House.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total prison population (a) nationally and (b) in the west midlands for each year since 1990; and if he will list the figures as an annual percentage change. [2179]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 7 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me in the absence of the Director General from the Office, to reply to your recent Question asking, what is the total prison population (a) nationally and (b) in the West Midlands for each year since 1990; and if he will list the figures as an annual percentage change.

Information on the average prison population in England and Wales and for Birmingham prison is given in the attached table. Information for Scotland and Northern Ireland is available from the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively.

Prison Sentencing Policy

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the prison sentencing policy; and if he will make a statement. [929]

Mr. Maclean: I receive many representations about all aspects of sentencing policy.

Crossbows Act 1987

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions and convictions there were under the Crossbows Act 1987 between 1990 and the last year for which figures are available. [2804]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested cannot be identified separately from other summary offences.

Firearms

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 5 November Official Report, column 432, on the use of firearms in notifiable offences, how many and what proportion of firearms used in the homicides for which information is available were of categories (a) to be banned and (b) not to be banned in the Firearms (Amendment) Bill. [2966]

Miss Widdecombe: Of the 155 homicides involving firearms in England and Wales committed during the period 1992 to 1994 where the calibre of the weapon was known, 64, 41 per cent., involved handguns of a calibre exceeding .22 inches, the calibre to be prohibited by the Firearms (Amendment) Bill.

Of the remainder, 91, 59 per cent., involved firearms that will not be prohibited.

Child Sex Tourism

Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation to tackle the problem of child sex tourism. [932]

Mr. Maclean: The Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996, which came into force on 1 October, makes it an offence in the United Kingdom to conspire or incite others to commit sexual offences against children in other countries.

I announced in the summer, in the light of a general review of extra-territorial jurisdiction, that the Government had decided that United Kingdom courts should be given jurisdiction over acts of child abuse committed abroad by Britons or British residents.

Provisions to this effect will be included in the Government's proposed Bill on the registration of sex offenders.

Motorists

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of motorists stopped by the police for exceeding the 30 mph speed limit were subsequently charged with an offence in each of the last five years. [2059]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 6 November 1996]: The information is not collected in the form requested.

During 1995, 689,100 speeding offences were dealt with by official police action. The Home Office Statistical Bulletin, "Motoring Offences, England and Wales 1995" issued on 29 October 1996 gives further details on the type of action taken, and penalties received for offences of speeding. Copies are available in the Library.

Prisoners (Visitors)

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what financial assistance is available for visits to prisoners by their immediate relatives, in respect of (i) travel, (ii) accommodation, (iii) subsistence and (iv) other costs; and if he will give the rates for that assistance where the prison is situated in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) Scotland; [1773]

(2) what financial assistance is available for visits to prisoners by their immediate relatives in respect of (i) travel, (ii) accommodation, (iii) subsistence and (iv) other costs; and if he will give the rates for that assistance where the prison is situated in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) England or Wales. [1778]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 6 November 1996]: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Seamus Mallon, dated 7 November 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me in the absence of the Director General from the office to reply to your recent Questions about financial assistance for visits to prisoners by their immediate relatives.

For relatives who qualify under the assisted prison visit scheme and who reside in England, Scotland or Wales and visit prisons in those countries, or Northern Ireland, the full cost of travel by public transport or community bus (if no more expensive than public transport) is reimbursed. For claimants who travel by car, the journey is paid at 10 pence per mile.

Where an overnight stay is deemed necessary a contribution is made towards the cost. For prisons in the London area the rate per night is £21 for adults and £11.30 for children between the ages of three and fourteen. For all areas outside London the rates are £15 and £7.50 respectively. All applicants and their children aged over three years receive a contribution of £2.55 towards the cost of food when the total time away from home is between five and ten hours. The rate for over ten hours away from home is £5.10.

Other unavoidable expenses such as taxi fares to remote prisons where there is no public transport, toll fees and childminding fees are met.

The Northern Ireland Office is responsible for administering payment to residents of Northern Ireland who visit any prison in the United Kingdom.

DEFENCE

Army Vehicle Depot

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what use of the private finance initiative is being made in the development of the new Army vehicle depot at Ashchurch; [2226]

(2) what will be the cost of the move of the Army vehicle depot to Ashchurch; [2223]

(3) what (a) technical facilities and (b) specialist management is available at the Army vehicle depot at Ashchurch to deal with vehicles previously maintained at Ludgershall; [2242]

(4) when he expects the Army vehicle depot at Ludgershall to close; [2225]

(5) what plans he has to prevent traffic disruption as a result of the movement of Army vehicles from Ashchurch to Salisbury plain for training purposes; [2222]

(6) how many civilian technicians qualified to maintain the armaments of armoured vehicles are employed in the Army vehicle depot at Ashchurch; [2221]

(7) how many employees have agreed to move from the Army vehicle depot at Ludgershall to Ashchurch. [2217]

Mr. Soames: These are matters for the chief executive of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Brigadier K. J. W. Goad to Mr. Paul Murphy, dated 7 November 1996:

I am replying to the recent questions you tabled to the Secretary of State for Defence as these matters fall within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Base Supply and Distribution Agency. For ease of reply I have combined my comments to your questions, in the order you posed them, within this one letter.

First, you asked about the use being made of the PFI in the development of the new Army vehicle deport at Ashchurch.

The Base Vehicle Depot (BVD) at Ashchurch has been an Army depot since 1939. As part of the Defence Cost Studies, Army vehicle storage is being rationalised on a single site at Ashchurch. The operation of the vehicle storage facility at Ashchurch is currently being subject to competition with Industry under the CFQ initiative. The necessary refurbishment of the site will be subjected to PFI.

Secondly, you asked about the cost of the move of the Army vehicle deport to Ashchurch.

A recent review of the Investment Appraisal which supported the move from two vehicle depots to one confirmed significant savings in public expenditure. The cost to date of moving the vehicles previously stored at BVD Ludgershall to Ashchurch, which included ancillary equipment, is approximately £200,000. Twenty one vehicles only await transportation at BVD Ludgershall which will incur minimal additional cost.

Thirdly, you asked what technical facilities and specialist management are available at the Army Vehicle Depot at Ashchurch to deal with vehicles previously maintained at Ludgershall.

The specific facilities for 'A' vehicles to be offered by Vehicle Depot Ashchurch are as follows:

(a) A fuelling and de-fuelling facility.

(b) Wash down facility.

(c) Anti freeze facility.

(d) Overhead servicing facilities and associated oils and lubricants dispensing/collection systems.

(e) Appropriate security systems.

Two senior managers at Ashchurch already have extensive armoured vehicle experience. The remaining civilian managers have familiarised themselves with armoured vehicles over the past year and this training continues. Additionally the military staff in two vehicle troops at Ashchurch have a high degree of 'A' vehicle experience.

Fourthly, you asked when the Base Vehicle Depot at Ludgershall will close.

Following a review of the Investment Appraisal which formed the basis for the decision, Minister (AF) announced that the Base Vehicle Depot at Ludgershall will close by the end of March 1997.

Fifthly, you asked about plans to prevent traffic disruption as a result of the movement of Army vehicles from Ashchurch to Salisbury Plain for training purposes.

There will be no significant increase in numbers of vehicles travelling from Ashchurch to Salisbury Plain for training when BVD Ludgershall closes. Few vehicles are ever issued on loan simply for training. Vehicles are usually issued to Army units. 'A' vehicles issued to units in the north of the UK will no longer transit the route from Salisbury Plain, thus reducing such vehicle movements and the potential for traffic disruption. Other classes of vehicles issued to units within the Salisbury Plain, thus reducing such vehicle movements and the potential for traffic disruption. Other classes of vehicles issued to units within the Salisbury Plain area have, for many years, been despatched from Ashchurch; this will not change.

Sixthly, you asked how many civilian technicians qualified to maintain the armaments of armoured vehicles are employed in the Army vehicle depot at Ashchurch.

The one qualified Gun Fitter at Ludgershall did not wish to move to Ashchurch. The recruitment of suitable qualified civilian technical staff at Ashchurch is ongoing.

Finally, you asked how many employees have agreed to move from the Army vehicle depot at Ludgershall to Ashchurch.

One civilian craftsman from the workshop at Ludgershall has moved to Ashchurch.

I hope that I have answered your questions fully. Agreed by and signed on behalf of CE ABSDA in his absence on duty.

Unexploded Bombs (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reports his Department has (a) received and (b) assessed in respect of unexploded bombs in South Yorkshire; how many unexploded bombs are estimated to exist in each of the four metropolitan borough councils in South Yorkshire; how many bombs are officially listed; what is the estimated risk associated with these; what contact his Department has had with planners, surveyors and their representative groups in this matter; what action he plans to take; and what consultation he has had with other ministerial Departments on this subject. [2679]

Mr. Soames: My Department has no record of unexploded bombs in South Yorkshire. This does not mean that no unexploded ordnance exists in the area, only that the original Home Office wartime and post-war civil defence documents on which our data are based make no mention of any. Local county or city council public record offices may provide a better source of information in this case.

For further information on the issue of unexploded bombs, I refer the hon. Member to the letter I wrote to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 24 October. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

Maintenance Work

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current backlog of maintenance work in his Department. [2800]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1915]

Mr. Arbutnot: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed, and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages or disadvantages of each repeal. [2911]

Mr. Soames: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to him yesterday, Official Report, column 519.

SCOTLAND

Tuberculosis

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many registered homeless have died from tuberculosis in Scotland in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement; [1556]

(2) how many cases of tuberculosis among the registered homeless have been diagnosed in Scotland in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [1576]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information is not available in the form requested but existing data suggest that the numbers of cases of tuberculosis among the homeless are not high. Nevertheless, the expert working party, which I have set up to review the arrangements for the control, surveillance and treatment of tuberculosis in Scotland is considering the special needs of the homeless and will make recommendations accordingly.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many people have died from tuberculosis in Scotland in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement; [1560]

(2) how many cases of tuberculosis have been diagnosed in Scotland in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [1581]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is as follows:

	Number of deaths[1] from tuberculosis	Number of tuberculosis cases notified
1986	53	756
1987	42	560
1988	48	528
1989	56	533
1990	39	583
1991	56	563
1992	46	559
1993	58	554
1994	49	546
1995	39	478

[1] Information provided by the General Register Office (Scotland).

These figures cover all forms of tuberculosis, respiratory and non-respiratory. Existing arrangements for the control, surveillance and treatment of tuberculosis are currently being reviewed by a Scottish Office working party, whose report is expected shortly.

National Health Service (VAT)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of restrictions placed by Customs and Excise on (a) the ability of the NHS bodies to recover value added tax retrospectively on contracted-out services on the budgets of NHS trusts and (b) the use of external services within the NHS; and what assessment he has made of the losses which will be incurred in respect of these restrictions by NHS trusts in Scotland. [2341]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: HM Customs and Excise has extended the deadline for NHS bodies to submit retrospective claims for VAT refunds on contracted out services. There should be no effect on the use of external services. It is not feasible to assess whether any VAT will remain unrecovered.

Permaculture

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of how many farms or holdings are operating on permaculture principles; and if he will make a statement. [2354]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: No estimate has been made of the number of farms or holdings operating on permaculture principles.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to encourage permaculture within the national parks in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [2360]

Mr. Kynoch: There are no national parks in Scotland.

Organic Farming

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each year since 1994 (a) what forms of financial aid are available exclusively for organic farmers in Scotland, (b) what administration procedures were required for its acquisition, (c) how much money was ear-marked and (d) what percentage of the money annually ear-marked was received by farmers for that year; and if he will make a statement. [2362]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Financial aid is provided through the organic aid scheme. It provides assistance to farmers and crofters who wish to convert to organic standards. The scheme requires participants to register with a United Kingdom register of organic food standards approved sector body; remain registered for the five-year duration of the scheme; and follow a conversion plan agreed by the approved sector body. Scheme provision and expenditure are set out in the following table:

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1918]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: An analysis of capital costs of IT projects undertaken by the Scottish Office since 1992 and approved for 1997–98 is as follows:

Expenditure band	Number of projects
£0 to £1 million	60
£1 million to £2 million	9

Dunblane

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when the Bishopbriggs social work department contacted the parent whom Lord Cullen cited in his report, page 51, paragraphs 5.22, as having made complaints about Thomas Hamilton's relationship with her son; and for what reasons that contact was not made by telephone on the date of receipt by the social work department of the letter providing details of that complaint; [3017]

(2) when the Bishopbriggs social work department received the letter cited in his report by Lord Cullen, page 51, paragraph 5.22, relating to complaints about Thomas Hamilton in connection with the Bishopbriggs boys club; and what factors accounted for the delay between the date of receipt of that letter and the related telephone call made by the social work department on 12 March. [3016]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At the relevant time, the Bishopbriggs area office was the responsibility of the social work department of Strathclyde regional council. Following local government reorganisation, it transferred to East Dunbartonshire council, and I have asked the director of social work to write to the hon. Member.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total cost of (a) setting up the community charge and (b) setting up the council tax in Scotland. [1529]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 31 October 1996]: Costs incurred by local authorities in setting up the community charge and the council tax, which were reimbursed by the Scottish Office development department through grant schemes and capital allocations, are set out in table 1. Known costs for administering local taxation collection are shown in table 2.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

BSE

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the desirability of providing financial aid and incentives to encourage rural local authorities to set up specific local exchange trading schemes to help farmers during the BSE crisis; and if he will make a statement. [2313]

Mr. Boswell: Although we recognise that many farmers may be suffering cash flow problems as a result of the current state of markets for cattle, farming unions have made no representations to us to suggest that local exchange trade schemes would be of use to them. If they were to do so, we would suggest that those currently engaged in auctioneering and valuation in the farming sector would be better placed than rural local authorities to set up such schemes.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the change in the level of beef imports to the United Kingdom since the onset of the BSE crisis. [2452]

Mr. Boswell: Imports of beef[1] as recorded in the overseas trade statistics are given. Imports will fluctuate for many reasons, and it is not possible to identify separately a change linked specifically to the introduction of the BSE measures.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage and total amount of BSE eradication and compensation scheme expenditure has been received by (a) farmers, (b) slaughterers, (c) renderers and (d) other recipients; and if he will make a statement. [2159]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 6 November 1996]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the estimated cost of BSE measures for each financial year from 1996–97 to 1998–99 on 24 July 1996, Official Report, column 532.

Between April and the end of October 1996, the total expenditure on BSE eradication and compensation schemes broken down by recipient was as follows:

	£ Million	(Per cent.)
(a) Farmers	477.3	(68)
(b) Slaughterers[1]	96.8	(14)
(c) Renderers	77.5	(11)
(d) Other recipients	48.2	(7)
	699.8

[1] Expenditure between April and the end of October on the calf processing scheme amounted to £24.5 million. Of this, we estimate that £19.6 million will have been passed on to farmers by the slaughterers.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the research funding for BSE, project by project, for each of the past eight years. [682]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 6 November 1996]: The total amount spent on research and development by the Government during 1988–89 to 1991–1992 financial years was £16.4 million, of which around £5 million was spent on MAFF-related transmissible spongiform encephalopathy research.

A table listing the MAFF research projects undertaken on transmissible spongiform encephalopathies, including BSE, which have been held on computer record since 1992 has been placed in the Library. This table includes all the projects which were current in 1992 and every programme we have introduced since then.

Prior to 1992, MAFF research project records were not computerised and details of projects which began and ended before that year are not readily available.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the total expenditure to date on the BSE eradication and compensation schemes; and if he will make a statement. [2164]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 6 November 1996]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the estimated cost of BSE measures for each financial year from 1996–97 to 1998–99 on 24 July 1996, Official Report, column 532.

The total expenditure in the United Kingdom between April and the end of October 1996 on BSE eradication and compensation was £699.8 million.

This includes expenditure under the over-30-month slaughter scheme, the calf processing scheme, the additional EU compensation package—the beef special premium scheme and suckler calf processing scheme—top-up, beef marketing payment scheme, the beef stocks transfer scheme, the animal feed recall scheme, aid to renderers, emergency aid to the slaughtering sector.

Retail Beef Prices

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the change in retail beef prices over the period since 20 March. [2577]

Mrs. Browning: The index for the retail price of beef, as measured through the retail prices index is given.

	Index (January 1987=100)

March	138.2
April	134.8

Beef Sales

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average monthly volume of British beef sold in the 12 months to 20 March; and what has been the monthly average for the period since then. [2581]

Mr. Boswell: The average monthly volume of UK home fed production of beef and veal between April 1995 and March 1996 was 80,400 tonnes. The average monthly volume of UK home-fed production of beef and veal from April 1996 to September 1996 was 49,500 tonnes.

Home-fed production is expressed in carcase weight equivalent, and is defined as the slaughterings of British cattle within the UK for human consumption plus live exports of British cattle. It therefore includes beef sold for export and beef sold into intervention.

From 20 March 1996 home-fed production figures have excluded animals entering the over-30-month scheme and the calf processing aid scheme as the meat is not destined for human consumption.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1917]

Mr. Boswell: In response to the above question, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have undertaken 722 information technology projects since 1992 to 1996 inclusive, and 145 are planned for 1997, subject to available funds.

On a financial year basis, all IT projects have fallen within the cost band £0 to £1,000,000 with the exception of certain major projects which are necessarily developed and implemented in "phases" across a number of years, such as those relating to common agricultural policy reform. If aggregated to the end of 1997, these projects would fall within two bands:

£1,000,000–£10,000,000: BSE systems, Establishment of Meat Hygiene Service;

Greater than £10,000,000: CAP Reform, Resource Management Strategy, Farm Survey System and MAFF's corporate office system.

Fishing

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what rights exist for EU countries to fish in waters controlled by non-EU countries; which countries enjoy such rights; and what sums have been paid to Governments by the EU in order to facilitate these concessions. [2487]

Mr. Baldry: Details of the fisheries agreements between the European Community and non-EU countries, other than those on the west coast of Africa, are shown in the following table. For details of agreements with west African countries, I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 28 October 1996, Official Report, column 52.

Sandeels

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response he has made to the recommendations from Joint Nature Conservation Committee that sandeel fisheries be restricted in the Wee Bankie, Marr bank and Scalp bank of the North sea. [2636]

Mr. Baldry: In responding to a Ministry consultation letter on technical conservation measures, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee suggested, among other things, that sandeel fisheries be restricted in an area off the east coast of Scotland. The Ministry replied, explaining the initiatives taken by the Government over the past few months on industrial fisheries. Subsequent to the JNCC letter, a major international research project has been announced to study the impact of industrial sandeel fisheries on predator species off the east coast of Scotland. The Scottish Office marine laboratory is participating in this study.

Religious Slaughtering Methods

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) sheep, (b) calves, (c) adult cattle and (d) chickens were slaughtered by a method approved for religious reasons in (i) 1993, (ii) 1994 and (iii) 1995. [2688]

Mrs. Browning: This question could be answered only at disproportionate cost.

Live Animal Transport

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons his instructions to his appointed local veterinary inspectors do not require them to be present at the loading of ovine animals for export. [2689]

Mrs. Browning: The instructions to veterinary inspectors reflect the requirements of EU legislation. Sheep consigned to another member state must be inspected within the 48-hour period prior to loading. Additionally, inspections must be carried out to check compliance with EU rules, and the spot checks carried out in fulfilment of this include supervised loadings.

Cattle Cull

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to pay Richard Haddock of Collaton Barton farm, Kingswear, for the 50 cattle which were culled in early October; and what factors underlie the delay in this payment. [2910]

Mr. Baldry: Payment for cattle slaughtered under the over-30-month scheme typically takes 35 to 42 days. The procedure is as follows:

> Claims for payment are submitted weekly in arrears by collection centres acting on the producer's behalf. The Intervention Board makes payment to collection centres within 14 days of receipt of a fully documented claim. Collection centres are required to pay producers within 14 days of receipt of payment by the Intervention Board.

Providing, therefore, Mr. Haddock submitted properly completed documentation with his animals, he can expect to be paid shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Belfast Airport

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the amount spent on (a) accountants, (b) consultants, (c) lawyers and (d) other professionals in relation to the privatisation of Belfast airport. [1867]

Mr. Moss: The Department spent a total of £3.426 million on privatisation costs. It is not the practice to disclose the remuneration for individual consultancies.

Timber (Construction Use)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to promote the greater use of timber in the construction industry; and if he will make a statement. [1760]

Mr. Moss: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Nursery Vouchers

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what administrative action he has taken to assist the introduction of the nursery education voucher programme. [1689]

Mr. Ancram: Action has been taken on a number of fronts as follows:

1. A consultation document on the proposed operation of the nursery voucher scheme in Northern Ireland was issued in April 1996.
2. The Department of Education has been involved in the tendering process to select the company to administer the voucher scheme nationally. Discussions are taking place with education and library boards about funding mechanisms, and arrangements are being made for the inspection and registration of providers. General publicity about the scheme is planned for early 1997.
3. The Northern Ireland Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment has prepared a pre-school curriculum for Northern Ireland.
4. An Order in Council to provide the powers necessary to implement the voucher scheme is expected to be laid before Parliament during November.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the per capita expenditure on the administration of the nursery education voucher programme. [1690]

Mr. Ancram: The estimated per capita expenditure on the administration of the nursery education voucher programme in Northern Ireland is £9.17.

General National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number, percentage and type of schools involved in the development of GNVQ programmes in secondary education in Northern Ireland and the range of subject areas involved. [1691]

Mr. Ancram: The number and percentage of schools involved in the delivery of full GNVQs in Northern Ireland were as follows:

1992–93: 6 (2.5 per cent.)

1993–94: 65 (28 per cent.)

1994–95: 86 (36.6 per cent.)

1995–96: Not available

1996–97: Not available.

The number of schools involved in piloting part 1 GNVQ were:

1995–96: 9 (3.9 per cent.)

1996–97: 15 (6.4 per cent.)

The range of subject areas offered for full GNVQs are:

Art and Design[1]

Built Environment

Business[2]

Health and Social Care[2]

Hospitality and Catering

Information Technology[1]

Leisure and Tourism[1]

Manufacturing Science[2]

Education Expenditure

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the capital expenditure on (a) nursery, (b) primary, (c) secondary and (d) further education in each of the past five years. [1692]

Mr. Ancram: Capital expenditure by education and library boards on controlled schools and further education colleges, and grants paid by the Department of Education on approved capital expenditure incurred by voluntary and grant-maintained integrated schools for each of the financial years 1990–91 to 1994–95 is set out in the following table.

£ million

Sir John Wheeler: Projects committed under the private finance initiative to date include a contract energy services scheme at Holywell hospital, car parking facilities at the Royal group of hospitals, and leasing of medical and other equipment. Education and Training Targets

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the national targets for education and training for the year 2000; and what has been the Northern Ireland achievement against those targets in each of the past five years. [1694]

Mr. Ancram: The following national targets for education and training for the year 2000 apply in Northern Ireland:

Foundation Learning

(1) By age 19, 85 per cent. of young people to achieve five GCSEs at grade C or above, an intermediate GNVQ or an NVQ level 2.

(2) By age 19, 75 per cent. of young people to achieve level 2 competence in communication, numeracy and information technology; and 35 per cent. to achieve level 3 competence in these skills by age 21.

(3) By age 21, 60 per cent. of young people to achieve two A-levels, and advanced GNVQ or an NVQ level 3.

Lifetime Learning

(1) 60 per cent. of the work force to be qualified to NVQ level 3 advanced GNVQ or two A-level standard.

(2) 30 per cent. of the work force to have a vocational, professional, management or academic qualification at NVQ level 4 or above.

(3) 70 per cent. of all organisations employing 200 or more employees, and 35 per cent. of those employing 50 or more, to be recognised as investors in people.

The information available about progress in Northern Ireland towards those targets is as follows:

Foundation targets

Percentage

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
Foundation target 1	56.4	63.2	64.5	n/a

Free School Meals

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of (a) grammar school and (b) secondary school pupils are entitled to free school meals [1799]

Mr. Ancram: The percentage of pupils entitled to free school meals in (a) grammar schools was 9.6 per cent. and (b) in secondary schools was 35.3 per cent.

Reading Recovery Programmes

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the use of reading recovery programmes in Northern Ireland and his assessment of their effectiveness. [1791]

Mr. Ancram: Training for teachers in the reading recovery approach is available in four board areas, and will be in the fifth from September 1977.

The Queen's university of Belfast school of education is carrying out an evaluation of the effectiveness of reading recovery in two board areas, and the findings of the evaluation are expected shortly.

Education (Attainment Levels)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what analysis he has made of (a) the impact of the earlier age of starting school in Northern Ireland upon attainment levels in Northern Ireland education; and (b) the impact of month of birth in the transfer test. [1793]

Mr. Ancram: (a) The earlier school starting date came into operation in 1989; the first cohort will not leave school until the summer of 2002. No analysis of the impact of the earlier starting age has been carried out, but there is a substantial body of evidence supporting the view that early years education makes a positive impact on educational attainment in the longer term.

(b) There is a known correlation between age and test performance. To allow for the difference in age between the oldest and youngest children taking the tests, an allowance is made for younger pupils. This is calculated for each child in accordance with the day of his/her birth. The younger the child, the larger the allowance will be. There is a well-established practice in relation to the tests. No analysis of the process as such has been undertaken.

School Inspections

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about how frequently (a) primary school, (b) secondary school, (c) grammar school and (d) further education colleges are inspected. [1795]

Mr. Ancram: All grant-aided schools in Northern Ireland are inspected at least once every five years.

There is a general—full—inspection of each college of further education every eight years and an inspection of a key aspect of provision in each college at least once every four years.

Nursery Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of four-year-olds who are not in school receive nursery education; and what percentage of three-year-olds receive nursery education. [1797]

Mr. Ancram: Compulsory school age in Northern Ireland begins at four, so if a pupil is four on or before 1 July, they begin primary school the following September. 31 per cent. of three-year-olds received nursery education in 1995–96.

Private Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of 12-year-olds in Northern Ireland receive private education. [1798]

Mr. Ancram: Information on pupils receiving private education is not available, but 0.3 per cent. of 12-year-olds in Northern Ireland are educated in independent schools.

School Staff

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many staff, fulfilling what functions and at what cost, are employed in the Department of Education in direct funding and contact with schools. [1792]

Mr. Ancram: The Department of Education employs 25.4[1] staff in both direct funding and contact with schools, at a cost of £484,331 per annum—current rates. Collectively, these staff perform the following functions:

Advising voluntary grammar and grant-maintained integrated schools on procedures and requirements relating to school meals provision and processing grant claims in respect of expenditure incurred by these schools in providing this service.

Policy/resourcing/payment of grants/guidance on all financial and audit matters relating to the voluntary grammar and grant-maintained integrated school sectors.

Planning and approval of capital schemes and the payment of appropriate grants in relation to voluntary grammar, grant-maintained integrated and maintained schools.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Worthignton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the availability of grammar school places for those from the (i) Protestant and (ii) Catholic traditions in each of the education and library boards; and in which areas there is relative under provision. [1794]

Mr. Ancram: While it should be noted that many grammar schools are attended by both Protestant and Roman Catholic pupils, the distribution of grammar school places between schools under Roman Catholic management—denominational schools—and others—non-denominational schools—in each board area in the 1995–96 school year, the most recent statistics available, is as follows:

Grammar school places

	Denominational	Non-denominational
Belfast	5,894	10,126
Western	7,382	3,896
North Eastern	3,830	9,824
South Eastern	2,872	7,264
Southern	7,352	3,605
Total	27,330	34,715

There is evidence of a relative shortfall of grammar school places in Londonderry, Belfast, Newry, Banbridge, Bangor and Carrickfergus. Steps are being taken to address any underprovision, subject to the availability of capital resources.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of 11-year-olds in Northern Ireland attend grammar schools. [2491]

Mr. Ancram: In 1995–96, the percentage of 11-year-olds attending grammar schools in Northern Ireland was 34 per cent.

Raising School Standards Initiative

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the (i) progress and (ii) evaluation of the raising school standards initiative. [1796]

Mr. Ancram: The raising schools standards initiative was launched in 1995 with the aim of improving standards in schools with particular problems of educational and social disadvantage.

All schools in the programme are working to approved action plans and receiving the necessary financial and professional support to ensure delivery.

The schools have been inspected during 1995–96 and will be inspected again in 1997–98. The findings will contribute to an evaluation of the approach. In addition, the institute of education, university of London, is undertaking a research project within participating schools which assesses progress using the "value added" approach. This report is expected in December 1998 and will contribute to the final evaluation which will be available in 1999.

Mobile Classrooms

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the trend in the number of temporary mobile classrooms in use in Northern Ireland. [2032]

Mr. Ancram: Detailed information to establish a trend in the number of mobile classrooms in the schools estate is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Class Sizes

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) five, (b) six and (c) seven-year-old children are being taught in classes over 30 in size; and how many such classes there are. [2033]

Mr. Ancram: This information is not collected in the form requested.

Education Administration Costs

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his policy in respect of the level of costs of educational administration in Northern Ireland; and what assessment he has made of the level of these costs relative to those elsewhere in the United Kingdom. [2031]

Mr. Ancram: The Government believe that the costs of educational administration in Northern Ireland should be reduced through annual efficiency savings, through the restructuring of the education and library boards—which I announced earlier this year—and through the development, where practicable, of regionalised services.

The different local government structures in the United Kingdom do not permit direct comparisons with the costs of educational administration elsewhere.

Homework Centres

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evaluation has taken place of the 12 homework centres in Northern Ireland referred to in his answer of 13 March, Official Report, column 644; what conclusions he has reached in respect of future projects; and what proposals he has for expansion of the projects. [2063]

Mr. Ancram: Eight homework centres, funded through the making Belfast work programme, have been evaluated by the education and training inspectorate. This evaluation concluded that the most successful centres share the following characteristics:

- a location which is readily accessible by the pupils that the homework centre is intended to serve;
- they are based within schools, have access to the wider facilities and resources of the school, and involve activities to develop pupils that extend beyond the completion of homework set by the school; and
- evidence of commitment and active support by the principal of the school at which the centre is based and principals of other main participating schools.

The future expansion of homework centres is subject to availability of resources and competing priorities.

Students

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of higher education students with homes in Northern Ireland go to Great Britain or Irish institutions to study; and what percentage return for employment in Northern Ireland on completion of their studies. [2064]

Mr. Ancram: In 1994–95 32 per cent. of Northern Ireland domiciled full-time undergraduate new entrants to higher education went to institutions in Great Britain and 7 per cent. to institutions in the Republic of Ireland; 19 per cent. of Northern Ireland domiciled full-time undergraduates who graduated from Great Britain higher education institutions in 1994–95 returned to Northern Ireland to take up employment.

No information is available on the destinations of Northern Ireland domiciled graduates from Republic of Ireland institutions.

Education Budget

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list in (a) cash and (b) constant price terms the resources that have gone into education in each year since 1979, and the percentage of the departmental budget which has been devoted to education in each year. [2065]

Mr. Ancram: The information is set out in the table:

Year	Education cash £m	Expenditure[1] 1996–97 prices £m	Education as percentage of (a) NI expenditure[2]	Education as percentage of (b) NI managed block[3]
1979–80	388	1,017	15.9	20.5

[1] Includes youth training programme expenditure prior to 1992–93, when responsibility for this activity transferred to the Department of Economic Development.

[2] NI expenditure is the total expenditure within the Secretary of State's responsibility within the control total. It includes NIO expenditure, and for the years prior to 1988–89, cyclical social security benefits.

[3] Includes expenditure by the NIO and NI Departments, excluding national agricultural and fisheries support, and most social security benefits expenditure.

Local Management of Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the percentage of education and library boards' budgets which must be delegated to schools; and what plans he has to change it. [2066]

Mr. Ancram: The LMS arrangements in Northern Ireland do not provide for fixed levels of delegation, but list specific areas of expenditure which boards either must delegate or may delegate to schools. Under these arrangements, education and library boards presently delegate to individual schools 86 per cent. of the funds capable of delegation. The boards retain resources to cover centrally funded services, such as landlord maintenance, curriculum advisory and support services, home-to-school transport, and educational welfare and psychology services. Levels of delegation are reviewed annually.

Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his target date for the implementation of his proposals for the incorporation of colleges. [2489]

Mr. Ancram: For planning purposes, the target date for the incorporation of colleges is 1 August 1997.

School Assessments

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he has made in incorporating a value added element into the assessment of schools. [2490]

Mr. Ancram: It will not be possible for value added to be determined until the assessment outcomes for a cohort of pupils at consecutive key stages can be compared. Assessment of pupils' attainments at the end of key stages 1, 2 and 3 became a statutory requirement from 1 September 1996; it will be a further three years before the best means of establishing value added measures can be determined.

University Places (Costs)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the per capita cost of a full-time university place excluding student support in (a) real and (b) constant price terms in each of the past 10 years. [2492]

Mr. Ancram: The recurrent cost per full-time equivalent student, excluding student support, at universities in Northern Ireland has been as follows:

	(a) Cash price (£)	(b) Constant 1993–94 prices (£)
1986–87	4,290	6,345
1987–88	4,501	6,320
1988–89	4,553	5,966
1989–90	4,929	6,064
1990–91	5,187	5,908
1991–92	5,275	5,653
1992–93	5,232	5,392
1993–94	5,185	5,185
1994–95	5,059	4,958

School Transport

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on school transport; what savings he expects to make in a full financial year as a result of policy changes; from which school sectors; and what impact he assesses this will have on enrolment. [2493]

Mr. Ancram: From the beginning of the 1997–98 school year, assistance will be provided only to pupils who are unable to gain a place in a suitable school or institution of further education within statutory walking distance of their home. Statutory walking distance is defined as two miles for primary school pupils and three miles for other pupils.

It is estimated that savings of some £3.4 million per annum in total will be achieved when the policy is fully implemented.

The estimated savings in each sector are:

	£ million
Primary	0.5
Secondary/Grammar	2.5
Further education	0.4

The policy change is not expected to affect overall enrolment figures, although variations to enrolments at individual schools are expected. The extent of these will be determined by whatever choices parents make for their children in response to the new transport arrangements.

Fireworks

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what powers exist for (a) Customs and Excise and (b) other authorities to prevent the importation of illegal fireworks through ports into Northern Ireland. [2495]

Sir John Wheeler: Where Customs and Excise officials know that cargoes include fireworks, they check for compliance with the British standard and routinely advise the Health and Safety Executive and the Royal Ulster Constabulary. If, however, random searches at ports reveal fireworks which have not been listed as such, officials detain them and notify the RUC.

Fireworks coming into ports in Northern Ireland must comply with the Explosives Act 1875, as amended, and they must be authorised and appear on the "List of Authorised Explosives" issued by the Health and Safety Executive. They must also be classified in accordance with the Classification and Labelling of Explosives Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1991 and it is an offence under the Health and Safety at Work Order 1978 not to comply with these regulations.

The Placing on the Market and Supervision of Transfers of Explosives (Enforcement) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1996 give an inspector appointed under article 21 of the Health and Safety at Work Order 1978 the power to seize and detain, in accordance with section 74 of the Explosives Act 1875, fireworks which he has reasonable cause to believe will be unlawfully acquired, used or dealt in.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from the RUC about its powers to deal with fireworks in Northern Ireland. [2496]

Sir John Wheeler: When consulted on the draft Explosives (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 the Chief Constable indicated that he would wish to have various, additional powers to enter, stop, search and seize in relation to offences committed under the new regulations.

The Secretary of State gave this request the most careful consideration, but was not persuaded that such additional powers, which Parliament has reserved solely for the prevention and detection of serious and violent crime, were wholly appropriate to offences committed under the fireworks legislation.

Teacher Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to what extent teacher education falls within the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Higher Education Council; and if he will make a statement. [2497]

Mr. Ancram: Provision for teacher education in Northern Ireland is not included under the remit of the Northern Ireland Higher Education Council.

Education and Library Boards

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what expenditure will be incurred in respect of his proposals for reducing the number of education and library boards (a) before parliamentary approval has been given and (b) before the proposals are carried out. [2498]

Mr. Ancram: Expenditure requirements for the restructuring of the education and library boards in the next financial year have yet to be determined. Expenditure in the current financial year is not expected to be significant.

Orange Parade

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) when he was informed by the Chief Constable of the decisions to (i) prevent and (ii) allow the Orange parade which marched down Garvaghy road on 11 July; [1767]

(2) what consultations he had with the Chief Constable of the RUC regarding the decision to prevent the passage of an Orange parade along Garvaghy road, and what subsequent consultation he had with the Chief Constable prior to the decision to permit the passage of the parade; [1768]

(3) if he will publish the directions issued by the Chief Constable in relation to the Orange parade at Garvaghy road, Portadown between 6 and 11 July. [1770]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 6 November 1996]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement made in the House by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on 15 July Official Report, columns 787–90, which set out the events surrounding the parade at Drumcree, and to the Chief Constable's BBC interview of the previous day referred to in that statement, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration he gave to making an order under article 5 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 in respect of circumstances on the Garvaghy road between 6 and 11 July; what advice he sought on this matter; and on what basis a decision was made not to issue any such order. [1769]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 6 November 1996]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State did not make an order under article 5 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 because the Chief Constable did not advise him to do so.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations were made to him during the period 6 to 11 July regarding unwillingness of members of the RUC to enforce the directions of the Chief Constable made on 6 July. [1771]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 6 November 1996]: None.

Beach Safety

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps his Department is taking to ensure the safety of people on beaches along the North Down littoral from the wash of passenger ferries. [2459]

Mr. Bowis: I have been asked to reply.

I have asked the chief executive of the Marine Safety Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. Robert McCartney, dated 7 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your Question about wash from passenger ferries and what is being done to ensure the safety of people on North Down beaches.

An Extraordinary Meeting of the Belfast Lough District Safety Committee Working Group will take place on 13 November 1996 to discuss wash from ferries. The meeting is to be chaired by the Marine Safety Agency's Regional Chief Surveyor and will be attended by representatives from all interested parties including the ferry operators. North Down Borough Council and the police.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were transferred from reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance between 1 April and 1 October in each Benefits Agency region. [2683]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration or reduced earnings allowance, payable under the Industrial Injuries scheme, is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Peter Hain, dated 6 November 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people were transferred from Reduced Earning Allowance (REA) to Retirement Allowance (RA) between 1st April and 1st October in each Benefits Agency (BA) region.

The information is not available in the format requested. Statistics are collated by BA Area Directorates, not on a regional basis.

In order to assess those people who might be transferred to Retirement Allowance under amending legislation {Social Security (Industrial Injuries and Diseases)(Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1996} which came into force on 24 March 1996, the Benefits Agency identified all Reduced Earnings Allowance recipients over pensionable age as at 24 March 1996. From 24 March to 30 September 1996, 21,299 have had their entitlement to REA transferred to RA. This includes REA recipients who attained pension age before and after 24 March 1996.

The information is shown in the attached table.

I hope this reply will be helpful.

Benefits Agency Medical Services

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make it his policy that the practice whereby hospital case notes are currently supplied free of charge by the NHS to the Benefits Agency medical services will continue, should private companies win the contracts currently on offer under the contracting out of the operations of the Benefits Agency medical services; and if he will make a statement; [754]

(2) if he will make it his policy that the practice whereby external medical opinions are currently obtained free of charge under NHS authorisation to the Benefits Agency medical services will continue, should private companies win the contracts currently on offer under the contracting out of the operations of the Benefits Agency medical services. [755]

Mr. Burt: We are currently discussing this issue with officials from the NHS executive. These discussions should be concluded within the next few weeks. Whatever the outcome of these, it is imperative that the provision of these services will not lead to any increase in the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy that, where private contractors be charged for the service whereby external medical opinions are currently obtained free of charge under NHS authorisation to the Benefits Agency medical services, his Department will guarantee that the private companies will not reduce the number of cases for which external medical help is sought; and if he will make a statement. [753]

Mr. Burt: In any case referred to an external medical supplier, the contractor's doctors must be able to supply adequate reasons for the advice being given. If it is not possible for them to advise on the evidence already available then they must seek information from other sources. The Department will not be satisfied with advice which is not fully supported by documentary evidence. This will be stated in the terms of the contracts with any private contractors and will be rigorously monitored by the contract management team. It is not anticipated that the number of requests for further medical evidence will be reduced.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will stipulate in the contracts awarded to companies bidding to undertake the assessment of claims for incapacity benefit currently performed by the Benefits Agency medical services the target number of clients for this benefit to be seen per session by doctors employed by these companies to evaluate the eligibility of claimants; [751]

(2) if he will stipulate in the contracts awarded to companies bidding to undertake the assessment of claims for incapacity benefit currently performed by the Benefits Agency medical services, (a) the annual number of cases to be reviewed, (b) the annual maximum number of clients that will be deemed eligible for incapacity benefit and (c) the total amount of benefit to be authorised. [737]

Mr. Burt: The Benefits Agency has never set targets covering the number of people who should be allowed or disallowed benefit.

Performance indicators and targets for the potential service provider of the medical service have not yet been set: they will be matters for discussion and negotiation prior to contract(s) being awarded.

The set targets will relate to how the service is delivered rather than decisions on entitlement to benefit.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) which were the companies involved in (a) the partnering exercise and (b) the collaborative study into the Benefits Agency medical services before the decision to contract out the Benefits Agency medical services; which were the companies that were later involved in tendering for the subsequent contracts; and if he will make a statement; [746]

(2) which were the firms that were involved in the feasibility study to determine contracting out of the Benefits Agency medical services and which have been shortlisted for the three geographical areas; when he expects the final decision to be (a) made and (b) announced; and if he will make a statement. [747]

Mr. Burt: A partnering project team was established in September 1994 to look for ways in which the private sector could be involved in the future delivery of a medical service. Advertisements were placed in the national press seeking expressions of interest from suitable companies to undertake a collaborative study with the project team. The companies chosen to take part in the study were BMI, Capita and Serco.

The three companies undertook independent studies of the Benefits Agency medical services, BAMS, organisation. Assessment of their reports concluded that the work of BAMS could be contracted to the private sector.

In June 1996 an advertisement was placed inviting expressions of interest: five companies were subsequently chosen to enter into negotiations with the Department for the provision of a medical service. Those companies are Andersens, BMI, Capita, EDS and Sema.

Some of the information that was made available during the collaborative study is now out of date. Shortlisted contractors who have been invited to enter into negotiations will receive all relevant information to ensure they fully understand the requirements, and to ensure that they are able to develop proposals based on the same information. No advantage will accrue to the companies who participated in the collaborative study.

A final decision and subsequent announcement is anticipated by April 1997.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy that any private company bidding to undertake the medical assessment of claims for incapacity benefit from the Benefits Agency medical services and acquiring confidential data in the course of their assessments will be legally prohibited from (i) using and (ii) disclosing that information for their other commercial interests in (a) private health care and (b) all other commercial applications; and what measures his Department intends to use to investigate such eventualities. [759]

Mr. Burt: The Department places strong emphasis on customer confidentiality and would demand the same standards from the successful contractor or contractors. The contractor(s) will have a mandatory contractual requirement to conform to the security policy of the Department which is based on Government security policy.

The successful bidder or bidders will be required to ensure that any data or information passed to them by the Department or a third party, or revealed during the course of the contract, is used only for the purpose directly relating to the Departments business and only by the appropriate staff.

Rigorous monitoring systems will be put in place to ensure on-going compliance with the requirements.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, following his Department's decision to contract out the functions of the Benefits Agency Medical Services, he will give the rationale for his Department's decision to use the negotiated procedure in respect of contracting out the functions of the Benefits Agency medical services, rather than the restrictive procedure for the shortlisted firms. [748]

Mr. Burt: The use of the negotiated procedure is considered to be less adversarial than the restrictive procedure. It provides an opportunity for meaningful two-way dialogue, allowing the necessary flexibility for discussions and negotiations, thus ensuring better informed and higher quality bids.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy that, following his Department's decision to contract out the functions of the Benefits Agency medical services, commercial considerations will not affect the decisions to obtain the consultants' reports that enable doctors to make full and professional assessments of claimants for incapacity benefit. [752]

Mr. Burt: In the majority of cases, a consultant's report is obtained at the request of the customer. On occasions the contractor or contractors will need to obtain a report from a consultant as this will represent the most satisfactory way of establishing the evidence necessary to advise the adjudication officer.

Post contract management arrangements will ensure that the contractor(s) achieve the correct balance between customer care and profits.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will revise (a) the target number of clients for incapacity benefit seen per session by doctors of (i) the Benefits Agency medical services and (ii) any private contractors successful in their bid to take over the functions of the Benefits Agency medical services and (b) any other aspect of the service; and if he will make a statement. [750]

Mr. Burt: One of the primary objectives in contracting out Benefits Agency medical services is to improve the provision of a medical service to the Department.

The Department will be specifying the outputs in terms of service delivery in a way that is measurable.

Whilst the output will be specified, how the contractor achieves the specification will not, thereby providing the contractor with the maximum flexibility for delivery of the service.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if individual members of the assessment panel responsible for the recommendation for full contracting out of the functions of the Benefits Agency medical services were allowed to put in a bid for the resulting contracts; and if he will make a statement. [749]

Mr. Burt: The medical service to be contracted out to the private sector was advertised in the Official Journal of the European Community and Government Opportunities.

Following the response to a questionnaire completed by the private sector and individuals working in the Benefits Agency medical services, a full and auditable evaluation of responses was undertaken resulting in five private sector companies being invited to go forward to the next stage of the procurement process.

No individuals included in the assessment panel are involved in the bidding process for this service.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what efficiency savings his Department estimates will accrue from the decision to contract out the functions of the Benefits Agency medical services. [767]

Mr. Burt: It is not possible at this stage to estimate the precise level of savings. However, experience of similar exercises within the Department has identified that efficiencies will be gained in all cost areas of the contract or contracts.

Benefits Agency (Emergency Services)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each of the last five years and for each Benefits Agency office the cost of operating the out-of-hours service. [1431]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 6 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if he will list for each of the last five years and for each Benefits Agency office the cost of operating the out-of-hours service.

The information is not available in the format requested. The total budgets allocated for the operation of the Out of Hours Service for each of the last five years were as follows:

1992/93: £0.561 million

1993/94: £0.987 million

1994/95: £1.720 million

1995/96: £1.754 million

1996/97: £1.834 million.

Figures are provisional and subject to change.

The budgets allocated to each Area Directorate are detailed in the attached table. Each Area Director decides on the distribution of these budgets to District Offices to support the operation of the Out Of Hours Service across their Area and details could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

I hope you find this information helpful.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many incapacity benefit claimants have been found to be fit for work by the all-work test since its introduction; how many such claimants have since claimed benefits as being unemployed and seeking work; and how many have obtained employment. [1406]

Mr. Burt: Up to the end of September 1996, around 178,000 incapacity benefit claimants had been found capable of work following the all-work test. A total of 73,000 claimed unemployment benefits. A total of 47,000 have since left the register and around 10,000 were placed in employment or on training schemes by the Employment Service.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1916]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Compensation Recovery

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on proposals to reform regulations governing compensation recovery; if there will still be a threshold for compensation payments below which recovery will not take place; if he will review cases affected by current rules backdated to 1990; how he will ensure that compensation components for pain and distress are properly identified; and when he intends to bring forward the proposed legislation. [1549]

Mr. Roger Evans [holding answer 5 November 1996]: We have introduced a Bill into the House of Lords today to reform the compensation recovery scheme. We propose that, from October 1997, the compensator will become liable for the repayment of all benefits paid as a consequence of the accident, injury or disease. The compensator will be permitted to reduce relevant damages where a corresponding benefit is repaid to the Department. Damages for pain and suffering will not be reducible. We plan that the new rules should apply to all compensation claims determined on or after the point of change. The present small payments limit of £2,500 below which recoupment does not take place, will be removed. There will be no entitlement to reopen cases determined before the point of change.

WALES

Public Transport

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives are being pursued and how much funding is available to promote increased use of public transport; and if he will make a statement. [1866]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Local authorities have been given powers to promote public transport in their areas. Including concessionary fares schemes, this support is estimated at some £18 million in 1995–96. In addition, assistance is available to local authorities for major projects, as well as through the capital challenge scheme, the strategic development scheme and the bus priority scheme. This support includes more than £8 million over the three years from 1996–97 to improve rail links between Cardiff and the valleys.

Drug Action Team

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking to encourage the formation of a regional drug action team in north Wales. [1929]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend issued "Forward Together-A Strategy to Combat Drug and Alcohol Misuse in Wales" in May 1996. In it, he asked all those organisations which have a part to play in combating drug and alcohol abuse to come together to form drug and alcohol action teams in each of the five new health authority areas; to submit local strategies and plans to him by December 1996; and to implement them from April 1997.

Nursery Voucher Road Show

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what will be the total cost of the nursery education voucher road show to his Department; [1490]

(2) what is the itinerary of the nursery voucher roadshow; [2014]

(3) to whom invitations have been sent to attend the nursery voucher roadshow. [2013]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My right hon. Friend and I are determined that the voucher scheme will be implemented in Wales as smoothly and efficiently as possible. It is important that providers of nursery education in the maintained, private and voluntary sectors have full information about the detailed operation of the scheme. To that end, the Welsh Office is proposing to hold a number of factual information seminars and is currently assessing demand among private and voluntary nurseries and playgroups for seminars in Cardiff, Swansea, Carmarthen, Llandudno, Wrexham and Llandrindod Wells. So far, over 360 organisations have said they want to attend. The cost of the seminars is expected to be between £2,000 and £3,000, depending on numbers and locations.

Local education authorities were invited to consider holding joint LEA/Welsh Office seminars for schools, but have declined, many, I understand, making separate arrangements to brief their schools.

Dentists

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent initiatives he has taken to assist the recruitment of dentists to rural areas in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [1750]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The £3 million initiative, announced in September last year, enabled Welsh health authorities to offer grants to attract new dentists, into those parts of Wales where they are most needed, and to expand the community dental service.

The initiative has been very successful. Just under £2 million has been offered as grants for 56 new dentists. Twenty-seven of them are already in place and another 14 should be operational by January 1997. Grants of £25,000 are still available to attract new dentists to certain part of mid, west, and north, Wales.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State foe Wales (1) how many NHS dental practitioners there were in Wales in (a) each year since 1990 and (b) at present; and if he will make a statement; [1853]

(2) how many dental practitioners undertaking national health service work there were in Wales by county in each year since 1989; and if he will make a statement. [1858]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The available information is given in the following table.

Railways

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what evaluation his Department has carried out of the effect of the imposition of a minimum passenger requirement as currently stated on the north Wales to Crewe train services; and if he will make a statement. [1862]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I am sure that passengers will welcome the availability for the first time of contractual guarantees of minimum service levels.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are his Department's responsibilities in respect of (a) Regional Railways and (b) InterCity West Coast in respect of (i) overcrowding, (ii) punctuality and (iii) reliability; and if he will make a statement. [2260]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: These are matters for the Franchising Director, who sets specifications and places requirements on the train operators through the passenger service requirements and franchise agreements.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of tuberculosis among the registered homeless have been diagnosed in Wales in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [1575]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have died from tuberculosis in Wales in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [1559]

Mr. Jones: The information requested, supplied by the Office for National Statistics, is given in the following list:

Deaths from tuberculosis[1]: Welsh residents, 1986–1995

1996: 38

1987: 23

1988: 35

1989: 26

1990: 30

1991: 29

1992: 36

1993: 28

1994[2]: 25

1995[2]:32.

[1] International Classification of Diseases (9th revision), codes 010–018.

[2] Figures for 1993 and 1994 represent the number of deaths occurring in each year. All the other figures are the number of deaths registered in the year. Also, new procedures for coding cause of death from 1993 and the absence of medical enquiries mean that figures for 1993 onwards may not be exactly comparable with earlier years.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of school leavers in Wales have been vaccinated against tuberculosis; and if he will make a statement. [1561]

Mr. Jones: Information is not available centrally in the form requested. Over the last three financial years, the average number of BCG, tuberculosis, vaccinations given each year to children aged 15 and under in Wales for their individual protection was 24,000. A further 1,2000, on average, were found to have an existing immunity to tuberculosis. For those aged between 10 and 15 years, the number of children in each school year in Wales is between 36,000 and 38,000—provisional January 1996 figures.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of tuberculosis have been diagnosed in Wales in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [1580]

Mr. Jones: The information is given in the following table.

	Number of cases of tuberculosis notified
1986	251
1987	232
1988	201
1989	210
1990	194
1991	166
1992	205
1993	199
1994	181
1995	184

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many tuberculosis cases recorded in Wales since 1979 related to (a) children, (b) men and (c) women; and if he will make a statement; [2271]

(2) how many tuberculosis cases have been reported since 1979. [2268]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information for 1995 is given in the following table.

	Number
Children	19
Men	92
Women	66
Total[1]	184

[1] Includes age/sex not known.

The numbers of notifications of tuberculosis for earlier years, giving an age and sex breakdown, are published in table 4 of "Communicable disease statistics", series MB2—No. 6 for 1979 to No. 21 for 1994—available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy concerning efforts to limit tuberculosis cases in Wales. [2269]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The department has taken a number of measures to combat tuberculosis (TB).

In 1994, the United Kingdom health departments established the interdepartmental working group on TB to consider what further action could be taken to improve current measures to control, and prevent, cases of TB. Two reports emanating from the group, "Recommendations for the prevention and control of TB at local level" and "TB and homeless people" have recently been widely disseminated to the NHS in Wales. In addition, the Department has convened a small working party to consider arrangements for a framework to audit TB, in Wales, including arrangements for diagnosis, reporting and contact tracing. It is anticipated that the audit will be completed by the end of 1997.

Updated guidance on TB with recommendations of persons who should be immunised with BCG vaccine, contained in the UK Health department's memorandum, "Immunisation against Infectious Disease", was issued to the NHS in Wales in September. In particular, this advice recommends the continuation of the school BCG immunisation programme.

General Practitioners

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he is undertaking to assist the recruitment of general practitioners to rural medical practices; and if he will make a statement. [1740]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There are already a number of fees and allowances available specifically to general practitioners in rural areas. Additionally, in Wales the financial allocation to health authorities includes a rurality component to help defray additional costs associated with rural practices.

Drug Reference Groups

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he plans to take to establish drug reference groups in north Wales; and what financial help he plans to make available. [1928]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend and I have recommended that drug and alcohol action teams establish implementation teams and local advisory teams to assist them in achieving their local strategies to combat drug and alcohol abuse.

Some £3 million of Welsh Office funding for drug and alcohol initiatives was transferred to health authorities in 1994 to help them support local action.

My right hon. Friend and I established a Welsh drug and alcohol unit with new funding of £1.5 million over three years, to provide advice and support to organisations throughout Wales.

Cadw

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when does Cadw plan to establish an office in north Wales; and if he will make a statement. [1747]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to Cadw under its chief executive, Mr. Tom Cassidy. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. J. Cassidy to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 7 November 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question in which you ask when Cadw plans to establish an office in North Wales.

Cadw has a works management unit in Caernarfon and our professional and field staff frequently travel throughout Wales. They provide a direct point of contact for members of the public who may be potential grant applicants; offer advice to local authorities on statutory procedures and best practice in conservation; and liaise with a range of bodies and organisations which have an interest in preserving and promoting the built heritage.

I am most anxious that the services available from Cadw should be readily accessible, but I do believe that service to and communication with the public are already at a high standard and I have no plans to supplement the unit in Caernarfon with an office in North Wales.

Police Authority Funding

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on the subject of the funding of police authorities during the last six months; and if he will make a statement. [1855]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend and I received 22 representations between 1 May and 31 October. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend will make announcements about the funding of police authorities shortly after the Budget.

Rail Services

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what proposals he has to improve the railway services of North West Regional Railways in respect of the Wrexham to Bidston railway line; and if he will make a statement; [2265]

(2) what proposals he has to improve the railway services of North West Regional Railways as they are provided on the Holyhead to Crewe railway line; and if he will make a statement. [2264]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The level of service on North West Regional Railways is a matter for the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising and the train operator. I understand that the franchising director is currently consulting local authorities and rail users' consultative committees about the draft passenger service requirement for North West Regional Railways which will specify minimum service standards. When assessing bids for the franchise, the franchising director will take into account proposed improvements to the level and quality of services.

Green and Brown Field Sites

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of (a) green field and (b) brown field sites which will be developed in the next five years. [2257]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on which to make estimates of green field and brown field development sites is not collected centrally. The Government's policy is that full and effective use should be made of brown field sites to reduce pressure for development on green field sites.

Rural Areas (Development)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research he has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned of low impact development in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [2345]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Welsh Office officials keep abreast of, and appraise, all published research that is relevant to the development of rural Wales. In planning terms, no research on low impact development has either been commissioned or is pending. Our policies for rural Wales are set out in "A Working Countryside for Wales", CM 3180, published on 13 March 1996.

Inward Investment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of Japanese companies intending to locate in Wales in the next 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [2259]

Mr. Hague: A number of Japanese companies are considering investing in Wales, some for the first time, some reinvesting in existing operations and another is contemplating a joint venture. While we will do all that we can to convert these prospects into projects, it would be unwise to speculate further at this stage.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Japanese companies have located in each of the counties of Wales since 1990. [2258]

Mr. Hague: Since 1 January 1990, the Welsh development agency has recorded projects by nine Japanese companies carrying out new investments in Wales; four entering into joint ventures; three acquisitions; and 41 expansions of existing operations.

Ten projects have been recorded for Clwyd; five for Dyfed; 13 for Gwent; one for Gwynedd; 15 for Mid Glamorgan; two for Powys; eight for South Glamorgan; and three for West Glamorgan.

Free School Meals

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each local education authority the proportion of children who received free school meals in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in the most recent year for which figures are available. [2004]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information requested is contained in the following table.

Number of pupils taking free meals on the day of the Schools' Census (16 January in 1996) expressed as a percentage of the number of pupils in attendance on that day, by unitary authority

	Primary schools	Secondary schools

Rail Investment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what plans he has to invest in the Wrexham to Bidston railway line; [2263]

(2) what plans he has to invest in infrastructure relating to the Holyhead to Crewe railway line. [2262]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The level of investment in rail infrastructure is a matter for Railtrack.

Mobile Mass Radiography Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will restore the mobile mass radiography service to Wales. [2270]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The service was particularly successful, when introduced in the 1950s, in its aim of identifying patients with TB. It would be an inappropriate use of resources, in view of the relatively low annual number of TB cases now being reported in Wales, to continue a mass service.

Emergency Planning

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will establish an urgent review of the emergency planning arrangements for (a) industrial plants and (b) nuclear plants in Wales to take account of the recent industrial accident at Avonmouth. [2124]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The monitoring of emergency planning arrangements is a matter for the Health and Safety Executive. Sites with significant chemical hazards are already required to prepare on-site emergency plans under the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations 1984. The regulations also require the appropriate local authority within whose area such a site fails to prepare and keep up-to-date an off-site emergency plan.

The operators of nuclear power stations are required under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 and 1969 to have an emergency plan approved by the Health and Safety Executive for each installation and to exercise these arrangements regularly.

Two new European directives, covering the control of major accident hazards involving dangerous substances and basic safety standards, will have relevance for emergency planning requirements over the coming years.

A487 (Bypass)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will review his time scale for the construction of the Penygroes and Llanllyfni bypass on the A487 trunk road, with a view to bringing forward the commencement date; and what is the earliest possible date by which legal procedures and land acquisition could be completed to facilitate such a start if finance was, at that date, available. [2203]

Mr. Hague: The forward trunk road programme was reviewed as part of the process of preparing the Welsh Office's departmental report in March. This scheme was placed in the "in preparation" pool of the programme. It commands a high priority but is unlikely to start before April 1999. It is not possible to give a precise date for a start of work. The scheme is being progressed as quickly as the constraints of undertaking the detailed design work, completing the necessary statutory procedures and the availability of finance allow.

Aberconwy Borough Council

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the consequences of his predecessor's decision not to cap Aberconwy borough council in 1993. [2005]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In 1993, Aberconwy borough council was capped at the budget it set. That decision was taken because of the flooding in Llandudno which created unexpected expenditure pressures on the local authority.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what regulations his Department proposes to repeal by the end of 1996; if he proposes to conduct a compliance cost assessment on each regulation repealed; and what is the estimated cost of undertaking a compliance cost assessment to determine the advantages and disadvantages of each repeal. [1405]

Mr. Hague: None.

Information Technology Projects

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many information technology projects have been undertaken since 1992, and are planned for the coming year, arranged in cost bands of £1,000,000. [1919]

Mr. Hague: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

The Old School and School House Caergilig

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the application and supporting evidence presented to him prior to making an order for the disposal of property known as The Old School and School House Caergilig, Ynys Mon. [2488]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: A copy of the relevant documents has been placed in the Library of the House.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report columns 295–96, if he will list the main sectors of NHS expenditure covered by the cash limit increase for vote 4 resulting from take-up of end-year flexibility; if he will list those health authorities affected by the take-up and the corresponding sums; and if he will make a statement. [3029]

Mr. Hague: More than £20 million of the expenditure requirement relates to NHS trusts and GP fundholders exercising their freedoms to carry-forward funds from year to year. Other main areas of expenditure include: the programme to expand dental provision; the clinical effectiveness scheme; and the provision of repayable loans to meet in-year service pressures. The precise amounts at authority level have yet to be finalised.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report columns 295-96, what assessment he has made of the consequences of the transfer of responsibility for urban investment grants to the Welsh Development Agency; from which bodies or departments responsibility for urban investment grants has been transferred and in what proportions of the total sums involved; if administrative staff previously responsible have been transferred with the responsibility; and if he will make a statement. [3025]

Mr. Hague: The urban investment grant scheme was previously operated by the Welsh Office; £3.882 million has been transferred to the WDA for 1996–97 to fund ongoing and new project. The Welsh Office staff previously responsible for management of the scheme are on secondment to the WDA until the end of December to ensure a smooth transition in the administration of the scheme.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) on 1 November, Official Report, columns 295-96, if he will list the principal reasons for the increase in the running costs limit of the Office of Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Schools in Wales. [3027]

Mr. Hague: The reason for the increase in the running costs limit of the Office of Her Majesty's Inspectorate for Schools in Wales is the take-up of end-year flexibility as announced by the chief executive in his response to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) on 12 July 1996, Official Report, columns 326-31. This will be largely used for funding early retirement; helping OHMCI to meet the targets set in the White Paper "Development and training for Civil Servants: A Framework for Action"; IT training; and, administrative support for nursery inspection.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report columns 295-96, if he will list the approximate percentages of the increase in his Department's running cost limit in the present financial year that is accounted for by (a) the BSE crisis, (b) the costs of the north Wales child abuse inquiry and (c) other reasons; what impact each of these factors has had on the head count of his Department's employees as to (i) permanent and (ii) temporary staff; and if he will make a statement. [3023]

Mr. Hague: The increase will be applied to a number of the Department's budgets, largely to support additional work on BSE and the north Wales inquiry. The work is involving some re-deployment of permanent staff supplemented by temporary support staff recruited in the usual way. A number of these staff also carry out other duties.

My Department keeps under continual review its staffing requirements to ensure that these and other areas of business are taken forward appropriately.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report, columns 295-96, what proportion of the cash limit increase in vote 2 is covered by the take-up of end-year flexibility; if he will list the principal schemes covered by such end-year flexibility take-up; and if he will make a statement. [3030]

Mr. Hague: Of the £14.906 million cash limit increase for class XIV, vote 2, £11.357 million was covered by the take-up of end-year-flexibility. Of this total, £1.378 million was allocated to the capital provision of grant-maintained schools and £127,000 to the Welsh Office multi-media and portable initiative. The balance contributed towards the net increase of £25.313 million in the Welsh Development Agency's grant in aid.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report, columns 295–96, what assessment he has made of the principal reasons for the lower than expected claims for agrienvironmental and farm conservation schemes; what impact the BSE crisis has had on the level of such applications; and if he will make a statement. [3026]

Mr. Hague: When payment rates are determined under environmental land management schemes administered by my Department, careful consideration is given to the need to achieve satisfactory uptake levels. Regular payment reviews are also undertaken to ensure that payment levels continue to be appropriately set. An example of this is the 20 per cent. increase in payment rates under the moorland scheme.

Payment levels alone may not be the only factor resulting in lower than anticipated uptake. Socio-economic evaluations of the impact of each scheme are carried out on a five-yearly basis. The reports of the socio-economic evaluations of the Cambrian mountains and Lleyn peninsula environmentally sensitive areas are available in the Library of the House. Reports relating to other schemes will be placed in the library of the House as they become available.

An assessment of the impact of BSE on the uptake of schemes has not been undertaken, although an increase in interest has been noticed.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report, columns 295–96, if he will list the principal components of that net cash limit increase in vote 3 which arise from the take-up of end-year flexibility. [3028]

Mr. Hague: As announced by my hon. Friend, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, on 12 July, end-year-flexibility entitlements for class XIV, vote 3 totalled £1,177,000. Of this amount, £262,000 was taken up to cover capital expenditure on the central Government roads programme and £915,000 to cover additional departmental running costs, including costs associated with the north Wales child abuse inquiry.

Rugby World Cup

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements he has made to maximise the economic benefits to Wales of the holding of the final of the 1999 rugby world cup. [3013]

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend, the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) has responsibility for the co-ordination of my Department's efforts to maximise the economic benefits arising from the rugby world cup. He has established a Welsh Office liaison group with core representatives from the Welsh rugby union, the Wales tourist board, the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales, the Cardiff Bay development corporation, the Welsh Local Government Association, and Cardiff Marketing. Cardiff county council is also invited to attend. The group provides a focal point to ensure that Wales as a whole gains the maximum economic and tourism benefit from the event.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 4 November, Official Report, column 350, on the Welsh Development Agency's budget, if the sum of £20 million for the LG project is provision for 1996–97 alone; if it is the total provision by the Welsh Development Agency for the project; what is the planned expenditure for 1995–96 by the Welsh Development Agency on the LG project; and what elements of the LG project the £20 million provision will fund. [3021]

Mr. Hague: The £20 million allocated to the WDA of the LG project is for 1996–97; and additional spending requirements will be met as part of the WDA's normal priorities; the details of the funding arrangements are commercially confidential.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 4 November, Official Report, column 350, on the Welsh Development Agency's budget, when construction of the LG factory is planned to commerce; and how much of the £20 million committed in grant in aid for the LG project is allocated to (a) land acquisition, (b) site preparation and (c) factory construction. [3022]

Mr. Hague: Construction of the LG electronics development is expected to start in January 1997; construction of the LG semiconductors development is expected to start in March 1997. Details of the funding arrangements are commercially confidential.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 4 November, column 350 on the Welsh Development Agency's budget, what is the source of the additional £25.4 million of central Government provision for the Welsh Development Agency for 1996–97. [3020]

Mr. Hague: The additional provision of £25.3 million in class XIV, vote 2 for the grant in aid to the Welsh Development Agency has been funded mainly from (i) end-year flexibility entitlements carried forward from previous years, (ii) a switch of resources from class XIV, vote 1 as a result of claims proving lower than expected agri-environmental and farm conservation schemes, and (iii) numerous cases of virement within vote 2.

Welsh Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority as regards the movement of staff from Crickhowell house to other Government-owned premises in the Cardiff area; what estimate he has made of the savings in rent for those market-tested units of the authority leaving Crickhowell house for other Government-provided accommodation; and if he will make a statement. [3014]

Mr. Hague: None. The authority is considering options, on a commercially confidential basis, to re-locate staff from Crickhowell house. If this takes place, it will be essential to demonstrate value for money for the health service and a final decision has not been taken.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) of 1 November, Official Report, columns 295–96, if he will list the principal reasons for the increased grant in aid for the Cardiff Bay development corporation during the current financial year; what impact the current increase has had on previous estimates of (a) the final outturn cost of the barrage and (b) the current cumulative total public expenditure by the corporation; and if he will make a statement. [3024]

Mr. Hague: The grant in aid has been increased to fund additional estimated expenditure on inward investment projects, which could add to the cumulative total public expenditure by the corporation, and to fund the cash flow demands of the barrage project. The estimated final outturn cost of the barrage project remains within the £191 million announced to Parliament.

GP Fundholding

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning approval for the split up of GP fundholding practices; and if he will make a statement [3012]

Mr. Hague: From 1 April 1996, the minimum list size criterion for standard GP fundholding in Wales was reduced to 4,000 from 7,000. Thirty-seven practices previously within 17 fundholding groups, applied to change their status, and were approved. Some 31 are now single practice funds; six practices remain in three groups.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements for compulsory competitive tendering for work subject to the provisions of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 will apply to local authorities. [3524]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend has given very careful consideration to the timetable for the re-introduction of compulsory competitive tendering for this work after local government reorganisation. We have consulted on the regulations which provide for the re-introduction of compulsory competitive tendering and, separately, have received representations that a number of local authorities are continuing to have operational difficulties in complying with the timetable which was announced in June 1995.

My right hon. Friend has concluded that authorities should be given an additional six months for the re-introduction of compulsory competitive tendering for this work, that is to 1 October 1997. Welsh Office officials have written today to local authorities and other interested parties seeking comments on this proposal. A copy of this letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

An announcement on the way in which compulsory competitive tendering will be extended to professional services and housing management will be made shortly.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 284

SESSION 1996–97

23rd October—7th November 1996

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instruments etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker's rulings and statements'.

Other contributions by Speaker and deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates and Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates, etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Comm = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
